43396. What time did you commence to make up the accounts?—Directly we left the pitch. We would start making up by one of the ordinary papers, and we would check it by the evening papers which we had to go by to see if the prices were right.

43397. For that purpose you require a book or paper each day?—Yes.

43398. When you and your brother started, you started with some capital, and with a view of carrying on a regular business?—Yes.

43399. Did you keep no proper books?—How do you mean—official records?

43400. I should have thought you would want to know at the end of the week whether your capital had been added to or whether you had suffered a loss?—We would know that by our takings.

43401. You would have a pretty good guess, but when you went on for six months you would require some better record than the papers?—We did not do it in that way. We used to do it from week to week.

43402. Then it was practically a hand-to-mouth business?—That is quite true.

43403. For making your account with your punters (I have given you a case of receiving 200 slips) you would have to have a good-sized bit of paper?—We would keep a book weekly, and sometimes it would go over a week, and sometimes it would not.

43404. Have you got one of those books here?—I have not got one with me. I did not bring one.

43405. When you had finished making up the accounts it was your duty to go back to the place where your punters would expect to find you?—Quite true.

43406. Do they generally all come—those who are winners?—The majority would come; it all depends on the amount they had to come; if they had large amounts they would be there, but if they were small amounts they would not trouble, but would wait till the next day.

43407. That was rather awkward if the bet was made on the Monday, it was very awkward for the punter to wait until the Wednesday or the Thursday?—They do not do that, they generally come the next day; they do not let it go very long. Some bookmakers have a rule to the effect that if they do not receive the claim in a certain time the bet is off, but I do not believe in that.

43408. I think I follow now sufficient for my purpose the way in which you carried on business. When Platt came on the scene what did you do the first day or the second day with regard to him? Did he come and bring you any money to start with? We know you owed money from the Saturday?—Yes. On the first day it was, as far as I can recollect, between a quarter to one and a quarter past one when Mr. Platt came on the scene. I was betting at the time, and he came up to me and asked me how I stood. I told him as near as I could tell him what was the financial position we were standing in, because we did not want to stop our business; we were going to carry it on till we found somebody to finance us, and I told him, and he said "All right, I am going to take over this pitch. I am your new governor." My brother had settled with him, and my brother had come previously to me and told me he thought he had got somebody to stand us, and he then went and saw him, and when Platt came up then I knew that there was somebody coming along, so, of course, I was glad, and I said "All right, sir," and I went on betting, and at 2 o'clock, after the first race, or it might be half-past 1, I cannot say for certain, he came up and took my slips from me—not the money, but only the slips, and then after the next race, say, the next half hour, he came up again, and the next half hour, and every half hour till we thought there was no more.

43409. Then according to the way you and Platt were doing business he would be in attendance, though he was not on the pitch taking the slips, but he would be in attendance?—Yes.

43410. And whenever he asked for the slips you gave them to him?—Yes.

43411. That would be done cautiously, because it might be observed?—Quite true.

43412. Then at the end of the day what did you and Platt do, as a rule?—It was only this week that this happened that Mr. Platt took the slips, and at the end of the day he took all the money I had.

43413. At the end of the day?—Yes, for that week only. He took it all away, because he could not make the papers up. He made them up out of our sight that week.

43414. And paid the punters himself?—No, he came down with us, and in our presence he paid the punters.

43415. He took the slips away and all the money, and then he came back with the account, and in your presence he paid the punters?—Yes.

43416. So that it was Platt's business by that time, and the only part of the business you did with Platt was to be on the pitch taking the slips?—That is quite true for that week.

43417. What was done the week after?—The week after we thought it was not the proper thing. I suppose we had our funny ideas, but we wanted to see things in our sight, and to see things carried on in our sight, and if there was a very bad day we wanted a little guarantee that we should see Mr. Platt, and know that if there was a bad day we should see the money that was taken and know what was taken, and be able to see, so far as we could, how much money there was; he could not get away from us if there was money owing to punters. That is the real truth of it, and we thought it best to have the papers made up in our presence, and that would be a guarantee for the punters as well, because we would know the papers we took, and none could be destroyed.

43418. After that first week that new system was followed daily in connection with Platt?—Yes.

43419. Was your brother William generally present with you when the accounts were made out at night?—Yes.

43420. Who did the writing when you met after the first week?—My brother used to enter them sometimes. I used to enter them sometimes, but my brother, as a rule, I think, entered the names of the winners.

43471. The position after the first week was that Platt had not taken money at all from you during the day?—No.

43422. He had taken the slips, as a rule?—He had taken all the slips.

43423. When you three met you had taken the money and Platt had got the slips?—Quite true.

43424. What was your process of settling the account when you met together at night to make up the accounts?—That would be in the presence of his brother-in-law. His brother-in-law would be there as well.

43425. Then you four were together?—Yes.

43426. Who wrote out the slips, for instance?—The amounts on them?

43427. Yes?—Platt would do so. He marked on the back of the slips, as an extra check, how much money was laid out.

43428. So that, on the slips, supposing Victor Wild had won——?—No, I do not mean that. I will explain what I mean. I mean so as to try to find out how much money I had taken or how much the punters had to come. Which do you mean?

43429. I do not know. I am asking you?—Platt had all the papers.

43430. And you had all the money?—The mode of procedure would be, first, to see how we had got on on the day—to see whether we had won or lost. The papers would be opened out, and the winners would be put on one side, and the losers would be crossed with a mark or struck through to show that they had lost.

43431. You got rid of a great many slips, I suppose, by that means?—Sometimes.

43432. The more slips that were got rid of in that way the better for you?—It does not always follow.

43433. It does not alway follow, logically, but still there would be a number of slips in one heap referring to punters who had lost their money completely?—That is right.

43434. The other heap would contain a number of slips referring to sums which had to be paid by you to the punters?—Yes.

43435. How did you make up that account?—We should get the evening papers to see what horses had won, and we should find out how much they had won, and enter on the papers how much they had to come.

43436. One typical case is "2s. Victor Wild—Chandler." Suppose Chandler won?—Suppose Victor Wild had won at 4 to 1, and the other horse had not run, he would have 10s. to come, so we should put 10s. on the paper.

43437. On the slip?—On the slip.

43438. That would be the first thing?—That would be the first thing. Then we should know that he had 10s. to come.

43439. On which side of the slip did you put the 10s.?—On the side on which he won.

43440. On the same side on which it appeared?—We should put it perhaps in the corner.

43441. When you had dealt with all the slips in that way, was any entry made in a book, or was a list made up then of the punters who had to be paid?—Yes.

43442. You would have to get the names of the punters and the amounts due to them?—Quite so.

43443. Where were those names entered?—In our presence in the same place in a book.

43444. What kind of a book was it?—An ordinary common ruled cash book—a long one.

43445. Which of the four of you had that book?—I had.

43446. Did you enter the names?—Sometimes I entered the names of the punters, and the amounts, and sometimes my brother did. Only the names of the clients my brother entered. Anything connected with money I entered. He used to fill in what they had actually won.

43447. Then Platt did not write at all in that book?—No, I do not think he did.

43448. Why should he, according to that system? It was your book?—After we had done, Platt would run up the book and see if the totals were right, and if he found it was wrong he might alter a figure.

43449. I quite understand that. After the slips had been separated in the way you say, and the amounts due to each punter noted on the punters' slips, then the names of the punters who had won were entered in a book together with the amounts due from you to them?—Quite so.

43450. And it was, you say, your brother who wrote in that book?—Quite true.

43451. At the dictation of Platt and his partner, I suppose?—Yes.

43452. They had the slips?—Sometimes I would call them out, and sometimes he would call them out.

43453. But if you called them out, your brother entered them, I suppose?—Yes, quite true—mostly Mr. Platt called them out.

43454. Am I to understand that the person who called them out did not write in the book himself?—No.

43455. Because it would not have been a convenient course, and would not have served the purpose of a check?—Yes.

43456. That book is made up, we will suppose. Then, as you are the person to pay the punters, you would have, as the result of that examination of the account, a list in your hand of the person to whom you had to make payments?—Quite so.

43457. Then would come the question of money?—Yes.

43458. After the first week you had to put the money on the table, had you not?—When the slips had been made up, and the book had been made up, I should take, as a rule, the moneys out of my pocket (sometimes before the book was made up or sometimes after) and put it on the table to see if I had any silver.

43459. It does not matter at what time you emptied your pocket?—Then Platt would count the money to see that it was correct. Sometimes it was counted beforehand and sometimes afterwards.

43460. It is quite immaterial, but in one way or another you produced the money, and then it was counted?—Yes.

43461. Then it was Platt's duty to give you enough money to pay the amount due to the punters?—No, I would not have the money at all. Platt would not give me the money, he would put the money in his own pocket; Platt would take all the money away.

43462. You handed over all the money that you had got?—Yes.

43463. But supposing the total amount of money that you handed to him or placed upon the table did not amount to the total of the amount that you had taken, according to the slips, what happened then?—Then I should have to give an account of the moneys taken. Supposing, for instance, there was such a thing as a query for the day—supposing I had paid a man 3s. 6d. with a query, and I knew him to be right, I would say, "I paid 3s. 6d. query." Supposing, for instance, Platt had half a sovereign off me, I would say, "I gave 'So-and-So' half a sovereign"; it does not matter whether it was Platt or not, because I would not put it down in his own name.

43465. Why not?—Perhaps he would not want me to enter it as "Platt," because his brother-in-law would be present, and he would not want his brother-in-law to know that.

43466. If you had given him half a sovereign in the course of the day, do you mean?—Yes. Take an illustration that comes to my mind. Supposing he wanted to back a horse.

43467. Supposing Platt wanted to be a punter himself?—Yes. Suppose he says, "Go and put me £1 on 'So-and-So,'" and that horse lost, he would lose his £1. He would not give me that £1. That £1 would have to be made up at night time, because his brother-in-law would be present, and that £1 would have to be accounted for.

43468. If Platt and his brother-in-law were partners, that is one of the partners entering into business in another capacity. Why should you not say "Platt had a bet with me." That would cancel the matter as far as you were concerned. Then in the account between Platt and his partner Platt would be debited with £1?—He would not.

43469. Why not?—If he told me not to debit him he would not.

43471. Did you do that often?—Several times.

43472. I mean you come here and you are complaining of dishonesty on the part of Platt, and in your communication to Messrs. Wontner and Son you complain of dishonesty on the part of Platt?—Yes.

43473. Does it not strike you that you were dishonest to McCarthy?—It did not strike me in that sense, and I will tell you why. Mr. Platt would have 10s., or, say, 5s. I said "That is not right, Mr. Platt." Those were my very words.

43474. You told Platt it was wrong?—I told him so, and he said "That is right; that will be all right in the end."

43475. I daresay when you were all ruined in the end it might be all right?—As a matter of fact, there was an instance when the brother-in-law asked me on a certain occasion how much we won on the week, and to the best of my ability I told him. It appears that Platt had told him something different, and there were a few words about it. I was depending for my life on my occupation, in a sense, and I knew if there was a bust up I should lose my job. Mr. Platt came to me and said "What did"—mentioning his name—"say to you?" I said, "He asked me how much we won on the week." He said, "What did you tell him?" I said, "I told him the truth." He said, "You know you did not win so much." I said, "I did not know that." He said, "There are one or two little bets you did not know of." I said, "I have not seen them." He said, "You do not know everything." I said, "All right." When the brother-in-law came round to me I said to him, "I am sorry I thought there was so much won last week, but I must have made a mistake; Mr. Platt told me it was not so much; but for the future all the papers that come on this pitch am I responsible for?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Any papers that are taken here you are not responsible for." He said, "No." That is all I wanted to know. He said, "What is the matter?" I said, "That is all." If he was dull enough not to grasp my meaning I did not enlighten him any further.

43476. Did Platt bet very often?—No. He used to tell me of enormous bets. He did not give me the money for bets. I may have made two or three bets for him.

43477. How many bets did you accept for Platt during the few weeks you were his agent?—I should think three.

43478. Only three?—I should say three.

43479. What did you enter on the slip. Did you make out the slip for him?—No, I would not bet with him ourselves.

43480. Then there was no slip at all?—No. I would go and bet with somebody else, and he would have to trust to me to put it on. If I did not put the bet on that would be my look-out, but, as a matter of fact, I did put his bets on.

43481. You mean you did not bet with yourself?—No.

43482. You did not write out a slip for Platt, and put in the slip "Alf.", or some name like that?—No.

43483. You went and gave a sovereign or 10s. to another bookmaker?—That is quite true. I had to pay the actual money.

43484. Why did you do that?—Because he told me to. I was told to recognise him as the governor, and I did, and to do as he told me, and I did.

43485. Then I do not understand how you managed about the deficiency caused by your having given 10s. to Platt. Observe what happened. According to the story which you give me as to the way in which you did business, as the result of the examination of the slips so much was due to so many punters?—Quite right.

43486. The money which you had in your pocket is put on the table?—Yes.

43487. It is 10s. short?—It might be more than that.

43488. We will suppose that it was 10s. short. That is the instance you yourself gave?—Yes.

43489. You have to account for that 10s.?—Yes.

43490. I thought you said you would account for it as a bet made by a fictitious punter?—No, nothing of the kind.

43491. How did you deal with it?—I did as I was told.

43492. You were 10s. short?—In one instance you will find there he had 15s. off me. I should think about one o'clock he said to me "I want 15s." I said "All right." He said "You can put it down to 'Tecs'," I think it was, or something like that. He said "Put it down to 'Tecs'." I put it down.

43493. And you knew that that would come before McCarthy; the word "Tecs" would have to be mentioned to McCarthy?—It might be mentioned, but if McCarthy could not read or write he would only see the figures, and he would only go by the figures.

43494. He would say "That 10s. short is partly my money"?—Yes, but they would not settle in front of me; they used to have a settlement amongst themselves.

43495. But you have told me that McCarthy, Platt, you and your brother, were present, with all the slips on the table in two heaps, and lists written out by you or your brother, and a book with the names of the punters, and the amounts due to them, and the money on the table too?—Yes.

43496. Then it turns out the money on the table is 10s. less than it ought to be according to the slips?—That is right.

43497. McCarthy was not deaf as well as unable to read or write, was he?—No, but McCarthy would not take any notice. I would make up a list of expenses under Platt's dictation. I put it down, and he would have a settlement when we were all gone, and when they were by themselves, and there is no doubt he showed certain expenses during the day, and, of course, McCarthy would accept it as such.

43498. The names of the punters were called out, and the amount that each had won was called out, and entered in the book, then the total amount was compared with the money on the table, and then they discovered that the money on the table was 10s. less than it ought to?—It might be more.

43499. He expected that there would be a deficiency?—Platt would say: "Make a list of what is laid out."

43500. He expected that there would be a deficiency in respect of the monies laid out?—Yes. The only expenses which are practically allowed would be for what we call "lookers out," or "touts," and he might allow me, say, 1s. for a drink for myself, or anything like that.

43501. If you found it necessary to pay something to a policeman, that would be allowed you?—No, he would not allow me that.

43502. Why not?—Because he did not believe in it.

43503. That would be the time at which the matter would be inquired into by Platt, and his partner, would it not—when you found 10s. there, and the money had been laid out for a policeman?—There was no such question raised between McCarthy and Platt. They seemed unanimous in their mode of working.

43504. Very likely, McCarthy trusted Platt?—He did.

43505. He heard the word "Tecs" mentioned?—I do not suppose he heard it.

43506. Was he deaf?—No. I would make out a list, and he left the matter in Platt's hands. He left Platt to control it. Platt would say "Give me a list of expenses," which I did, and I suppose after all was over he would show this list to McCarthy, and it would be accepted as such.

43507. Then you wish us to understand that any entry that bears the possible interpretation of being an entry of a payment made to the police is a purely fictitious entry made by you at Platt's request?—Quite so.

43508. Then will you kindly tell me why it was necessary to resort to the device of saying that the money had been laid out on the police. Was there any other excuse?—No, I do not see any other excuse there could be.

43509. That was accepted by McCarthy as a proper one?—It may have been.

43510. It was, was it not?—It must have been.

43511. At present the only excuses for your money not being complete that you suggest are, first of all, the payment of a drink to yourself?—I do not drink myself.

43512. You said so?—He might allow me 1s., but that would be acknowledged.

43513. That would be an allowance which would be naturally passed by your principals and nobody would complain of that. That is the first thing?—Yes.

43514. The other excuse suggested as being a proper one is that you had betted for Platt?—Yes. That is my answer to it.

43515. You had expended money at Platt's request?—Yes, or I had another excuse, that I had given him the actual money, or he had left me the actual money short.

43516. Those are the excuses for deductions which you have suggested?—Quite right.

43518. You talk a great deal about the brother-in-law. What aged man is McCarthy?—I should think about 30.

43519. Is he a sober-looking man?—As far as I know he is a very decent fellow.

43520. He has got his wits about him?—I should think he had.

43521. Is he related in any way to you as well as to Platt?—None whatever.

43522. Is he related to your brother William in any way?—No, not that I know of. I could not swear that he is; I could not say. He may be, but not as far as I know. I do not know whether he has any actual relationship in any shape or form.

43523. Is your brother a married man?—William?

43525. Whom did he marry?—He married a girl named Agnes Grove.

43526. Is she any relation of McCarthy?—I could not say. I do not know.

43527. Is McCarthy your brother-in-law?—I could not say—not that I know of. I have no sister.

43528. I beg your pardon. I meant to say is he William Fisher's brother-in-law?—Not that I know of. I should not think so. It is news to me if that is the case, absolutely.

43528*. (Mr. Dickinson.) I want first of all to ask you about your interview with the police. I understood from you that on October 20th, which was the day after you had seen in the papers something about Platt's statement, you sent a punter to the police station?—I did not send a punter. I sent a person in my employ.

43529. I thought you mentioned that he was a punter?—No, not a punter—a person in my employ.

43532. What was his name?—His name is Chandler.

43533. What did you tell him to do?—I will tell you how it occurred, and then perhaps you will understand it. I went through my usual routine day's business, and about a quarter past 8 I came to pay out. I was working for another man at the time. It would be about a quarter past 9 at night. I said to him, "This is a nice thing for a man to turn round and say." This is what got on my nerves. "He says he has now five agents in the G Division, and he is paying the police £3 10s. a week," or words to that effect.

43534. You understood Platt had told us that?—I read it in the evidence.

43535. In the newspapers?—Yes. I said, "It is a deliberate falsehood; this man is not employing anybody in this division; and if he is not employing anybody, surely he cannot be paying anybody." I said, "Who is the head of the police in this division." He said, "Wright or Leach," or another man; I forget the other man's name; I think it was Hammond or a name like that. I said, "You go down and tell one of them I want to see them to-morrow at 12 o'clock on the City Road Bridge." I suppose he took that as an order, and he did so. I went to keep my appointment. Then from there I went home. I sat down and I was thinking what was the best thing to do, because I knew he had no agents there, and I knew I was the only agent, practically speaking, he had previously in that division. I thought to myself, "Well, I know it is a deliberate falsehood. I will write to the Commissioners"—I believe I wrote a letter that night—"or write to the solicitors." I do not know whether it was on that night exactly. I made up my mind to do another thing. I thought "I shall go down to the police station." I went down to King's Cross police station (I think it was about 9 o'clock in the morning), and as I was going to the station I saw an officer. If I went down there I could point out the officer I did see. I said to him, "Excuse me, but are you a police officer?" He said, "How do you know I am?" I said, "Well, I believe you are." He said, "Well, I am." I said, "Well, I am a bookmaker, and I am in a position to disprove the evidence before the Commission of this man Platt."

43536. I think that is enough. I think I know what happened afterwards. I understand from you now that when you first saw this in the papers you were struck with the fact that he still had agents going on then bribing the police?—Quite true—that he had five agents at work.

43537. And that being untrue, as you knew, you thought it would be well to inform the police?—Yes, quite true.

43538. You just told us you say Chandler, and you asked him who the police were in that district?—Yes, I asked him who the heads of the police were.

43539. He said one was Leach?—And the other was Wright, and there was another name.

43540. The other name you do not remember?—Quite right. It might be Hammond.

43541. You had to ask him the names?—I asked him who the heads of the police were, and he told me. I did not know their position at all. When he told me I thought they were really the proper people to see—they were the supreme heads of the district, practically speaking.

43542. Was that the first time you had heard of them?—No, I had heard of them previously many a time. A scout has run up to me and said, "Look out, here comes Leach" "Here comes Wright!" or any other officer. Of course, that is what they were employed for.

43543. You knew that they had been in the vicinity. Why did you have to ask him who were the heads of the police?—I did not know, you see; I would not know one from the other. They would say to me, "Come, look out; here comes Wright!" "Here comes Leach!" I should not wait to see them. I should walk away.

43544. All you wanted them to know was that this was untrue?—Yes.

43545. And to inform the police generally?—And that he had defrauded me out of my money, and the character of the man.

43546. Why did not you go to the police station yourself?—I did not want to be known at the police station, or to walk in, because their eye would be on me. I thought if I only saw two men or one man it would do. I was not going to tell them where I was betting. I did not tell them where I was betting. I just mentioned the matter.

43547. I think we understand that. You say you asked Chandler who were the heads of the police?—Yes.

43548. And Chandler told you the heads of the police were Leach and Wright, and this other man whose name you think was Hammond?—Yes.

43549. You wanted to see the heads of the police?—Certainly.

43552. What made you, when you met the heads of the police, tell them that you thought the names of those two policemen would be in the book?—Because I knew Platt had got me to write things down in the book, and I did not know whether I had written any name down. It is quite possible he may have said to me, "That is a nice thing; put down so-and-so." He may have said it or not. I may have entered it in a book or not have entered it in a book. I might have put it down to something else.

43553. You knew perfectly well, when you saw these policemen on the bridge, that somehow or another the names of Leach and, you expected, Wright had been given by Platt?—No, I never knew what names might be mentioned. Any names might be mentioned.

43554. What did you think about it?—I thought this much. I did not know who I was going to see. I asked this scout who were the heads of the police, and he told me these two individuals. There might have been any other officer that had come through that might be mentioned in the book. It is quite possible it may have mentioned any name. I did not know any name at all.

43556. Having done that, when you meet them you say to them that if the names which had been given by Platt included Leach and Wright, the reason for that was that you remembered an occasion when he was present when your scout had come up and said Leach and Wright were there?—That is quite true. He may not have said those words exactly. I do not know exactly what my actual words were, but the names of any officers who came through there might have been mentioned. They might have been my actual words. I was in a feverish state of excitement. I was rather excited over what I was doing.

43557. Mind you, you are on your oath here?—Yes, I know that.

43558. Do you mean to say, when you had that conversation with the policemen which we have heard of, that you did not expect the name of Leach had been mentioned or found in the books of Platt?—Of course not.

43559. Why did you say so?—I never said so.

43560. What did you say to the police? Tell us exactly what you did say? First of all, whom did you see?—I think I spoke to Mr. Wright, because he was the man who arrested me once, and he was the only man I knew by sight. Then I did not actually know his name was Wright, because I think it was a man named Hearne who arrested me. I think I addressed myself to him, and a third man was there whom I did not know. I knew a man by sight of the name of Jerry Chandler.

43561. Who is Jerry Chandler?—I do not know; but he was a man similar to this man that was in the box—similar to Laing. I always thought that was Jerry Chandler.

43562. You always thought that the man known as Laing was Jerry Chandler?—I had seen him before.

43563. The man whom you had seen before as Laing was Jerry Chandler?—I always thought he was Jerry Chandler. Now I know him to be Laing.

43564. You say you did know a man of the name of Jerry Chandler, and that man you now know to be Sergeant Laing?—That is quite true.

43565. Do not say anything you do not mean. Do you know now that this man is Sergeant Laing?—Yes.

43566. Jerry Chandler was Police-sergeant Laing?—Yes.

43567. How did you know him as Jerry Chandler?—By the scout. I will tell you how I knew it. One day I was in rather what they call a tight corner in the vicinity, and the scout halloaed out, "Here comes Jerry Chandler." I faced the music, as the saying is. I thought I had not got time to get away, so I walked full breast, and walked out of it, as I thought, and I saw this gentleman as I was passing. I noticed this man as I was passing.

43568. You knew him by sight then?—I knew him by sight.

43569. Did you know him well by sight?—No, not exactly well. I had seen him two or three times, I am certain.

43570. We have heard that he has been a detective for some time?—Yes.

43571. Do you know whether Platt knew him as "Jerry Chandler"?—I could not say.

43572. Have you ever spoken to Platt about him as Jerry Chandler?—No.

43573. Did you expect that his name might be one that Platt had mentioned?—Quite possible—just as probable as any other name.

43574. Why was it quite possible?—Because if he was in the vicinity the tout would holloa out who is coming by name if he knew him, or "Look out, here comes So-and-so," and it is quite possible it might be him. If he had mentioned his name as "Jerry Chandler" it would not have surprised me in any shape or form.

43575. But you had an explanation to give to the police sergeants with regard to Leach. I mean you stated to them that if Leach had had his name mentioned that was probably due to this event?—I will tell you why I said that, because on this occasion when the scout ran up and said, "Look out, here comes Leach and Wright," I ran away, and Platt said, "I am going to have a walk round the houses to have a look at them," and he had a look at them. That is the only way I would know he would know them.

43576. When did this occur?—It might be on the Royal Hunt Cup day. I could not say exactly, I think it would be a big race day. I could not fix what the time was. It would be between May and July.

43577. As far as you know, is that the only occasion on which you can tell us that Platt had known the name of Leach?—There might be other occasions when they were round the vicinity, and the scout would warn me to that effect, and Platt would be there, and he would get out of it the same as I did.

43578. What did the policemen say to you on the bridge?—The officers?

43579. Yes?—I think one of them said, "What has that to do with us?" I think my words to them were "I am the bookmaker Fisher." They said, "What has that to do with us?" I said, "I have a paragraph here." They said, "What is that?" They seemed rather impressed. I said, "I have read in the paper about a man named Platt saying he has five agents in the G Division, and that he is paying the police £3 10s. a week." I said, "I know that is absolutely false, because I know he has not one in the G Division, and, apart from him being able to do that, he has run away with £27 of our money, and I do not think he is in a position to have the money to pay them that." I said, "If through any fault of mine your names should be mentioned, or any names in the G Division, I am extremely sorry, because I know it is not true," because I never gave a halfpenny to anybody.

43580. You said if through any fault of yours their names were mentioned?—Yes, it was nothing to do with any of them, because I thought then I was talking to some ——

43581. What was the fault of yours through which you thought their names might be mentioned?—If I had put down, as Platt suggested, the name of any individual it would be my fault for putting it down, and it would have nothing to do with them.

43582. If you had put it down?—Yes.

43583. Having given me that answer, do you mean to tell me you did not know you had put it down?—No, I could not swear. The business is a very exciting business; betting is very exciting; and things would pass through your hands daily. You would have a book for a day, or a week, and the book passes out of your hands, and you do not see any more of it; sometimes you throw it on the fire, and take no further notice of it.

43584. You might have done?—I might have done, because I knew I had made fictitious entries.

43585. You knew that you had made fictitious entries?—Quite true.

43586. And you knew that some of those fictitious entries were entries of the word "Police"?—Quite true.

43587. And you thought that some of the fictitious entries might be the names of these policemen?—Any name.

43588. Can you tell us what number of fictitious entries you used to make of that kind?—I do not follow what you mean.

43589. I understand you to say you used to put down "Police" at Platt's instigation, and fictitious entries to account for the money otherwise spent?—Yes.

43590. And that you might have put down the names of individual policemen?—Yes.

43591. As fictitious policemen?—Yes.

43592. How often would that be done?—Sometimes twice a week, sometimes once a week, sometimes three times a week. It would vary according to the amount of money he had had, or what he left me short.

43593. Then once or twice a week you would put down something which might have implicated the police although it was put down as fictitious?—It might be.

43594. How many of those books would you have kept? For instance, how long would this book last you?—Sometimes it would take three leaves a day, and sometimes, with queries and that, it would take six leaves a day.

43595. You cannot tell at all?—No, you can never tell.

43596. Would this last you a week?—Yes, I should say it would last a week or a fortnight. Some books last three weeks. It all depends on what is going on. If it is a good day there would be more punters, and if it is a bad day there would be less punters.

43597. (Mr. Whitmore.) It would depend on the time of the year?—Yes. I could not say how many leaves it would take. Sometimes it would be a good day, and it would take two leaves; some days it would take six or eight leaves.

43598. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you supply these books, or did Platt supply them?—Sometimes I would supply a book and sometimes Platt would supply it. He used to take it home at night.

43599. Did you use these kind of books the whole time you were working with Platt?—Yes—not exactly that kind—some would have a different kind of cover.

43600. I want to get a rough idea of how many of these books altogether must have passed through your hands, from you to Platt?—How long was he with me?

43601. Practically it was May, June, July, and August?—Generally about ten. It might be more or it might be less.

43602. I understand from your examination by the learned Chairman that these books were on the table when you, Platt, McCarthy and your brother William were present?—Yes.

43603. And when you had the winning slips placed in a pile, with the amount that you had to pay out to the winners, then Platt or somebody else (usually Platt) would read these out to you?—Would call the punters' names out.

43604. And the amounts which were put on the corners of the slips?—Sometimes I would call them out and my brother put them down.

43605. Who did generally put them down?—I should think my brother did.

43606. You have been through these books?—Yes.

43607. Have you seen any entries in your own handwriting?—Yes. Most of the entries in my own handwriting are connected with money and expenses, or queries. My brother had nothing to do with the money. He used to hand over what he had and have done with it.

43608. Just look at those pages. In whose writing are those two pages?—That is my brother's.

43609. Whose writing is that on the other side?—That is mine.

43610. And on the opposite page?—Mine.

43611. Let me read this to you: "Queries," there is nothing against that; "Stevens 2s.," Hoffman 1s.," "Symes 1s." Then there is the word "Expenses." Then "Queries 9s. 6d.," then this word, "L——g 10s.," and then "Spent 5s. 6d." The whole is added up—£1 9s. You say you put down things that had to do with money?—Yes.

43612. Am I right in saying that all those items refer to money that had been expended?—No, there is only 5s. 6d. expended.

43613. What would "Queries" be?—"Queries" would be this. For instance, supposing a man had something to come, I would tell Platt what it was. The word here is "owing."

43614. That is the word "Queries"?—Yes.

43615. I want to know exactly what that means?—"Queries" would mean that L——g had 10s. to come. This is "Expenses 9s. 6d."

43616. 9s. 6d. is expenses?—Yes.

43617. What kind of expenses?—For various things in the day. Sometimes we would have dinner, and sometimes Platt would entertain one or two friends, and those would have to be paid for.

43618. When you wrote that book had you had the word "Queries" 9s. 6d.?—No, the word "Expenses" is put there—"Expenses 9s. 6d.," and then comes "Queries."

43619. The word "Expenses" has been written in since the word "Queries," has it not?—What do you mean?

43621. You say that "L——g" is a query?—Yes.

43623. Now let us have the explanation of that "L——g"?—There it is. I did not know what the name was; it might be Larey or Long. You will see in that book Long, Larry, and Larey. I could not tell you which it was. He had some money to come. I paid the man the money, and asked Platt to look at "Query." I said to the man, "What is your amount?" He told me, and I gave him the money, and at nighttime, when I was handing the money over, I said, "I paid that man his money. I cannot recollect his name, but you will know it. It is either Long, Larry, or Larey." I said, "I shall put down 'L——g,' and you will know which it is."

43624. (Mr. Whitmore.) Would that be applicable to either of the three?—Yes, Long, Larry, or Larey. I said, "I will put it down, and you will know what it means."

43625. (Mr. Dickinson.) You gave him three names?—Yes, I had asked him two or three days for the money, and it had not been forthcoming. I can tell you how many days it was if you will let me look at it.

43626. There is no doubt that that is "L——g." It is not a "y"?—I think it is a "g"; it is one of my g's. I thought it was the name of Long.

43627. There is one day before, there is two days before, and there is four days before. That would be four days before, according to that?—Yes.

43628. There is five days before, there is six days before, and there is seven days before?—I know the man was worrying me for some days, and I paid him up at the end myself.

43629. (Mr. Whitmore.) Which punter did you pay?—He came worrying me three or four days for the bet, and at the end I got so tired that I paid him. I asked Platt to look up the query. He used to take the papers away at night. I never had the papers after the day's racing, and it was rather awkward for a man to come asking me for money and he could not get it, so at last I said, "Here you are; I shall soon get it now." I made use of those words.

43630. (Mr. Dickinson.) In this entry which was made when you were making up your book seven days before, there is written in a word which you say is Long?—It might be Long, or Larey; I did not exactly know the man's name.

43631. Why did you not put 10s. against that?—I will tell you why I did not. These are all queries with no amount. I only put down the money which I got paid. These are all queries.

43632. What had happened with regard to this man Long?—I do not say that was his name.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Might I hand up the draft proof of Joseph William Fisher, and point out to you an error which has occurred in the statement? I think I have discovered the source of the error. If you will look at the proof you will see how it originally stood. You will see this: "I remember one Monday in the early part of May, the date of which my brother Robert fixes the 7th of May, Platt being brought to me by his brother-in-law McCarthy." McCarthy is struck out in pencil, and in the margin there is put "Delete." It was Fisher who did that. He did not want to mention McCarthy's name, and whenever he came to the word "McCarthy" he struck it out, and the copyist, instead of putting "his brother-in-law" has put "my brother-in-law." The result is to make complete confusion of it.

(Chairman.) I think that is an explanation of the mistake that I made. I thought it was William Fisher's brother-in-law.

43633. (Mr. Dickinson.) According to you, seven days before you had some question raised about a man named Long or Larey?—Yes.

43634. You were not sure about his name?—That is right.

43635. When did you settle with this particular man Long or Larey?—On the day on which I made a note of it.

43636. That would be on the day on which it is entered as "L——g"?—Quite true.

43637. If that matter was held over all through that week why does not the name appear on the intermediate days?—For every day?

43638. Yes?—This man's name would raise a query, and I would make a note of it in my book. I remember him coming repeatedly and asking me for the money. He would say, "Have you not answered my query?" I said, "I will be sure to do it to-day." I would tell Platt, "Why don't you see to this man's bet?" Then his excuse was that when he got home at night he did not see to it. I said that would not be satisfactory to him. At last I got tired and paid the man. Platt said to me, "Why did you pay that man out?" I said, "You can easily find it out; there are two punters, Long and Larry or Larey." I said, "I put down L——g." He said, "Which was it?" I said, "I cannot tell you which one I paid it to—to Larry or Larey or Long." I said, "I put down L——g, and you will be able to trace it." He said, "I will do so." The next day I said, "Have you found that query?" He said, "I suppose it is right; I have not troubled."

43639. When did you pay this man?—On the day when I would record it as paid.

43640. Did you know this man Long, the man who was bothering you about the payment?—How do you mean, did I know him?

43641. Did you know him by sight?—Yes, I knew him by being a punter. You get mixed up if you get the same names. Sometimes we have three or four men betting in one name, and it is very awkward. You have to trust them by sight.

43642. This man came to you and claimed a bet. You had no entry of the fact that you owed it. He was not on the list?—I made a note of it previously, and I told Platt, and Platt made a note of it, so that he could look up the query. Platt made a note of it to look up the query.

43643. Where would Platt look?—Amongst the papers. He would take the papers home at night.

43644. The old slips?—Yes.

43645. Would he keep the old slips?—Yes, he would keep them at home.

43646. And this man coming to you and saying, "You owe me 10s.," not having him down in the list of persons, you would not pay the 10s., but you would wait until you saw Platt?—That is quite true.

43647. That is your explanation?—That is my explanation. I got tired of this man worrying me, and I thought, "If I pay you and do not get paid, I will put up with it." This man came for it, and I did not think he was trying to get it by unfair means.

43648. Have you ever seen that book in Platt's possession?—He used to have one similar to this, but it seemed to me rather smaller than that.

43649. You are sure you said to Platt at the time that it was Long or Larey?—Yes—three names—Long, Larry, or Larey, I am certain.

43650. You are quite sure you did not mention the name Laing to him?—No, I did not mention the name Laing—in fact I did not know that name. I had nobody betting in the name of Laing all the time I have been betting. I have never had the name of Laing on my books.

43651. You cannot account for the fact that when he copied this out in his own book he did write the word "Laing"?—I could not account for that at all. He may have had to look up queries, and as such put it down as that. It may have been the way the man down as that. It may have been the way the man wrote his bet out. He may have looked at the bet and may have been written in such a way. It may have been that he looked up the query, and in looking up the query said, "This is all right, there is the name of Laing," and he might have taken the name for Laing instead of Long.

43652. I understand you to say that you have seen the entry "Tecs" in the books in various places?—I have. There is another entry you will find as well—"T" or "Tom." That refers to my brother, and it was mostly 15s.

43653. Can you read that first entry on the left-hand side in this book (handing book to witness)?—"Tecs and P"—I do not know what "P" stands for.

43654. You cannot give us any idea what "Tecs and P" means?—(After examining the book.) You do not mind my looking at this?

43655. Oh, no. I want particularly to know, and you are the only person who can tell us, what these things mean in these books?—(After further examining the book.) I do not think it is "Tecs" at all—I think it is "Teas" and something else I had to pay. We used to have occasionally a little flare up amongst ourselves.

43656. What would "Teas and P" mean?—Teas and Paid. It would mean Paid. Sometimes it would be commission I should have to pay. I used to pay a man who would bring me a certain amount of money in the week a little commission. We used to have teas on a Saturday, it being a light day, and we would spend three or four shillings on that, and the rest would be commission. I might have to give 4s. to so-and-so, and Mr. Platt would know what that would be. He would know I had to pay one man 1s. and another man 1s. 6d., and the fact that it is 16s. 6d. would show it is odd money.

43657. Then the next item, "Bob"?—That is "Bob, £2 wages."

43658. Then the next item, "Chandler £1 4s."; what is that?—Chandler is a looker-out, and those are his wages.

43659. The looker-out had £1 4s. in wages?—Yes. The next one is another looker-out.

43660. On the opposite side there is "£5—5 to 4." What does that refer to?—That is £5 to £4 on a horse called White Knight for a big race. That is what we call ante-post betting.

19 April 1907.

43661. Who did you have the £5 with?—With a punter. There is the name of the punter.

43662. That is Chandler?—Yes. This would have to be recorded three or four weeks hence.

43663. That man Chandler is not the same man?—Yes, that is the same individual.

43664. One is a scout?—That is quite true, but scouts have bets as well as anybody else, or they may put a bet on for somebody else.

43665. Then that is a bet by yourself with Chandler, one of your scouts?—Yes, that is quite true. His name occurs a lot, because he used to take money for others.

43666. That is an entry that constantly appears (pointing out entry to the witness). Who is Dart?—He is a scout.

43667. And who is that (referring to another entry)?—That is my brother Tom. Sometimes it goes down to "T," but that is my brother.

43668. Is it Tom?—Yes, I am positive.

43669. It is not the same as that word (referring to another entry)?—No, that is Yam.

43670. What is that?—That is a punter whose name occurs many times in the book.

43671. On this page where we have Dart 8s., that is a payment to the scout, and then Chandler 13s. is a payment to a scout?—Yes.

43672. And the next item, "Coppers 4s."?—Yes, that would be actual coins. I never used to give up the coppers. Some days we might have 4s. or 5s. or 3s., but my average used to be about 4s. If I had 5s. or 6s., I had not kept stock of my expenses, and I would say 4s. I used to get 5s. or 4s. worth of coppers a day because they are handy for paying out.

43673. Here you say we have a list of expenditure. You paid 8s. to Dart and 13s. to Chandler, and the next thing is a payment on paper of 4s. with the word "Coppers" against it?—Yes.

43674. You say that is not a payment, although it is placed amongst the payments?—Yes. You see the total here is £32 19s. 6d., and I was trying to make my money tally. I put down the money on the table—what I had taken for the day—and it was not right, so I had to put down the money I paid out, "Dart 8s., Chandler 13s.," and then I found that did not tally, and I said, "I have 4s. worth of coppers," but that did not make it tally, because the sum was short still. Then I went through queries. I made up the day, and I followed on with the queries. It is nothing to do with any payment.

43675. Queries is 5s. 1d.?—That may be. There are papers to show for that. A man may have 2s. 2d. to come and it would go down 2s. 2d., and if it was 1s. 11d. he would only get 1s. 11d.

43676. These queries, I presume, refer to A.L. and Yam?—Yes, they are all queries.

43677. That is money which you have paid to these individuals, but which you were not sure that you ought to have paid?—Yes, I knew they were right, because I was told to pay them on the previous day, but he did not allow me enough money. In the morning I would say, "What are the queries?" and Mr. Platt would say "So-and-so is right," but he may not have given me the money, but I would make the payment.

43678. Then there is another page with a similar thing, "Queries paid, Vice 2s. 1d., Hammond 1s., B. V. 7d., Hat 6d., Scamp 1s., Barker 1s., Lookers-out 4s." What is that?—Those are the scouts.

43679. "Tecs 10s." That is clearly the word "Tecs"?—Yes, I remember the incident. That is a fictitious entry.

43680. That is to say, you were told by Mr. Platt to put this down as a fictitious entry with this word "Tecs"?—That is so.

43681. What did you mean by the word "Tecs"?—Anybody. That is the general term. That would apply to anybody.

43682. What do you mean?—I would put down the word "Tecs," and that would be quite sufficient for his brother-in-law.

43683. Why did you use the word "Tecs"?—If I understand you right you wanted to put down something?—He told me to put down the word "Tecs," and I put it down.

43684. What did you think it meant when you put it down?—I did not take any notice of what it was going down. I put it down at his suggestion, and I did not trouble myself when I was putting it down. I never thought otherwise than putting it down as he told me.

43685. Surely you must have known what the word meant when you put it down?—It meant police, there is no question about that; but it was in this sense, that I knew it did not make any difference what I put down, in a sense, because he told me to.

43686. Would it have been looked upon as not an extraordinary item of expenditure in a street betting operator's account?—It would as far as I was concerned. I had never mentioned it to him. I never suggested it to him, because I do not believe in it.

43687. What is the next item?—"Coffee 1s." We had some coffee.

43688. You say that is not "Coppers"?—No, coffee.

43689. Do you say it is "Coffee 1s."?—Yes.

43690. You say it is not "Coppers"?—No, it could not be that. I should not take out 1s. I do not suppose I would have a shillingsworth of coppers. I should say it was coffee. I used to pay for the tea sometimes, and sometimes Mr. Platt would pay for it. Sometimes it would not go down in the items, but would only go down in the expenses.

43691. There is no doubt about that entry?—That is my brother's handwriting.

43692. Is not that your writing?—No, my brother's. I have got a slight idea.

43693. What is that word. (Referring to another entry.)?—That is "Coppers 4s." There is no question about that.

43694. And the next item?—"Lookers-out 4s." My brother can answer for that. I should not be able to answer for that. I know as a positive fact he did not have the handling of any money so far as I was concerned, because I used to do all the paying out. As said, I used to hand him no money the next day. have never given him any money at all.

43695. The lookers-out there must have had 4s. whoever wrote it down?—There is no question about that. I can give you my explanation, but my brother is here, and I should like him to explain it himself.

43696. Perhaps we had better wait till he comes with regard to that item?—I can give my explanation of it.

43697. Was the word "Tecs" the only word you used for making these fictitious entries?—That did not often occur. There were not many fictitious entries, because I would not have it. I did not hold with it. Platt's brother-in-law was a friend of mine, and I did not feel justified in doing it to tell you the truth. I took it as an act of friendship when he came to me, and I did not feel justified in doing it—in fact, I remonstrated with Platt several times.

43698. When you were writing out these books you would strike a balance. I notice in many places you made the loss or the gain according to whether the day has been profitable or not?—We very seldom struck a balance. We did not take much notice of that.

43699. But I see here there are four days in succession?—Then there was a motive for doing that—a check for his brother-in-law. There is an entry here of 8s., and sometimes there is a note with initials, and sometimes they bet in the name of "D" or "G" or "T."

43700. Let me understand a little more about these coppers. I suppose most punters would punt 1s. or 5s. or 2s. 6d.?—Yes.

43701. You took the slips from them and took the money?—Quite true.

43702. How does it come about that you have so many copper columns?—Sometimes a man will lay out 2s., and he might give 1s. 6d. in silver and 6d. in coppers, but I made it my business to get coppers because we always wanted them of a night time. The odd money is to be paid out, and if a man had 2s. 9d. to come he had to have 2s. 6d. and 3d. in coppers, and I always made it my business to get a certain amount of coppers, so that I would have them for convenience sake at night.

43703. I have not yet understood what your explanation about the coppers is. Tell me again?—My explanation is this, that when striking a balance of a night time—at least not striking a balance but giving an account of the money which I had to give and expenses—supposing I had 4s. over, and supposing I made the money tally right——

43704. We understand your process was this, that you took your money out of your pocket and put it on the table always?—Not always.

43705. But you took your money out of your pocket and you took the slips out of your pockets?—Yes.

43706. The slips were dealt with first of all, and it was somehow found out how much Platt had to pay out to individuals?—Yes.

43708. He would see how much ought to be in your pocket?—Yes, and then he would say "You have given me so much." If I took out enough money and I found there was enough I would not take out any more, because if I was short Mr. Platt would exact it from me and make me pay it. If I was 10s. short by any means I would have to find that money, or I would have to go short of it myself.

43709. Clearly. You had a lot of slips with so much money on each of them, and the sum total of those figures ought to agree with the money you brought out of your pocket?—Yes.

43710. Therefore when you produced that amount on the table you had done your duty?—Yes.

43711. Then having done that tell me exactly what happened with regard to the coppers?—Then I would give him a list of my expenses for the day—what I had to lay out, or what he had had, or what he had spent. He would sometimes spend 5s. or 4s., and that would be reckoned against me. I would have to account for that, and sometimes when I put everything done, he would say "How much coppers have you got," and I would say "4s. coppers" or words to that effect. My average coppers was 4s.

43712. I understood that you put down the papers?—Yes.

43713. Supposing they showed that you ought to be able to produce £5 10s., then you empty your pockets and you cannot produce £5 10s., having spent money on expenses at various places?—Yes.

43714. You produce £4 15s. 6d., then you have to account to him for the balance?—Yes.

43715. You put that down in this book as we have seen it?—Yes.

43716. Now I want to know why amongst those entries there is an entry of "coppers"?—The last resource for me to strike my balance. I would keep my coppers if my balance would total properly, but if my balance of money would not total I should add the coppers in. That would be the last resource for me, practically speaking. After I had tried to total everything up, if I could not make my money balance I would take the coppers out and say I have got so much coppers. I used to take 5s. from the takings, which would be a shilling for myself and 4s. I used to change and get coppers for; that would be a shilling for my own use, which Mr. Platt would know of, and I would get four shillings' worth of coppers. If I had not got four shillings' worth for the night's use I would get them, because they would be wanted at night time, and when I would be totalling up my books I would put down four shillings' worth of coppers so as to make my total stand good.

43717. Then as I understand what you mean now is that in the course of the day in order to be provided with copper coins you changed 4s.?—Sometimes. Sometimes I would not have to change; sometimes I would have it.

43718. And you kept those coppers?—Yes.

43719. Would you keep them separate?—Yes, in my pocket—mostly in my little pocket; it might average about 4s.

43720. Did you put the moneys you took from the punters in a separate pocket?—Yes, I always kept silver and gold separate.

43722. When a punter gave coppers to you you would put those coppers into a separate pocket?—Yes.

43723. Because you kept one pocket for silver and one for gold?—Yes, and one for coppers.

43724. What is this item on this page, "15s." (handing book to the Witness)?—"Tom."

43725. Then "Bob, £2," what is that?—"Bob, £2."

43726. What is that item (referring to another item in the book)?—"Coppers, 10s."

43727. What is your explanation of that?—All in coppers—that would be perhaps Saturday, and I dare say we have more coppers on Saturday than we would have any other day. There is no question of that.

43728. Do you mean you have had to change?—I have changed sometimes and I have had to get as much as a pound's worth of coppers. If I know certain horses are winning at certain prices—such as 11 to 10 or 11 to 8—I practically know how many coppers I want. I shall want rather a lot. Sometimes I want 30s. of coppers. It all depends on the kind of prices the horses are at. That would be an exceptional day, or it might be. I could not say.

43729. According to you this 10s. is what you changed?—No, I may not have changed it; I may have had them that day.

43730. But this is expenditure?—It does not come under expenditure.

43731. Yes, it does?—That was not our mode of doing it. My mode of doing it was, after everything was done I turned out all my pockets of the coppers, because Mr. Platt was very exacting in that way, and he would want the last farthing of me. I turned out my pockets many a time.

43732. If he was so exacting I do not understand how he would have agreed to a system which, as I understand it was this, that if you put down 4s. for coppers you were reducing the profit by that 4s.?—No. I had to pay that out at night. Sometimes I would have 4s. and pay out 4s. 6d.

43733. But this was in addition to what you had to pay out?—That is to do with the day's takings. That is not to do with the night time, but it is the day after starting—when I am handing over the money and accounting for my expenses. I have turned round and told him I had a certain sum in coppers and I had none at all, because I could not make my money tally. I have had to go and get 4s. to make the money tally because I would not turn round and tell him I was short.

43734. But on this occasion you brought him money, and you also said, "Now I have paid or have got to pay 15s. to Tom, £2 to Bill, and £2 to Bob," and amongst those numbers you added on, "And then I have to pay 10s. for coppers"?—Mr. Platt would say to me, "How much have you got to pay?" I would say, "I have to pay one brother 30s., and another brother £2, and Bob £2"—that is myself, because sometimes I used to stop my wages in the daytime, and I would pay some other moneys, and then I would say, "I have 10s. worth of coppers." Sometimes I had not got them, but I would say so.

43735. The result of your saying that was that you came into possession of the coppers, and he did not?—Supposing I was 10s. short on Monday I could not produce that 10s.; I could not tally and I knew he would not check me and say, "Bring out the coppers," so I said "I have 10s. worth of coppers," and he would take my word. But I would have to have those 10s. worth of coppers in the night time for him.

43736. I understood you to say at an earlier stage that Platt himself did the paying out?—Yes.

43737. He took all the money?—He would never pay the coppers out at all.

43738. I understood you to say to the learned Chairman when he was asking you about the transaction that Platt did take all the money?—Except the coppers.

43739. He took all the money; he undertook to pay out all the punters with that money?—Yes.

43740. Did he and you go to meet the punters to pay them out?—Yes, always.

19 April 1907.

43741. Both of you?—I was always present.

43742. Supposing a punter, as in these cases, was owed 3s. 7d. or 3s. 8d. ?—Platt would give 3s. 6d., and I would take out 2d. and give him. It would be cumbersome to have to go down into one pocket, having a handful of silver, to go and find 2d.

43743. Where exactly did you pay these punters?—We used to pay out in a public-house.

43744. And they came round you and you had to do it surreptitiously?—How do you mean?

43745. Privately and quietly?—No, I think it is quite legal to pay out.

43746. You have a regular public-house you go to?—Yes.

43747. Where the punters come for their money to be paid out?—Yes.

43748. That is the process that you say was gone through—he pays the silver and you pay the coppers. —Yes, and he would pay gold. I would only have the coppers. That would only be of a night time. In the day time I would pay out myself, and I would have the money and the book, the balance, and he would have the rest.

43749. Do I understand you to say, to go back to these fictitious entries, that they were done intentionally?—There are one or two there which were made intentionally because I absolutely had to account for the money I gave him. I know they are fictitious, but I could not point exactly to an identical one, because I could not tell you what entries are in the books. When I went through the books I wanted to see if I had mentioned any names of any kind.

43750. I understood you to say to the learned Chairman that the time when you put down these fictitious entries was at the meeting when McCarthy and Platt and you and your brother were present to go through the slips?—Quite true.

43751. And on that occasion if a fictitious entry was made Platt would say to you, "Put it down"?—He would not say then, he would say beforehand.

43752. But would he say that?—When we were going along he would say, "I have had so-and-so; you had better put it down to so-and-so." He would not say that before them, because I would make out a list, and he would see if it tallied, and if it tallied with the money all well and good. That is when I became so suspicious, because he was telling me he was a man of money, and he started having little bits like that off me, and I did not trust him then.

43753. Little bits off you—it was nothing off you, was it?—It was taken from me, and I did not feel justified in giving it to him because I knew it did not belong to me or to him, and I refused to give him certain moneys sometimes, and he left me short sometimes, and that was a grievance with my brother and Mr. Platt. He blamed Platt for leaving me 35s. short one morning in the total, and my brother asked me whether I had been to school, and I said I had, and he said, "You reckon your account up again," and he went through it, and he said, "You have to give him some more money." Mr. Platt told him to mind his own business, and then I went over my account and found he was giving me money short, and he had to hand it over to me.

43754. You told me on one occasion McCarthy asked you about this?—He did not ask me about anything like that.

43755. What was it he asked you about?—He asked me how we got on in the week's racing. He asked me in the beginning of the week to keep an account of how we got on, and I said I would, and I did so. He said to me on the following Monday, "How did we get on last week?" I said, "Very successfully; I think we won about £24." He said, "What!" I said, "I think we won about £24." He said, "Where is Platt?" I said, "Somewhere round the corner." I could see there was something wrong. I said, "I think he has gone round to the other pitch." I sent him round to the other pitch, and in the meantime Platt came round to me. He said, "Has my brother-in-law been?" I said "Yes." He said, "Has he asked you anything?" I said "Yes, how we got on last week." He said, "What did you tell him?" I said, "I told him we won £24 on the week." He said, "Did we—we did not." I said, "How is that?" He said, "There were several papers that you did not know anything about, and they won." He said, "Don't you tell him that I won that amount of money, because these papers have to be paid." I said, "How much did we win?" and he said, "Something like £3 odd." I said, "All right, I shall know when he comes round." When he came round Platt was present, and in his presence I said to his brother-in-law, "I am sorry I was not accurate in keeping the accounts last week—it was £3 odd; there were some papers I had not reckoned in, but," I said, "for the future am I to have all the papers that are taken on this pitch?" and he said "Certainly." I said, "Then any papers that come after time I am not to be accountable for," and he said, "Quite true." I said, "You hear that, Mr. Platt?" I thought his brother-in-law would grasp my meaning, but, of course, he did not.

43756. You never had any conversation with McCarthy about any fictitious entries being made to his detriment?—No, I may have told him. I think I have told him.

43757. This is the first we have heard of it?—I fancy I told him. I would not swear I have not.

43758. Will you tell us what you told him?—No, I could not. It is in my mind that I told him, but I do not know that I can be positive.

43759. Did you keep no other books but these?—None whatever.

43760. All expenses were put down in these little books?—Anything that I had any dealing with. I saw no other books at all.

43761. Platt never told you to make entries of your expenses. Has he ever told you to make an entry of your expenses?—No, he never told me at all—not to keep a general account. I always had to give an account of my day's proceedings to him.

43762. That we have in these books, but you have no other book?—I never saw any other book of any shape or form.

43763. You have no other books?—No.

43764. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) When you first saw Platt about working for him, did he say anything to you about police?—Oh, yes, he said to me, "How do you get on with the police?" I said, "All right, they have not found us out here."

43765. What did you understand him to mean by "How do you get on with the police"?—I understood him to mean were we unfortunate—were we arrested many times. I said, "We were unlucky on Saturday, my brother got caught." I meant to say we were perhaps very fortunate in evading them.

43766. How long had you been evading them?—Some time.

43767. In that division?—Some time.

43768. How long had you been betting in that division?—I should think we had been betting for two years.

43769. You were fortunate as far as the police were concerned, were you not?—No. I think we got twelve convictions in the two years between us. I was not always betting in the streets, because it was my brother. We did not bet that way. There is a brother called Thomas Fisher, and he was the man who did most of the convictions.

43770. When you say twelve convictions, are you counting each conviction on a summons?—No—arrests. Twelve arrests betwen the three brothers.

43771. (Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Thomas was arrested a number of times?—Yes, and he was the principal one who betted in the street for us. We only betted occasionally.

43772. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Were you at the same pitch?—At the same time.

43773. When you went to bet did you go on a pitch where you were well known?—Yes.

43774. I suppose that is necessary so that people should know where to find you?—Yes. We betted in the vicinity. We would not take an exact spot. If we found that a policeman seemed to be troublesome on that spot round that beat, if he happened to be on the beat we would shift to somewhere else, so that we should keep out of his way.

43775. That would be a policeman in uniform?—Certainly.

43776. You could not get out of the way of a policeman in plain clothes like that?—We would trust to our scouts to do that. If the scouts let the man up we were beaten, and we had to go.

43777. Your scouts would know who the police were?—That would be their duty, and it is the duty of every bookmaker's scout to see.

43778. To find out who the police are who are going about in plain clothes?—They do not do that. Supposing you were to go down, you would have a very bad chance of getting near a bookmaker. They might think you were a detective. They judge by the man. If they saw a man rather suspicious looking in that respect the bookmaker would be warned. If they thought he was like a policeman or a detective he would not get down. It would not matter whether he was genuine or not—when I say genuine I mean not a policeman. Many a punter cannot get near a bookmaker for some time; in fact, I had one who said he tried to get down to me for four weeks, and he never could.

43779. He was very persistent?—He lost some money with another man where he was betting.

43780. He tried for four weeks with you, and could not get on?—I do not mean every day, but he could not get down because he was rather a military-looking man, and they would not let him get anywhere near. I was always away when he got near. On one occasion he said to one of the fellows, "I am not a police officer." "No," he says, "I do not suppose you are," but he did not get down all the same.

43781. You mean you were always betting with people who you knew?—Yes.

43782. Always the same people?—We never bet with a man without we get an introduction. If we have one punter he has to introduce another.

43783. How does he introduce him?—He would say, "This man is all right," and we would take his bet off him.

43784. When Platt asked you how you got on with the police, what did you say?—I told him we had been fined very heavily, in the previous division, and been summoned frequently; but I said we had been very successful up to now, and they had not found us out.

43785. How many people do you think there would be betting with you in the day?—I should say 200. That would be over a long time—four hours.

43786. There would be about 200 people come to you in about four hours?—Yes.

43787. More or less in the same spot?—Yes; it is a street; different parts. You could take them in half an hour if you had the chance.

43788. You would have to have a pretty continuous succession of people for that?—Yes, but you could not get that in the street.

43789. Then they come to you, and in each case they would hand you a slip?—Yes, with their money.

43790. That is easily seen, is it not?—No. The punters, as a rule, use their judgment, and we as agents or bookmakers use our judgment. We tell them they will have to have their money rolled up in paper and hand it in in a respectable way, or else we will not take it off them, and we also tell them they have to keep their papers in their pockets and take precautions, and they must not come up to us when there is another man there. They must walk on. We try to take those precautions.

43791. Have you ever heard of bookmakers giving money to the police to avoid being arrested?—I heard Platt say so.

43792. But apart from Platt?—Yes, I heard of a case where I think it was a Police Inspector who was dismissed, or I read of it.

43793. But amongst bookmakers?—We think we are very hardly dealt with in our division, and we seem to suffer very greatly in Clerkenwell.

43794. You have had a fairly good run?—I do not think I have. I have paid over £300 in that short time. We look at it in a different mind to what an ordinary individual does. We think it is very severe. We look upon it as an honest calling, and an ordinary business, and if we do not cause an obstruction we do not see that we ought to be arrested.

43795. When you settled up with Platt I do not quite understand what you were explaining to my learned friend Mr. Dickinson just now about these entries of "Tecs." We start with this that you know quite well what that entry would represent to the ordinary individual?—Quite true.

43796. It would mean that a payment had been made to detectives?—Quite true.

43797. That occurs several times in your books?—Yes.

43798. Are we to understand—I want to see that I follow what you have been saying—that although that entry appears as a payment of detectives, you say it is an untrue entry?—Quite so. If I had paid that to any individual man I should have certainly written his name. I did not know that Platt was going to keep those books, and if I had paid a sum of money I should certainly have entered it in the book.

43799. Is that why you looked through the book to see whether you had put any names in?—Not exactly that. There are several punters betting with me, and in the district there are several names of police officers who represent the names of persons betting on my books. There is the name of Cole. That man has arrested me two or three times. There is another punter betting in the name of Leech with me, and there used to be a punter betting in the name of Barton with me, and there used to be a punter betting in the name of Hammond with me. All these are police officers.

43800. What do you mean by "all these are police officers"?—Police officers in the district where I was betting. They are all police officers. I do not mean that their names are there.

43801. You said that their names are there?—They are punters of mine, and it would be possible to make out that those amounts there were bribes to such individuals as those. It would be suggested.

43802. (Mr. Whitmore.) You mean there is a policeman whose name is Hammond and a punter whose name is Hammond?—Yes, and I had a man named Leech for some time betting with me. I could produce the man who bets in the name of Leech.

43803. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That is why you looked through the book—to see whether you had mentioned any names?—No, not with that object. My object was this. Why I wanted to look through the book was this, to see the different punters who were betting with me. I had a man named Leech who betted with me, and I wanted to see whether he was betting during the time that Platt was with me—not exactly Leech, but it was the different officers. It was quite possible for Platt to turn round and say that these were the individuals, and I wanted to be in a position to produce these individuals if necessary. That is all I wanted to see the books for.

43804. Then when you heard the evidence that Platt had given, you thought that that was how he was going to make it out, or that those were some of the names that he might have handed in?—I absolutely knew that I was the only man in the district with my brother who was betting for Mr. Platt at the time when he was there, and I knew there was nobody else who could have been in contact, as he said, with the police—if you understand that. I was the only man who was betting for him, so therefore the inference was given to me. There was nobody else, because he had no other representative, only my brother and I. He said he had five, but that was false. There was only the two of us. He said at one time he was paying these individuals. Then I went out of my way to see whether he was still betting, because he said he now had these men, and he was paying to police £3 10s. a week. Then I found out he had no other agent, and I found he was referring to me.

43805. And that reference was being made to your books?—Yes.

43806. And that some of the names handed in to us were names which would appear in your books?—Quite true. The names were punters who were betting with me. It took me a long time to try and find out that man of the name of Leech. When that man's name was mentioned it struck me as rather a hard core, and I tried many times to find that man for months and months. He was a regular punter of mine, and he used to spell his name L-e-e-c-h. I tried times out of number to find that man, but I was not successful. There was another man named Stevens, and it is a most remarkable thing that man arrested my brother Thomas Fisher in the name of Stevens.

43807. You went through the book, and you have told us Leech was a punter?—Yes. I did not make any particular notes; in fact, I did not take any notes at all from the books. I did not take a pencil out of my pocket.

43808. Do you know anything about that entry, "Leach, 10s" (handing book to witness)?—No, that is Mr. Platt's writing.

43809. That is the time you were with him?—I could not tell you.

43810. It is at a time when you were with him?—By the entries "Bill" and "Bob" I should say so; but I do not exactly follow this, "Bill £1 10s." and "Bob £1 10s." I cannot follow those amounts. I do not know what they were for, and why the looker-out got £2 10s. I cannot exactly follow that, and "Ins and outs 6s." I do not know what those are.

43811. You can see from the back of it the date when it took place. That was a day when you were betting for him?—Yes. I could not throw any light upon it.

43812. Was Leech betting with you then?—He may have done so. I could not possibly swear.

43813. You knew, of course, without referring to the book that you could find the names of these particular men—Hammond, Cole, and so forth?—Yes.

43814. You knew that they were in the book?—Not necessarily. I knew they were punters. They may not have had a draw. Some punters go a long time without having a win.

43815. Chandler?—I knew Chandler was always on the book, because he had so many bets.

43816. You did not need to look through the book to see whether their names were there. You knew they were there?—I knew they were there positively, but I knew when I looked through these books that these names had been mentioned—the names of Laing and Leach, and I naturally did not know absolutely whether these names had been mentioned amongst the items, because I did not know personally whether you understood the routine of a bookmaker, and I thought if these names were mentioned amongst the ordinary items that you would think that would be proof that it was the officers. I only looked to see if the names were there.

43817. You knew, you have just told me, you had mentioned the names of Laing and Leach in that book?—No, I did not know that. Mr. Platt had mentioned them. These names had been mentioned to the Commission. I went through the books to see if these people were betting with me, and to see if they had any draws during this time they were betting with me. I knew Laing had not, because I never had a punter of the name of Laing, but I knew I had one of the name of Leech. All the time I have been betting I have never had a Laing. It must be an uncommon name, because I have never had it.

43818. I undersand you to say you knew these names were there?—You have misconstrued the meaning of it. You asked me the question, "If I knew that the names of Laing and Leach had been mentioned?" and I said "Yes," but when I said yes I meant to say I knew they were handed in to the Commission.

43819. I did not ask you whether the names of Laing and Leach had been mentioned. It was you who said the names of Laing and Leach had been mentioned?—Yes, because Platt had handed them up to the Commission.

43820. You brought in the names of Laing and Leach. You mentioned them, and you knew that they were there positively in the book. That is the point of the question?—No. I knew the names had been mentioned. I said before, as I told Mr. Dickinson, I never heard of the name of Laing as one of my punters. I never had a punter of the name of Laing not all the time I have been betting.

43821. But go back to the question that I was putting to you, "Tecs." That happened on various occasions, and as I understand that was put down when you were short?—Not exactly when I was short myself. Mr. Platt would have one or two draws from me. It did not occur many times, because I would not tolerate it. It only occurred perhaps on two or three occasions.

43822. Do you mean that Platt had drawn money from you, and that in order to account for it he told you to put it down as a payment to the police?—He said, "Tecs." That would be the meaning.

43823. You have said that you were to enter it as payments to police in order to deceive his brother-in-law?—That is quite true.

43824. Is that what you mean?—That is quite true.

43825. That is quite clear?—Yes.

43826. That is the meaning of all these entries?—In that respect. I have answered for the other entries as regards coppers.

43827. Let coppers alone for the moment. We are dealing with this entry of "Tecs." You mean he was telling you to make the entry?—Yes.

43828. To deceive his partner?—I take it as such.

43829. Did you understand it so then?—He told me it would be all right in the end—whatever he meant by that.

43830. Did you not understand that that was the object of it?—His object was this: 7s. 6d. would only come out of his brother-in-law if it was 15s., because if they were partners he would only lose half of it.

43831. Anyhow, to the extent of that half it would mean that he would be deceiving his brother-in-law?—Yes.

43832. That you understood?—Yes, I distinctly understood that.

43833. And the way of doing it was to represent that payments were being made to the police?—That is quite true.

43834. That was Platt's way of making an entry which would satisfy his brother-in-law, and lead to no further inquiry?—It might do. I do not know what his notion was. That is what I did. They never settled at night. They did their settling not in my sight at all. I do not know how they settled. They never settled in my presence.

43835. Was that ever said to you in the brother-in-law's presence?—Not that I know of.

43836. When at last you had to render an account would the brother-in-law be present?—Yes, invariably.

43837. Do I understand you to say that he told you to put down the word "Tecs"?—Yes.

43838. That is what he said?—Yes, I should say that was it—yes, I will say that he did do so. That would be his term; or he might have said "D.'s," and I might have said, "Put down 'Tecs.'" We would imply the same meaning. It means the same thing.

43839. It means the same—it means detectives?—Yes.

43840. You understood that, and you might have put down "Tecs"—Quite true.

43841. So that the idea of putting it down in that way came from Platt?—Yes.

43842. You are quite clear about that?—I am.

43843. He did not say to you, "Put it down to anything you like"?—Oh, no, that would not do, because I might put down something wrong.

43844. He never would have said that?—No.

43845. Do you know that this is what you said about it when you were examined: "Platt would say to me, 'You have to account for that.' I would say, 'All right.' He would say, 'Put it down anything you like'"?—"Tecs or anything you like."

43846. This is what you swore: "He would say, 'Put it down anything you like,' which I did"?—"Tecs" would be my word.

43847. Why did you not say so when you were asked about this in the first instance, when you were examined by Mr. Muir?—I believe I did.

43848. I have read you the words?—I fancy I did say so.

43849. "He would say, 'Put it down anything you like,' which I did"?—He said, "Tecs or anything you like." I am nearly positive that is what I said in my statement.

43850. I have got your statement. We have the shorthand note of it, and you were asked about these very entries about "Police" and "Tecs," and you were asked by Mr. Muir whether you had any explanation to offer with regard to the entries in the books of "Police" and "Tecs"?—Yes, and that is my answer.

43851. There is not a word about Platt telling you to put it down "Tecs" in it?—At his instigation.

43852. There is all the difference in the world between saying at his instigation and what you were telling us—that you were telling us what Platt told you about this most important item, and what you said to Mr. Muir is that he told you to put it down to anything you like. Is that true or untrue?—That part of it is true, but it has not got it all. I said: "Tecs or anything you like."

43853. Did you say, "Put it down to Tecs or anything you like"?—He said: "Put it down 'Tecs' or anything you like."

43854. Do you represent to us that you said this when you answered Mr. Muir?—I said that.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Mr. Muir is not here, is he?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Mr. Muir is not here, but the gentleman who took a note for him is here, and he says that that is what he did say.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I am reading from the shorthand note.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) But the witness speaks so fast, it is possible there may be a mistake. The gentleman who represents Mr. Muir says he remembers it.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Has he a note of it?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Not in terms.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It is very difficult to take a verbatim note of it.

(Chairman.) What is the note that was taken for Mr. Muir?

(Mr. Ingleby Oddie.) I have this down: "Police or tecs. Sometimes did not get all the money from punters, and put down the deficiency in this way, 'Police or tecs.'"

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That obviously does not touch the point I am upon.

(Mr. Dickinson.) My note is: "Some days I did not get all my money. Platt would say, 'You must account for it.' I put it down as 'Police.'"

43855. I should like to understand what actually took place. What was said about it. We have had two or three accounts from you within the last quarter of an hour. I want you to tell us now and think about it, and just tell us, without running on quite so fast what Platt said to you about this.

(Chairman.) Before going to that, I have a note, which rather bears out the shorthand note, of what this witness said. I put "Police and Tecs—I sometimes could not account for all moneys, so I was told by Platt to put down anything I pleased."

(Mr. Dickinson.) And I took down "Police."

43856. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That is the explanation which you gave when you were asked by Mr. Muir to say how how you came to make the entries in the book of "Police" and "'Tecs"?—Quite so.

43857. Then, according to you, it is not a correct account to say that Platt told you to put it down to anything you liked?—Yes, I say so—"Put it down to ''Tecs,' or anything you like." That is exactly what he told me.

43858. It did not matter, according to him, what you put down?—I put down the things he suggested to my mind.

43859. I thought he said "D—s," and you suggested "'Tecs"?—I say he may have suggested "'Tecs" or "D—s." To tell you the truth, I did not know the entries. When I went through the books I did not look to see that at all; that did not enter my mind in any shape or form. I was only looking for the names of the punters who were betting with me.

43860. Whatever the entry was which you had to make it had to be something which his brother-in-law would pass?—Yes.

43861. That is what you understood?—Yes, something he would pass—something like that. I put down what he told me. That is really the truth.

43862. Now about "Coppers." In the ordinary course when you accounted in the evening for what had happened during the day you would have to show how much money had been taken?—Yes.

43863. Then that would be checked with the slips, and you would have to account for any balance?—The slips would be accounted for, and the money after that.

43864. And would you have to account for any balance of the money every day whatever it was?—Yes.

43865. That would happen, I suppose, every day?—Yes.

43866. Then you would have to account for the balance of the money every day whatever it was?—Yes.

43867. Supposing you had coppers which you had retained. I understand you would have to account for them every day, would you not?—No, not always. Sometimes I would, and sometimes I would have money over more than I had to answer for.

43868. But would you have to account for the coppers which you used to keep every day?—There was practically only one busy day a week, and that was on Saturdays, when there would be about three times as much as on any other day, and on a day like that I always used to arrange to get 4s. or 5s. in coppers on an average day; sometimes I would not get them.

43869. "Coppers" do not occur only on Saturdays?—They do sometimes.

43870. All the entries do not relate to Saturdays?—No, certainly not.

43871. So that there were days when you had to account for coppers to Platt that were not Saturdays?—Yes, I should say so. It would not occur every day, but some days I would be lucky and have money over, and often have a few shillings over. Then I would not have any coppers.

43872. I thought you were always supposed to have some coppers?—Not in the ordinary sense. I had them for my own convenience. I was not supposed to do it. I used to do it.

43873. I notice throughout that wherever you have an entry "Coppers" it is always a round sum?—Yes, I always said that. The average is about 4s. I generally used to keep about 5s. altogether—4s. for coppers and 1s. for myself.

43874. It did not matter how much you had taken. What you accounted for was 4s. Is that right?—Quite true. You will understand this. Sometimes I would not have any coppers at all, and I used to take 5s. out of the takings—1s. was for myself, and I used to change 4s. into coppers myself—sometimes I would, and sometimes I would not, and sometimes it would not be entered at all.

43875. Suppose you had to account at night for money you had taken under this system which you were following, and your slips came to £10, you had got to have £10 except such expenses as you could account for?—Yes.

43876. You put so much gold and so much silver on the table?—Yes.

43877. That has to make up the £10?—Yes.

43878. If you make up with the gold and the silver the £10——Enough.

43879. Enough. Then you do not enter the coppers?—No.

43880. Now supposing you only accounted for £9 10s.?—Then I have to account for the other. There might be one or two queries, or there might be a man owing 1s. or 2s. which he had not paid for his bet, and I would try and make my balance straight, and, as a last resource, I used to rely on the coppers—as a last get out; I used to have that to fall back on. If I was short in the money, I said I have so much "coppers."

43881. Whatever it was in coppers had to go into the fund to make up the money?—Not always.

43882. No, but if you were short and had to account?—Certainly.

43883. Then your 4s. worth of coppers would go to make up the money?—Yes. I would reckon the expenses of the day in every shape and form, and, as a rule, I would add the coppers at last.

43884. How many scouts did you employ?—Sometimes two—two on an average, and sometimes three.

43885. They would know the names, I suppose, of most of the police officers who were on private duty when you had been on a pitch for any time?—They would make it their business, I should think, to do so.

43886. They would tell you, I suppose, "Look out; here comes" So-and-So?—Quite so. We could rely on them.

43887. If they knew the name of the man who was coming they would give you a hint and away you would go?—We never knew the name of a uniformed man.

19 April 1907.

43888. You do not want to know the name of a uniform man?—No, we would not want to see him.

43889. Besides, you would not want telling he was a policeman at all?—No, we could see him.

43890. The scouts would give you this indication. I want to understand why it was you went to the police station and asked for the detective-sergeant?—I never did anything of the sort. I sent the scout Chandler to do that. I will tell you exactly how it occurred.

43891. You sent to the detective-sergeant?—Yes. I did not know it was the detective-sergeant. I will tell you how it exactly occurred. I was going on with my ordinary day's work; I was still betting when this Commission came on for my present governor. It was pointed out to me in the papers, and I looked at it, and read it over, and what struck me was that Platt made a statement before the Commission that he had (that means he had at present) five representatives in the G Division, and that he was paying the police £3 10s. a week. When I saw "Platt," I thought surely that must be the Platt that was with me, and I became rather indignant to think that a man who had run away with money belonging not to me but to my punters, should dare to come here to make a statement to that effect. I thought to myself, "I will see into this." I had to go through my ordinary business, make the papers up, and pay the punters out, and at about quarter or half-past nine that night as I was going, I said to the scout Chandler, "Who are the heads of the police in this district?" He said, "I think Wright and Leach, or Hammond." I think he mentioned the name of Hammond as well. I said, "You tell them I want to see them to-morrow on the City Road bridge at 12 o'clock." I had not seen him any more that night nor the next day. I went and kept the appointment on the bridge, but previous to doing that I went down to King's Cross Police Station. I did not exactly know where these men came from. I was going to go in there and I saw a detective. I anticipated he was a detective by his build. I spoke to him, and said, "Are you a police officer?" He said, "Yes." I said, "Well, I am a bookmaker, and worked for that man who has been before the Commission," and I said, "What he says is false. What is the best thing to do?" He said, "The best thing to do is to see the Commissioners or the solicitors." With that I came direct from him to Mr. Muir's chambers, and from there I went to the City Road bridge to see the officers.

43892. When you went to the City Road Bridge and met them what happened?—I accosted them, because I knew them by sight; I knew practically the whole three; I knew Leach by sight and I knew Wright by sight. He had me under arrest or participated in it. I thought it was he who arrested me. I knew Laing by the name of Jerry Chandler. I did not know him by the name of Laing. This is what I said—I said, "I am Fisher the bookmaker." I did not tell them where I was betting. I said, "I have come here to tell you that this man who is before the Commission has made a statement to the Commissioners which is absolutely false. He says he has five agents now in the G Division, and that he is giving the police £3 10s. a week." I said, "This is absolutely false, because he ran away with my money, and I do not believe he has one agent, let alone five." I think they said, "What has that to do with us?" I said, "Well, one of your names may have been mentioned" (I may have said "some" or "one," because on one occasion one of my scouts ran up to me and mentioned two of the men in the Division—Leach and Wright)—"and if I have caused you any inconvenience through my fault I am very sorry."

43893. Did you communicate with any other police station?—No.

43894. Or police officer?—No, only those two different stations. They both came from different stations. I was going into the station first when I met this officer outside, and if I had not seen him I should have gone in.

43895. And then you wrote to the Secretary of the Commission?—Yes.

JOSEPH WILLIAM FISHER, sworn.

J. W. Fisher.

43896. (Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I think you are a brother of the last witness, are you not?—Yes.

43897. I think you have been a bookmaker's agent in the same line of business as your brother?—Yes.

43898. For how many years have you been carrying on that business?—As a bookmaker's agent since about 1906, but from 1903 I had an interest with my brother in a book of our own.

43899. Have you been arrested on more than one occasion?—Yes.

43900. And fined?—Yes.

43901. In which police division have you done this betting?—In the G Division.

43902. All the time?—Yes.

43903. When was the first occasion that you ever saw Platt?—I cannot fix the exact date, but it was on a Monday morning. I asked for an introduction through his brother-in-law, who I knew personally. I thought if we could come together—me and his brother-in-law—it would, no doubt, improve our position, and we might have a good connection. I sent word that I would like to see him, and he came one Monday morning with Mr. Platt and met me near Sutton Street. At that time I did not know who Mr. Platt was.

43904. What conversation did you have with them on that occasion?—He asked us the position we were in, and I gave it to him as well as I could. In arranging terms he said, "What do you think—if I give you £2 a week and a third of the profit would you think that would be satisfactory?" I said that would do nicely. I said, "If you will come to my brother—he is just round the corner—and see him as well and just settle it, no doubt it will be all right."

43905. Did you go round and see your brother?—Yes.

43906. Is that the one we have seen here?—Yes.

43907. What occurred then?—He asked almost a similar question of him as he did of me, and got about the same answer.

43908. Then did you begin to work for him?—Yes.

43909. When did you commence?—I did not take slips the first week. My brother took the slips. I went about with him as one of the governors.

43910. With Platt?—Yes.

43911. Did your brother begin on that Monday?—Yes.

43912. He took slips that week, did he?—Yes.

43913. But you did not?—No.

43914. When did you begin to work?—I think a little over a week after.

43915. Were the arrangements made as to the amount you were to receive on the first occasion or not?—On the first occasion.

43916. Were those arrangements afterwards altered or not?—To speak the truth, I very seldom got a week's wages, and I never saw any of the profits, because Platt took a dislike to me because I caught him cheating.

43917. What was the arrangement as to the amount that you and your brother would have. How much were you to have?—I was to have £2 a week, and the profits were to be shared between Mr. Platt, Mr. McCarthy, and myself and my brother. I think I was to have 40s. or 50s., I will not be sure which is accurate.

43918. From that time, when you began to take slips, did you go on taking the slips for him for some time?—Yes.

43919. Where did you stand—at the same pitch as your brother or at another pitch?—No, at another pitch, about 200 yards away.

43920. Did Platt come and see you every day?—Yes.

43921. What was the course of business between you and him?—He used to come down my end about half an hour before racing, and he would stop with me until just the first race, and then he would run away from me up to the other stand to get the papers in time from my other brother.

43922. What became of him then?—Then he would either come back for my papers or I would have to send somebody else; but the majority of times he would be up with my other brother near Sutton Street.

43923. After he had taken the papers what happened?—About the first week after he had taken the papers and the money he would take them away with him, and I would not see him till the following morning. I would have a list made out with my brother, and the amount of money I had to pay out at my end I would receive and go about my business.

43924. But when would you settle up with Platt?—After racing.

43925. Take the first week you worked for him. You have told us what he did. He would come and take the papers?—Yes.

43926. Would he take the money, then, at the same time as he took the papers?—No, not until we went home.

43927. Then you would remain on the pitch and he would go away?—Is that right?—Yes.

43928. Then did you meet him again in the evening?—Yes.

43929. Where did you meet?—We met at a public-house where we used to pay out.

43930. Was that for the purpose of settling up?—Yes.

43931. Would your brother be there at the same time?—That is so, to settle up with the punters—With the people that had money to come. But after the first week we had to settle up after racing was over at home with Platt.

43932. What did you do the first week with regard to Platt? Did you not settle each day with Platt?—I did not take any papers the first week. I walked about doing nothing.

43933. I am speaking of the first week you did take papers?—I think we went home—to a certain place—and then after racing was over we had to turn out the slips and the money on the table, and Platt counted them up.

43934. They would be counted up with Platt?—Yes.

43935. Would that take place every evening?—Yes.

43936. Would your brother be present at that time?—Yes.

43937. Would there be a separate settling up with you and a separate settling up with your brother, or how did you do it?—Very seldom. Sometimes I gave my brother the slips and gave him the money, and we had one general settling up. Sometimes I would have to make out a little slip separate for myself and settle up with Platt.

43938. Did you keep any separate book of your own?—No.

43939. Did you sometimes make entries in the book which your brother kept?—Yes.

43940. How long did you go on working for him?—I went on until the day he ran away with the payments, the same as my brother.

43941. I will just ask you about these policemen. Did you know Sergeant Laing at the time you were working for Platt?—No.

43942. Did you know him by sight?—I knew him by sight as Sergeant Chandler or Jerry Chandler, as they used to term him, but never as Mr. Laing.

43943. You now know that the real name of the man whom you used to know as Sergeant Jerry Chandler is Laing?—Yes.

43944. Had you ever spoken to him?—No.

43945. Did you ever pay him any money?—Never.

43946. With regard to the other man, Leach, did you know him by sight?—By sight.

43947. Did you know what his name was?—Yes, I think I did.

43948. You knew him by the name of Leach?—By the name of Leach.

43949. Have you ever given any money to him?—No, never.

43950. I rather think you are the brother whom Platt says he saw give 10s. to one of these men?—Never in my life.

(Mr. Platt.) No, it was Robert.

43951. (Mr Eldon Bankes.) Do you know the man Cass?—Yes.

43952. Do you know him both by sight and name?—Yes, and of all the men in the G. Division Cass was the man we most dreaded, and Platt and myself, when we heard the name, had either to run away from him or to suspend operations for the day.

(Chairman.) Mr. Platt, do you wish to ask the witness any questions?

43953. (Mr. Platt.) Yes, sir. When you were first introduced to me, you did not tell me how much you owed on the pitch?—Pardon me, I did.

43954. So that on the Saturday night at the end of the first week when I found the expenses heavy I asked you what you were going to do, as you had been walking about all that week and had not taken the slips. I asked you what you were going to do. Your brother and you conversed for a few minutes with one another and then you proposed that you should bring me a list of monies you were owing in White Horse Alley, and I said when I had seen that list I would tell you whether I should start you back on that pitch?—You were told on the Monday, on the very day that you came to take us over, how much money was owing on both pitches.

43955. You did not know yourself?—We did not know to the exact money, but we gave it up to a certain amount.

43956. You did not know to pounds?—Yes, we did.

43957. It was a fact on the first day's slips, when the monies ought to have tallied between £13 and £14, only between £6 and £7 came to light?—I have only got your word for it.

43958. I have the figures here. I think the date is May 7th. You are the man who made most of the entries in those books. Would it not have been as easy for you to have put them down to anything else—to "Police" and "Tecs" and "L——g"—as to put down the punter's name?—I put down whatever you dictated.

43959. You have known McCarthy for 20 years, and you had not known me many days, and still you are coming here to insinuate that I got you to do wrong with the books?—Yes, I knew McCarthy for 20 years.

43960. Went to school with him?—Yes.

43961. A good fellow?—I am very sorry for the day I ever came into contact with you.

43962. You and your brother are insinuating that I was going to do wrong with him?—You were not sober. You were suffering from the D.T.'s nine days out of ten.

43963. You heard your brother give that evidence?—You know I came to you on a Sunday morning when I wanted the money for the punters. You said, "Excuse me, Bill; I am only getting over a severe day's D.T.'s, and I will meet you at Covent Garden with the money." Was I there?

43964. You are a teetotaller?—I ask you the question—was I there? How many times have I tried to find you?

43965. You might think a man suffered from delirium tremens if he had a glass of bitter?—You are the best judge of that.

43966. I was always sufficiently sober to check each and every one of your papers to see that each and every man was put down in the book correctly, and in all instances the same day. I was always sober enough to check all monies and check all papers?—If you were sober enough to do that, why would you leave my brother there in the morning and tell me to mind my own business and not cast up the book which had nothing to do with me? And how many times did it occur?

43967. Once?—To my knowledge, the first time I checked it, then I cautioned you——

(Chairman.) You must confine yourself to answering questions; and you, Mr. Platt, must ask questions and not make statements.

43968. (Mr. Platt.) Your brother says we started in 1903. How do you account that you lost your money?—That has nothing to do with you.

43969. (Chairman.) Did you keep an account during 1903 and 1904?—No, I did not. In that business you do not really keep an account. You pay up day by day, and if you are like, your own governor you do not take a note at the end of the week.

43970. Your brother told us that he and you between you had £200 capital which you were going into this business with?—Yes, that is right.

43971. He told us he kept no books. Did you not keep any books?

43972. You are the elder brother?—No, I am the younger brother.

43973. But you got one-third of the profits, I understand?—I never saw any.

43974. You were to get one-third of the profits made by Platt and McCarthy and yourself. You were a principal rather than an agent?—Yes.

43975. In 1905 I mean?

(Mr. Platt.) You started in 1903. Your brother informed the Commission that he lost his money over a horse called Victor Wild. That was in 1897?

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) No, that is not correct. He said that a lot of bookmakers lost their money over a horse called Victor Wild, and that they lost their money over a horse called Wet Paint. He was only giving an explanation that other bookmakers lost money over a horse and they could not pay, and that is what happened to them.

43976. (Chairman.) Are you the elder or the younger brother of the Fisher who has been examined by us to-day?—I am the younger brother.

43977. Were you in Court while he gave an account of the family and his career?—Yes.

43978. And more or less an account of your own career also?—Yes.

43979. Is that account accurate?—Yes.

43979*. Did you, when you and he started together on this capital of £200 in January, 1903, have one pitch or two pitches?—One pitch.

43980. And that was the one near the Sutton Arms?—No, that was the one in Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell Green.

43981. Down to the time that you came across Platt you and your brother then carried on the business at Aylesbury Street pitch. Is that so?—Part of the time until we got the summonses, and then we had to find new quarters.

43982. Where did you go then?—We went in the Sutton Arms.

43983. Your pitch was near the Sutton Arms when you found yourself broke in 1905?—Yes.

43984. Then you met Platt, I understand?—We did not meet him exactly when we were broke. We tried to struggle along as best we could; we did not like to give in after losing a little and being years at it.

43985. You were on the verge of having to give up the business when you met Platt, were you not?—Yes.

43986. At least so I understood from your brother, and your brother told me he gave us an accurate account. I am not taking it in great detail?—At that time, in May, 1905, he had only one pitch, and that was the pitch near the Sutton Arms. We had really two; one was like a quiet pitch, where there was not so much business done. What we called the pitch was the one called Sutton Arms, where the money was really taken.

43987. Up to that time did each of you go out on racing days, one to one pitch, the Sutton Arms pitch I will call it, and the other to the quiet pitch?—Yes.

43988. That was your method?—Yes.

43989. You were carrying on the business jointly, then?—Yes.

43989*. Then it is common ground you met Platt?—Yes.

43990. How long had you known Platt?—I never saw him in my life till that day.

43991. But McCarthy you were acquainted with?—Yes.

43992. Is there any truth in the allegation of Platt that you knew McCarthy very well, and had been at school with him?—I believe I had been at school with him; I believe I had known him for a number of years, although I did not come in contact with him so very much.

43993. (Mr. Whitmore.) In Ireland?—I believe I had been at school with him.

43994. In Ireland?—No, not in Ireland.

43995. (Chairman.) After he came to England?—Yes.

43996. That was at the Italian School, Hatton Garden?—Yes.

43997. So that on and off you had been seeing McCarthy for many years?—Yes.

43998. The arrangement was, I understood, that you were to receive a share of the profits?—Yes.

43999. Why was that distinction made between you and your brother?—I got the introduction really, and I went to see McCarthy, and I put it to him. It was really Platt's suggestion that I should get a third of the profits and £2 a week for looking after the thing.

43999*. Were you here when I examined your brother as to the way in which the accounts were settled up?—Yes.

44000. He admitted that it was the practice if, for instance, he had put a bet on for Platt with another bookmaker, to hoodwink McCarthy by putting down any entry that he pleased or "Tecs" or 'Coppers." Did you hear him say that?—Yes. Platt has made him make one or two bets to my knowledge.

44001. Follow me a little further, please. You used to be present at the settlement?—Yes.

44002. You heard your brother tell me that when he was short of money he put down anything that Platt told him?—Yes.

44003. That was the effect of his answer. When I asked him why was he short of money, he said sometimes it was because he had taken 1s. or 2s. for refreshment for himself. On another occasion, he said, it might be Platt and he had dined together somewhere, and sometimes Platt brought a friend, and he said that would be the reason for the shortage. Then he gave as another instance the instance that he had put a sovereign at Platt's request on a horse with another bookmaker, and he said that was another reason for shortage. That occurred, at any rate, three times, he said. You heard him say that?—Yes.

44004. Your brother also said that he knew that McCarthy was being deceived, and he said: "I remained silent because I did not want to lose my governor"?—Yes.

44005. And he admitted that he knew he was behaving wrongly?—Yes.

44006. You were present all this time, and knew what was going on?—No.

44007. Then were you deceived, too?—You see I was not at the pitch with them. I used to have to make my collection elsewhere. I would have to send my papers and my money up to the pitch where Platt and my brother Robert were standing. The consequence was I would meet them sometimes after racing was over, and go home with them, and often they have gone home without my knowing it. They have had my money and the papers.

44007*. Your brother told us you had helped to make up the account, and that there was one account?—That is quite right.

44008. You were receiving a weekly wage from Platt and McCarthy?—Yes.

44009. Or you ought to have been receiving it?—Yes.

44010. And your brother was, too?—Yes.

44011. At this settlement which took place every evening of a racing day you were all four present?—Yes, nearly always; there might be a few exceptions.

44012. Your brother admitted that when he put down "Tecs" in the hearing of McCarthy he put it down, and he knew that McCarthy was being deceived, because no money had been paid by him to detectives. You were present, according to your own account?—Yes.

44013. Did you know then that no money had been paid to detectives?—I knew, as far as I was concerned, never a penny had been paid to them.

44014. Did you assume that that was accurate when you heard your brother say "Tecs 10s.," or whatever it was?—I might have treated it in an off-handed manner. I really never took much notice, because, to tell you the truth, they did all they possibly could—at least, Platt did—to oust me from the business, and I could not have a say in the matter at all.

44015. I do not know. You had a third share. If your brother was deceiving McCarthy he may have been deceiving you. I want to understand this from you. When you heard the word "Tecs" uttered in your presence, and the word "Tecs" was written down in the book by your brother, did you know what it meant?—I did not know what it meant at all.

44016. Did you not even know it meant detectives?—No. I knew it could not mean detectives because, as far as we were concerned, all the time we had been there, it was our duty to keep out of their way, and always run away from them.

44017. But did it not occur to you that that was being put down in the book under the head "Expenses," and meant that your brother had paid so much to detectives?—You see, I very rarely ever saw the books. My day's work was made out on a little slip from that book, and if I wanted to look at the book Platt would turn round and tell me what had it to do with me, and he would take the book away, and I could never get a chance to look at it.

44018. But the book had been made up in your presence, according to your brother's evidence?—Sometimes. Sometimes I would be downstairs having my tea.

44019. You may have been out for a moment or two, but you must have known what was going on. You know he told us the slips were put into two heaps?—Yes.

44020. One heap of slips as to which the horses backed had lost was put on one side, as there was nothing due to the punters, and the money kept, and another heap of slips containing the names of the punters who had won?—Yes.

44021. And in your presence the amount due to each punter was entered on the slip. That was the method?—Entered on the slip first, and then in the book.

44022. Then when that was all over the money was counted and compared with the total of the money to be paid as entered on the slips?—Yes.

44023. Then, according to your brother's account, if there was a shortage it had to be accounted for in McCarthy's presence by your brother or by you yourself?—Is not that what took place?—Yes.

44024. Then when you heard of such a thing as "Tecs" being put down, and "Coppers," you were interested in the matter, were you not?—No.

44025. You were entitled to one-third of the profits?—Yes, but you understand the first week I never took any papers.

44026. I am not on the first week. You know very well, after the first week the system was changed. The system which I have been describing is a system upon which you worked from the end of the first week down to the 30th June. Never mind about the first week?—On the Saturday, as Platt informed you, he wanted to know what I was going to do—was I going to get my money for walking about; and from that Saturday he let me have very little to do with the business, and unless I went and got some papers and took them he practically wanted to throw me out of the business.

44027. I see what you mean. Your suggestion is that your brother went to the Sutton Arms' pitch?—Yes.

44028. And I understand you went on the other pitch?—Afterwards.

44029. But you had to account for what took place at your pitch in just the same way?—At first, on my pitch, it was so small that it did not matter, and I threw the papers and the money in with my brother's, and he totalled it up in one. I was not given a chance of being an interested party in the business.

44030. What did you think was the meaning of it when your brother entered "Tecs"?—I really did not take any notice of it.

44031. Did you know what it meant?—No.

44032. That is what you wish us to understand?—That is right.

44033. Did you also write a good deal in the books yourself?—Yes, I have had to make up my books on many occasions.

44034. I do not mean to make up the books; I mean to make up a book like this at the end of the day with the names of the punters who had won, for instance?—Yes.

44035. And making an account of the expenses which explained any shortage, or the queries which explained any shortage?—It was very seldom I had to make up an account of any shortage. I never touched the books unless Platt asked me to make them up.

44036. Then you wrote in his presence?—Yes.

44037. Is that the case as to all the entries in the books? I think you examined them with your brother?—No, I did not see the books.

44038. Did you not come to the office of the Commission to see them?—No.

44039. How many times had you been arrested from 1903 down to June, 1905?—From 1903 to 1905 I did not really take an active part as regards the taking of the papers and the money. My brother Thomas was the man who used to stand in the streets and take the money.

44040. Were you arrested?—Yes. I have been convicted, I think, three times since 1904. I will not be sure, but twice or three times.

44041. When was the first conviction against you?—When I was summoned, I think, in 1903.

44042. When was the second time?—I was summoned in 1904, and I was taken down in 1905 and 1906.

44043. An interval of nearly a year?—Yes.

44044. When were you arrested for the third time?—On the Saturday before I met Platt.

44045. That was in May, 1906?—Yes. On the Saturday previous to Platt coming on Monday morning I was arrested.

44046. Those are three times you yourself have been convicted?—Yes.

44047. How many times has your brother Thomas been convicted?—I expect he has been taken about ten or twelve times.

44048. Between the same period—January, 1903 down to 1906?—Yes, I expect so.

44050. (Chairman.) In different names?—Yes.

44051. What names did he adopt, do you remember?—I could not say: it might be any name he might be taken in—the first name that would come to his mind.

44052. I think you told Mr. Eldon Bankes you were not at all acquainted with either Laing, Leach, Cass, or any of the other officers in the Division?—No, I was not acquainted with them at all.

44053. You knew them by sight?—Yes. As I have been arrested I might have seen them in court when I paid my fine.

44054. Were you quite accurate when you said you never knew Laing under the name of Chandler?—I never knew Laing until the 6th August.

44055. Never knew him under the name of Chandler?—I knew him under the name of Chandler; I never knew him as Laing.

44056. You always knew him as Chandler?—Yes.

44057. There was a scout of that name, was there not?—Yes, we had a scout of the name of Chandler.

44058. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did I understand you to tell the Chairman that you did not know the meaning of "Tecs"?—I did not take any notice of it; it did not trouble me. I may say I was unconcerned in the matter; I did not take any trouble.

44059. But you know the meaning of it?—Certainly, I know the meaning of it.

44060. Did you know what the meaning of the entry was?—As far as my memory will serve me I cannot recollect noticing "Tecs" or hearing "Tecs."

44061. Then do you mean you did not know that "Tecs" appeared in this book?—I do not think I did know that "Tecs" appeared in that book; I was not sure. I would not swear that I remember seeing it or not.

44062. There is no doubt about how it appears. It looks as if it meant that payments were made to detectives, does it not?—As you say, on the face of it it might.

44063. Look at the book. There does not seem much doubt about it, does there? "Lookers-out, 4s.," or whatever it is; "Tecs, 10s." Without any explanation that would look as if 10s. had been paid to detectives, would it not?—I knew, as far as I was concerned, and I may speak for my brother, we never gave the "Tecs," as they are termed, anything.

19 April 1907.

44064. If you had seen that entry you would have had very little doubt what it meant?—According to the way it is there—"Tecs, 10s."

44065. That would mean that 10s. had been paid to detectives. That is what it would mean to anybody without an explanation?—According to the reading of it.

44066. Look at the next entry there (that is in your brother's handwriting, is it not) after what I gave you—"Lookers-out, Tecs." Read that word?—It is "Copper" or "Coffee."

44067. It looks undoubtedly like "Copper,' does it not?—I should not like to decide either way.

44068. You see how the two p's are made. There does not seem much doubt that those are "p's," and not f's?—That first "f" is rather like that one.

44069. Here is another entry. That is "Copper," is it not, or do you think that is "Coffee"?—No, that is not "Coffee."

44070. That is "Copper"?—That is "Copper." It does not refer to the police.

44071. We will see in a moment. "Copper" does not mean the police, you say?—No.

44072. "Lookers-out" means money you were paying out?—I never used to pay it out; I never used to pay any money to lookers-out. My brother Bob had to settle all those matters.

44073. Do you mean you never made any entry if you had anything to do with it?—The entry was made when we were sitting at the table, and Platt would say, "Start entering up."

44074. Then you would start entering up?—Yes.

44075. Is that entry in your handwriting?—Yes.

44076. "Coppers 4s., lookers-out 4s."?—Yes.

44077. Have you any recollection of those items?—I am not sure that I can call it to mind. It is made in a scroll; it was very likely done in an idle moment when I have been sitting down. My brother may have said "Coppers 4s." and "lookers-out," and I may have made a scroll round it.

44078. Do you mean that in an idle moment you may have put a scroll round it just for fun?—Yes. It had no meaning. It had a meaning as far as this business was concerned. He may have said "Coppers 4s." and "Lookers-out 5s," and I may have put it down and made a little scroll like that round it.

44079. Do you mean the scroll was made in an idle moment or the entry?—The scroll was made in an idle moment, but the scroll must refer to some business on that day.

44080. So I should assume "Lookers-out, 4s." meant that that had been paid out?—Evidently.

44081. And "Coppers"?—That must refer to my brother, because I never had to pay the lookers-out and never had to call for 4s. coppers. You see, I would not be left with 4s. coppers, or have to pay lookers-out 4s. It would not refer to me; it would have to refer to some business done on that day.

44082. Do you know to what that entry in your handwriting refers?—The best explanation I can give of it is——

44083. I wish you would answer my question first. Do you know to what it refers?—I cannot call it to memory exactly.

44084. Do you mean you do not recollect anything about it?—I would not be sure; I would not like to say; I am not positive on it; all I know is I have never paid 4s. for coppers, or received 4s. for coppers, or paid 4s. for lookers-out, or received 4s. for lookers-out.

44085. It is quite clear that means a payment out?—No.

44086. What does it mean if it is not 4s. paid to lookers-out?—In that case it might mean that.

44087. What else can it mean?—I cannot say.

44088. It cannot mean anything else, can it?—I cannot say; I am not sure.

44089. But if you can, suggest anything else it means, tell us. What I am putting to you is that that entry there would indicate that 4s. had been paid to lookers-out?—Yes, it would indicate that in all probability.

44090. The next entry, "Coppers, 4s.," follows immediately upon it. Without the explanation that you or your brother give, that would appear also to be a payment out, would it not?—No, not necessarily.

44091. Then why should it follow that "Lookers-out, 4s." does?—That amount of money may have been accounted for on that day—4s. coppers and 4s. lookers-out. It is easy enough to anyone who understands the business or the book.

44092. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do you know what the expression "Ins and outs" mean?—No, not to the best of my belief.

44093. You say you were not paid by Platt, but you got your weekly payment?—Not always; he used to cut it down.

44094. I see "Bill, £1 10s.?—That is quite right.

44095. That is not the only amount you were entitled to?—No.

44096. Did you ever see this book that was kept by Platt? Just look at that page. You will see the entry, "Bill" and "Bob." "Bob, £16 3s.; Bill, £3 12s." Then down below £6 7s. Those, I take it, to be moneys received from you?—Yes.

44097. In what way did you pay Platt moneys?—When the connection got better I had to settle up in the same way as my brother. I had to take the money up to Platt, and then at night-time I should have to count out the money in the same way as my brother counted the papers. The money on the papers I would have to account for from my pocket.

44098. In accounting for the money that you had received, did you have to account for any expenditure?—No, very seldom; I had nothing to pay. We only had one looker-out. My brother used to be with me. It would not come to more than 1s. or 2s. a day. Anything else used to have to come out of my brother Bob's hands.

44099. As to these amounts that were received by you there was no balancing up as far as you were concerned; you produced the money and the slips?—Then in the morning I got a little slip to pay out by. My brother gave me that. Mr. Platt never gave it to me.

FORTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Wednesday, 1st May 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
WILLOUGHBY HYETT DICKINSON, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. ST. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Sir ALBERT DE RUTZEN, sworn.

Sir A. De Rutzen.

44100. (Chairman.) You are the Chief Magistrate at the present time at Bow Street?—Yes.

44101. I need hardly ask you, you have had a very long experience upon the Metropolitan Bench?—Very long, I can assure you.

44102. I think you have sat at some time or other at every police court in London?—Off and on at every police court on many occasions.

44103. Would you like to make a statement yourself in regard to the matters relevant to the terms of our inquiry, or would you like me to ask you some questions?—I should much prefer your asking me any questions which I will endeavour to answer to the best of my power.

44104. I think you have had a communication from us which contained the terms of reference in our warrant?—Yes.

44105. You see from that that we are asked to inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged, with power to make recommendations thereon. I should like you, if you can, to tell us in general what you conceive to be the duties of a constable in regard to those cases?—Shall I begin with drunkenness?

44106. Yes?—I need hardly say it is the duty of a constable when he sees anybody drunk and incapable or drunk and making a disturbance to take him to the station, and when the individual is taken to the station the police have a duty to perform, and that is to make inquiries as to the time and place, and so forth, where he was found to enable them to take the charge at the station. Then in the ordinary course of things the case comes before us. I do not know whether you would like me to say what our ordinary course of practice is when the case does come before us?

44107. If you please?—When the matter comes before us, we will say it is a charge of drunkenness, probably the only evidence against the man is one constable. That is in a great majority of cases. In the great majority of cases the man immediately admits that he was drunk, and so far as that is concerned the case may be said to be ended except to inquire as to what is known about him. If he denies that he was drunk and no doctor was called, he is always asked whether he would like to have the Inspector who took the charge at the station called. If he does wish that, the case is invariably put back for the attendance of the Inspector. If he has been seen by a doctor, then he is also asked whether he would like to have the doctor called. If he says that he would not care about either being called, my practice is invariably to send for the Inspector who took the charge at the station, whether he wishes it or not. I then get the evidence of the Inspector, and if they both agree I have not the faintest doubt the case is proved. That is with regard to drunkenness. Now with reference to disorder, it would be almost impossible to go through all the cases which arise out of disorder in which a police constable charges a man. Of course, it depends on what the nature of the disorder is, and if it is a case of drunk and disorderly it is disposed of in the same way in which, as I have just said, cases of ordinary drunkenness are. If a man who is charged is not prepared at that time with any evidence which he wishes to call, he is always put back to enable him to call that witness, and the police always are perfectly ready to get that witness to attend. The case is then disposed of on its merits, and if necessary the man is sentenced, but every opportunity appears to be given him at the station, so far as we can learn, to get any witness he pleases, and he is given the same opportunity when he comes before us. That is only touching on the fringe of disorder, because the cases of disorder are so innumerable and the facts are so different one from the other that very often it becomes a somewhat difficult duty to perform to find out where the disorder began and where it ended. Generally it ends at the station, but it is very difficult, and I will not say anything about what happens when it comes before us, because that entirely depends on the particular circumstances of each particular case. Then, subject to any questions which you may wish to ask me about disorder, I will pass on and say just a few words about solicitation. That is a matter that is dealt with under the Police Act as well as the Vagrancy Act. Under the Police Act the words are: "A prostitute loitering about in the streets and behaving in a way to the annoyance of the inhabitants and passengers." Now, in those cases where they are brought up and charged under the Police Act it generally depends entirely on the evidence of the constable. In my long experience I have hardly known any case where a man has thought proper to come forward simply to give evidence against a woman for simple solicitation. I have a hazy sort of recollection of some cases, one or two, I think, in a great many years, in which a man has thought proper to come forward; but, so far as my memory serves me, it was in a case where it went beyond solicitation, and became a matter of molestation or assault, or something of that description. Now, the evidence of the constable is taken, and if it is under the Vagrancy Act, which is somewhat similar in words, although the words there are "indecent behaviour," the evidence of the police-constable in proving it under the Vagrancy Act is that he sees a woman stopping a man, putting her arm inside his arm, and if he pushes her away, or, as in many cases happens, complains to the constable himself of the behaviour of that woman and he cautions her, as is generally done, and she goes on, and she does the same with another man, he probably takes her into custody. The evidence of one man is sufficient, because the Act of Parliament goes on to say: "Upon the evidence of one credible witness or more." Now, the evidence of the constable very often, and indeed in almost all cases, on the face of it, appears to be perfectly and honestly given. If the woman denies being a prostitute (and there are very few cases in which they do), or if she wishes to have somebody sent for (this is what goes on in Court), the police are immediately asked to obtain the evidence of this witness, and if the witness cannot be called on that day, it is simply adjourned, as I have known in many instances, not by remanding the person charged in custody, but upon their own recognisances if they wish to make the application. I have had applications made to me, and I have never forgotten to grant them, but I have often seen that the witness whom they want to have the case adjourned for never turns up at all, and therefore we have it left upon the evidence as it originally came before us, which in 99 cases out of 100 leaves the case proved beyond a shadow of a doubt. Then the case is dealt with according to what is known of the woman. The constable is asked, "Have you ever seen this woman before?" "Yes, she has been to my knowledge walking the streets for the last six months," or anything.

44108. If I may interrupt you for one moment, who asks the constable that question?—Whoever happens to be sitting.

44109-10. The Magistrate?—Yes. "Have you ever seen her before?" "Yes, I have seen her for the last six months doing the same thing every night." That is in answer to the question put by the Magistrate. I am not saying they all do, but I know I take very good care to find out so far as I can whether it is the first time or whether it is a matter which is of daily and nightly occurrence. That is so far as the Vagrancy Act is concerned. Now, those cases from my knowledge give really very little trouble, and they are growing less every day, but that is neither here nor there. How they are dealt with at the station is another matter. I only speak of how they are dealt with before the Magistrates, and how the police behave in the matter when it comes before us. Having said that, I should be delighted to give you any further information which you may wish to obtain.

44111. The Commission have been very glad to listen to the general statement that you have made, and they are much obliged to you for coming here to give it. I think I ought to ask you a further general question: whether you think that the duties of the police are discharged as a rule with discretion, with honesty, and with efficiency?—That involves three questions, and I have no hesitation in saying that after a long experience of over 30 years I should answer those questions most certainly in the affirmative.

44112. Have any recent cases of misconduct or possible misconduct on the part of police constables come under your notice?—No, not for some time.

44113. What kind of misconduct did you notice in the case which I think you have in mind, from the form of your answer?—With reference to what?

44114. I asked you a general question whether any recent circumstances of misconduct had come under your notice?—To that I say nothing of any recent date.

44115. Have you any criticisms to make or any recommendations to make as to the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force as to these classes of cases?—None.

44116. You are of opinion that the existing statutes and by-laws of the London County Council are adequate in every respect for keeping order with regard to these offences?—If carried out as they are now I think they are perfectly effective, and in the hands really of people who make them so.

44117. That I think concludes what I may call your general evidence or your evidence-in-chief, if we may apply the phrase to such an inquiry as this?—I daresay I may have left out a great deal, but it is impossible to go at any length into questions which would entail a very, very long statement.

44118. If you will permit me, I will ask you a few more detailed questions on points chiefly connected with the organisation and working of the Police Force. I do not suppose it is strictly a part of the Magistrate's duty at all, but do you know the Instruction Book, the Rules and Regulations in force with regard to the police?—Yes, I have it here, and I took an opportunity when I first got the letter from the Commission to say what I thought of the Rules in the Instruction Book generally. I have it here, and I have just looked at it.

44119. From your examination of the book do you think the rules are sufficiently clear for the use of constables?—I think so, and I think they are most admirably drawn. By the courtesy of the police I have seen the beginning of a new Instruction Book, but I do not touch upon that at all, because the whole of the inquiry of this Commission no doubt refers to cases which turn upon the old Instruction Book, and I can confine my remarks entirely to that. I think it is very, very difficult, considering that the circumstances in every particular case are different, and that there must be a very wide discretion given to every constable by the terms of the statute—"if he reasonably believes," and so forth. A wide discretion must be given, but upon the general rules I cannot very well conceive anything better calculated to give every single man in the Force a knowledge of how he ought to perform his duties.

44120. I infer from that that the substance of the instructions and rules and regulations themselves as to arresting, the management of the proceedings in the charge room, and so forth, are sound and reasonable rules?—Of course what takes place in the charge room I cannot be expected to know much about. I have been in a charge room before now, but I cannot say anything that is worth hearing upon that. I know one thing: if any complaint is ever made to us in any case whatever of any violence used or any improper conduct in the charge room, it is disposed of there and then at a moment's notice, for every person who is mentioned as having committed anything or done anything contrary to the rules of the police is immediately sent for, and no case is ever disposed of without hearing it out to the very end.

44121. I was not at the moment thinking so much of how the Orders and Regulations were carried out in practice, but I was seeking to ask your opinion on the question of whether there ought to be any amendment in the substance of any of the rules. Take the rules as to arrest, as to the use of the truncheon, as to handcuffs, and things of that kind?—To take them in order, with regard to the question of arrest, everything that is necessary for the general rules I believe is in the Instruction Book, but, as I was just saying, it is almost impossible for a man who has to make up his mind on the moment as to what he is to do, to make it up there and then. The prisoner is taken by the man to the station and then an inquiry is made of such a general character as I spoke about just now, and then the man is charged. It is impossible, I think, to say more than that, because, as I have already said, it is necessary for the man at a moment's notice to make up his mind whether it is a case in which he has the power to arrest or not. If he has not the power to arrest, the probability is the charge at the station will not be taken. If he has not got the power to arrest, that fact would come before the Magistrate, and he would see that in a moment, and the consequences of it would be that the man would be dismissed. But those cases are very few and far between. The next subject you mentioned was the subject of truncheons. Now, I must say, as I have many times said before publicly, that when a policeman is engaged in a difficult and a dangerous task, and uses his truncheon, a great many people begin to scream out, but I venture to call it a maudlin spirit of sympathy with the wrong-doer. A policeman is given his truncheon to save his life or to protect him from violent danger. It is very seldom used so far as my experience is concerned. I do not mean to say that I have in over 30 years' experience never heard or never come to the conclusion that perhaps the truncheon need not have been used at all. The cases I do not remember, but I have that sort of vague and floating recollection. The extraordinary thing is this, that when a man comes before us with his head plastered or with some plaster over his face, which he says was in consequence of violence used by the policeman with his truncheon, you never hear him complain about it. I suppose it probably arises from the fact that he knew he deserved it, and the less said about it the better. But I hardly know an instance where the man himself has made any complaint of the truncheon being used.

44123. What was in my mind was this, that all the rules relating to arrest and taking a prisoner to the charge room, and the proceedings in the charge room in cases of non-indictable offences, might all be put together, so that the constables themselves and any member of the public or any person like myself wanting to look at the book might easily find what are the rules applicable to the particular case?—But, of course, he has to learn his duty from the Instruction Book at his leisure. He cannot take it with him to find out in a hurry whether he is to take a man into custody, or whether he is to try and find out his name. Of course, if he knows his name, in a great many of these instances there would be no arrest—if he only knew the man.

44124. May I ask whether any prisoners have recently complained to you of being treated by constables irregularly, or with undue violence?—I do not remember any at present, and I have thought over it. I have gone so far as this, I was anxious to bring with me all the information I could possibly give you, and I sent a very short time ago, since I had my summons to attend before you, for the Chief Clerk, and I asked him if he would be good enough to refer to any cases which had come before me for the last five or six years which could in any way throw any light on or illustrate any single question which I was likely to be asked.

44125. It follows from that that you really have no reason for believing that constables use their power of arrest unjustly or unnecessarily in general?—That is quite so.

44127. Would you explain that? To what extent do you think there is a power of summary arrest at common law?—Supposing there is an affray going on in the street, that gives a power of arrest, but it must be an immediate arrest. If the fight or the row is over, and the men walk away, they cannot be arrested by a police-constable. A man can be arrested for having committed a felony, or being supposed to have committed a felony. That is common law. But if the affray is likely to be renewed, or if the constable "has reasonable cause to believe" (and those very words show that there is a discretion vested in him) that it is going to be renewed to the danger of the public peace, then the constable has a perfect right to arrest him. That a great many of these cases have become offences by statute there can be no question. Under the Police Act of London a great many of those cases are provided for by statute, but a man must have the same kind of reasonable belief, and if the fight had finished and the men had gone away he might report it, and probably would report it, to his Inspector, and it might be a case for a summons, either taken out by the officer, who may have been assaulted, or for any other offence which the man might otherwise have committed by statute. The case of solicitation is one of those cases.

44128. Have you any reason to believe that police-constables arrest people when it would be quite as efficacious for them to proceed by summons?—I do not think they stretch the power unduly at all, and for this reason: it may possibly be that the person is committing such an offence as we have been talking of, either at common law or by statute, and the constable has to make up his mind in a moment whether he arrests the person. He may have something in his mind by which he could, if he had time, find out who that person was, but the person then is under arrest. He cannot take the person with him under arrest to some distant place where that person lives, or where the person might give him the information which would make him satisfied, and the consequence is he does that which he is entitled to do, and what he ought to do—he takes the person to the station.

44129. The next question I have got before me is one which I think you have answered, as to whether you have recently heard of any cases of alleged assault by constables?—No, I have not.

44130. Then coming to the charge room. You told us in general what the duties of the police are there. Have you looked at the regulations as to taking or refusing a charge in the book?—I have.

44131. Do you think that those regulations are satisfactory?—I think they are satisfactory in this way. I hope I am not out of order in saying that it is absolutely necessary that some sort of inquiry should be held by the police in the charge room—that is absolutely necessary for the purpose of finding out what the circumstances are, the time and place of the alleged offence, and what took place at the time, for the purpose of making out the charge. That is the officer's first duty, and if he finds out—so far as I know, but that is a police matter—if there is a charge made at the station, and the officer has reason to believe that the person has been illegally arrested, and that it was a bye-law and not under statute, so that the constable would not have the right of arrest, that charge is refused, and, so far as I have always understood, that is entered in the Refused Charge Book, a book I have never seen. If that is so, I think it is a very wise and proper precaution, and, indeed, one without which it would be impossible to carry on the duties at the police station, because we never know what may occur out of these alleged charges, and the consequence is that if the station officer, or whoever is in charge at the station, sees that it is not a safe thing to accept the charge, it is put in the Refused Charge Book. I think that is a satisfactory and a most proper mode of procedure.

44133. I gather that so far as your experience goes, the Inspectors and officers in charge of the charge room exercise, as a rule, a sound discretion in refusing or in taking a charge?—Very much so, and my view in that matter has been very much strengthened by the many cases in which I have had them before me under circumstances which I have just mentioned, and that is when anything has been alleged by a person before me as having been done, which, if their statement was true, involves some wrong, in having the person against whom that wrong was alleged brought before me at once to give his evidence.

44135. Do you conceive that that is in any way a reflection upon the way in which the officer in charge of the station has done his duty?—Not the least in the world, and for this reason, if I may, exempli gratia, put forward one case of two people who came before me last Monday week. You, gentlemen, may not have heard that there was a great football match at the Crystal Palace last Saturday week, but there was, and on the Monday two men appeared before me who came from the North of England. Unfortunately for them, they were locked up at half-past 12 on the Saturday morning and did not go to the football match, but remained in custody till they came before me on the Monday morning. They expressed great regret, and they expressed very grave doubts as to whether they had money enough left in their pockets to take them home, and I said, "The sooner you go the better," and I discharged them both. It was no reflection on the constables in that case that I discharged them both, but they appeared on the sheets and will appear in the statistical accounts as two persons who were discharged.

44136. Do you happen to recollect any case in which you thought the Inspector ought to have refused to take the charge—a case that never ought to have come before you at all?—If I could give you a single instance, I do not really remember any, but I have no doubt some such instances may have happened in the last quarter of a century or more. It would be rash to attempt to say that I could with any safety say that. I dare say there may have been. But, at all events, they have been few and far between—that I know.

Sir A. De Rutzen.

44137. I gather from that that there have been cases before you from time to time in which you thought it would have been wiser if the Inspector had not taken the charge at all?—Very possibly so.

44138. But even if that was your opinion that did not necessarily, I take it, involve any wrong conduct on the part of the Inspector?—No. He has in carrying out his duties in making a preliminary investigation very likely not had the full facts before him. That is quite possible, because it is no part of the Station Sergeant's or Inspector's duty to go into the whole case to see whether the man was guilty or not. That is no part of his duty. All he has got to do really is to find out and satisfy himself that there was credible evidence, and therefore it may well be that certain circumstances which upon a minuter inquiry come to the knowledge of the Magistrate really never come before him, and there may be, and no doubt are, many such cases.

44139. The sort of thing that was in my mind was this: a constable arrives with the prisoner and says, "I arrested this man for being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly," say. It is the Inspector's duty, of course, to carry out the directions given in the instruction book. Do you think there is no reason for suspecting in any case of that kind that an Inspector tries to shield a constable from the effects of a mistake, and would rather take the charge though he himself thinks there is nothing much in it?—If you would allow me to say that in a case of that description the only single thing in which he could be mistaken would be whether the man was drunk or not. I have never known a single instance where I had any kind of reason to believe that the Inspector so far forgot his duty as to take a charge of drunkenness where he believed the man was sober. They have not the faintest wish so far as I can learn to keep a man in the station; they would much rather let him go than keep him there. They have no kind of object.

44140. Taking that to be the case, still one must bear in mind this, that if the prisoner is discharged the constable is open to an action for false imprisonment, is he not?—It may be so, but then you put the case of drunk and disorderly, and what the disorderly part of the case was can only be known to the Inspector at the station by what the constable tells him.

44141. But rightly or wrongly such suggestions are made to us that the Inspector or officer in charge of the station is too ready to take charges of that kind with a view of shielding his inferior but still his brother officer?—No such cases have come before me which would make me believe that a man in a superior station would go the length of taking a charge simply for the purpose of protecting his subordinates.

44142. Then I gather from that that you think there is no real foundation for any suggestion of that kind, at any rate, as affording ground for believing that there is a general practice of shielding officers?—Certainly not. That would be the conclusion which I have arrived at.

44143. I have been rather asking you partly, at any rate, on questions of fact, or rather as to certain conclusions which you, from your experience, would draw with regard to matters on which I have put questions to you. I should like to ask you, however, this question, which is a question rather of policy or expediency than a question of fact. Do you think that the proceedings in the charge room ought to be regarded simply as a disciplinary check on the action of the constable preferring the charge, and as a means of securing the attendance of the person arrested at the police court by making arrangements for his due custody or his release on bail, or should that be regarded as also involving a preliminary investigation into the guilt or innocence of the prisoner?—I think to allow an inquiry as to whether the man charged was guilty or not would be fraught with the greatest possible danger. I think the duty in the charge room should be strictly confined, as I have already said, to see whether or not there is credible evidence upon which he may be sent before the Magistrate for the offence with which he is charged, and I say that for the simple reason that if once the Inspector on duty were to take upon himself to try a man—because it would be that, and that alone, if the words I see in this syllabus are correct, as to whether it should not be extended to seeing whether the man was guilty or not—it would be a trial pure and simple, and depending upon whether or not the Inspector took a right view of the matter, which is simply and solely the duty of the Magistrate. I think it would be fraught with very great danger in many other ways, and one in particular, and that is that it would lead to all kinds of doubts and not only doubts but something more and something worse—that a man is taken to the station and tried by the Police Inspector and then allowed to go. There are dangers underneath that which I think are very great indeed.

44145. What I was thinking of was this kind of case—where a constable, honestly doing his duty in the London streets, does make a mistake. He arrests, we will say, some man carrying on a reputable business who happens to be in the street, and it is a pure mistake on the part of the constable, and we will suppose that the man is taken to the charge room. If the Inspector in the charge room only has to inquire whether there is a primâ facie case against the man, and the constable sticks to his story, there is nothing for it but that the person arrested under the circumstances I have mentioned should be placed on his public trial at the police court the next morning. Then we will suppose the magistrate says the man is quite innocent, and he leaves the Court without a stain on his character as the result of the trial. Considerable damage to reputation is involved even with that fortunate result of the trial. I think you agree with that?—I quite agree with you.

44146. The suggesion I am making to you is that if the investigation in that class of case in the charge-room partook a little more of the character of a preliminary trial it would be an advantage?—If it involved a question whether the man had been properly arrested or not, and if, with the superior knowledge of the Inspector, he came to the conclusion that it was not a case in which the man ought to have been taken into custody, he dismisses it, and it is put down in the Refusal Book. In that sense I quite agree; otherwise there would be no reason for having a Refusal Book. As I said just now, it may be that the constable, mistaking his duty, takes a man into custody for some offence against a bye-law, and if the Inspector saw that that was so he would not take the charge. There are many cases in which it might possibly come to the knowledge of the Inspector for the first time that a man arrested for a felony had, as a matter of fact, clearly not committed one. Take an instance such as this, and it is not a very far-fetched one. A constable is told to take a man into custody for stealing another man's watch in the street. He has not the smallest reason for doubting or disbelieving the charge made. The man who gives him in charge accompanies him to the station with the man, and when he is before the Inspector at the station the man who charged the other man with stealing his watch puts his hand in his pocket and he finds that his watch is there, and still attached to his waistcoat, because he put it into a pocket in which he had never worn it before. Under those circumstances, of course, the Inspector would at once say, "There is not a shadow of foundation for this charge of stealing the man's watch," and he would let him go. Many such cases as that might possibly happen, and, of course, under those circumstances it is perfectly clear that the Inspector would be doing his duty, and no more than his duty, and no less, by immediately discharging him.

They denied, I take it, in effect their drunkenness (I am only giving that as a mere illustration, and I am not purporting to sum up the evidence there at all). The charge was taken, the Inspector's judgment was challenged before the Magistrate the next day, there was a remand by Mr. Denman, and the men were not drunk. That is the kind of case that I am thinking of. Do you not think that in a case of disputed drunkenness of that kind it would be expedient that the Inspector in charge, if he had some doubt in the matter, or being in such a position that he ought to have some doubt in the matter, might be allowed to postpone taking the charge and simply take bail for the appearance of the accused at the station the next day when time has been allowed for further inquiry to be made—I mean an inquiry as to the bona fides of the police. There the prisoners were challenging the whole proceeding, and they certainly told the Inspector, "We were arrested on our way to the police station." The Inspector thereupon, as the charging constable stuck to his story, took the charge, and it was the only thing he could do if he thought there was a prima facie case. Do you not think, in a case of that kind it would be advisable for the Inspector, or other officer in charge of the station, to have the right to say, "I will defer the question of taking this charge until to-morrow"?—If you ask me, I would not extend the power of the policeman in the charge room one bit beyond what I have said, for the reasons which I just gave. If it were allowed that they might have an extra twenty-four hours for considering whether or not they would take the charge it would be open to all kinds of suspicion, if not something worse. For that reason I would not extend the power of a policeman one bit beyond what I have stated.

44148. I quite follow that, supposing the officer in charge of the police station is simply a police officer, but supposing the person in charge of the police station were not simply a police officer, but a man required to have some legal experience and some legal knowledge, would you have the same objection to enlarging the power of the officer under those circumstances?—If I might be forgiven for doing so, that rather leads me to venture to put a question myself. Who is the class of man whom you would introduce into the charge room for the night?

44149. That is a perfectly fair question, and I can answer it at once. In Scotland, we are informed, there is an officer called a Procurator Fiscal, who, I understand, institutes the prosecutions; he does not, of course, personally superintend the arrests, but the Procurator Fiscal is responsible for the taking of the charge, and the prosecution of the charge if it is taken. In a place like Glasgow we are informed that the Procurator Fiscal, who, of course, cannot be in all the stations at once, delegates his duty to an officer, who is called a Lieutenant, and the Lieutenant is selected not by promotion from the police force, but from a class who are supposed, at any rate, to have legal experience and knowledge?—With the greatest and the highest possible respect for Scotland, I should say I hope they will keep it there.

44150. Then you do not think, I gather, that the introduction into our system of an officer charged with the duty of taking charges and of prosecuting charges would be expedient?—I do not think so. Of course, if the Legislature should think proper to appoint a Magistrate to sit in the charge room all night it would be exactly the same thing as a Magistrate sitting by day and disposing of the cases there and then.

44151. With regard to the treatment of prisoners in the cells, have you heard any complaints?—I have heard of no complaints. It is not everybody who is aware of the fact that there are police cells, and there are police court cells, which are perfectly distinct. I have been in the police cells. Of late years a great deal has been done. Mr. Justice Wills, I believe it was, who first drew attention to the state of the cells, and a great deal has been done since then. A very short time ago we had a letter from the Home Office, asking that the Magistrates, and the clerks in particular, should from time to time pay visits to see that the orders which had been generally given were properly carried out, and I believe we do our duty fully in that way, in the sense in which it was suggested to us that we should do it. Our own cells I have seen over and over again, and I have got nothing to say about them unless in any direction you think I might give you information.

44152. With regard to the taking of bail at the police station, do you consider that the regulations are satisfactory?—I think the regulations are satisfactory with reference to that. Certainly, we do not suffer from it, because it is rather the other way; but from time to time the police grant bail for the appearance of somebody or another for some offence or another to appear before us, and they never turn up at all. That gives you every reason to believe that the police exercise their powers of granting bail, and I have no doubt they do in all cases in which they think themselves entitled to do so.

44153. Do you find that prisoners ever complain that the facilities afforded them for obtaining bail were insufficient, and that their sureties were kept waiting, or that the police would not communicate with their friends?—I do not think I have ever heard of a complaint of that sort.

44154. With regard to medical attendance on prisoners, so far as relates to these three classes of cases, have you any amendment to suggest in the regulations about that matter?—I think the regulation with reference to medical attendance is everything that could be desired. I hope I am not guilty of any breach of confidence, but, as I said at the commencement, through the courtesy of the police, I have seen come of the new rules which are being drafted; when they are completed that will be the third set of rules that I have been acquainted with since I have been a Magistrate. When I was first a Magistrate the rules of 1883 were in force. Then these rules (and I believe Sir Howard Vincent claimed the credit of having them framed more or less), which are framed upon the rules of 1883, became the rules which we have now, and they are added to, as you know, by a little addition in the "Year Book." I think those have accumulated for some six years, and now they are going to make it into another book.

44155. Do you find that prisoners often complain in drunkenness and disorderly conduct cases that they have not been able to obtain medical attendance?—No. The rules are very strict in a great many cases. The Police lay it down as a rule that if a person complains of any hurt or injury, or denies being drunk, in a great many cases, it is their bounden duty to have the medical officer.

44157. I do not quite understand whether in that case the man is convicted?—No. The book is very often marked "Discharged upon payment of doctor's fee." That is not a conviction. It is a discharge upon the payment of the doctor's fee. That is so in many cases. We have lots of cases in which we have every reason to believe there has been no previous conviction, and not only no previous conviction, but it may well be that it is the first time it has happened. I always say, and I always think, that if a person does think proper to get drunk, or if he unfortunately does get drunk, it is only right that he should pay for the doctor, and not the public for him.

44158. What is the practice that you have followed with regard to medical certificates, I mean with regard to receiving certificates written in the Occurrence Book in cases where the doctor does not come before you, and they are trivial cases. Do you receive the medical certificate?—No, it is not a certificate, but it is something which is written down by the Inspector who is in the charge room when the doctor is called to see somebody, and he happens to hear the doctor say either that the man is suffering from a fit, or that he is drunk, or whatever it may be. That comes before us, but it is never used in any kind of way against the prisoner. We happen to know that the Inspector was under the impression that the doctor said this, that, or the other, but it is never used against the prisoner.

44159. But, I suppose, if the Inspector is called he may refresh his memory by looking at the Occurrence Book, at an entry made by himself at any rate?—He might say something that the doctor said to him if what the doctor said was said in the presence of the prisoner.

44160. At any rate, it is not the practice to receive the certificate as such, and to use it against the prisoner?—No, never.

44161. I think you have told us under what statutory provisions the cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets are dealt with?—Yes. I noticed in the paper that was sent to me that an answer was given by Sir Edward Henry as to the statutes. He was quite right.

44162. You have read the proof of the evidence, have you?—No, I have never seen any of the evidence, except an occasional glimpse of something in the papers.

44163. None of it is officially published yet. I do not think I need take you over the statute, but I might ask you the general question, whether you find any special difficulty in the application of the statutory provisions to those cases. Is the wording of any of the statutes such as to give rise to difficulty in the administration of justice?—At one time there was. I remember, under the Vagrant Act, Magistrates used to go on convicting—not in cases of solicitation, because the word does not come in, but in cases of "indecent behaviour," and people used to appeal with great regularity, and at the Sessions they used to upset the convictions with wonderful regularity, and at last they stated a case for the opinion of the Queen's Bench, as it was then, and they went there, and it was dismissed at once. They said they have nothing in the world to do with it; the Magistrate thought one thing, and the Quarter Sessions thought the other, and one was as likely to be right as the other. There has never been an appeal since. That was as to whether the word "indecent" could be construed to mean a woman going up and catching hold of a man's arm, and soliciting him in that way.

44164. In solicitation cases, I take it that there must be some evidence that the defendant is a common prostitute or night walker, and also that she is loitering or in the thoroughfare for the purpose of prostitution?—Yes, that is under the Police Act.

44165. What evidence do you usually require of the fact that the defendant is a common prostitute. As I read the Act (correct me if I am wrong), the defendant must be known to belong to the class of prostitutes or night walkers—that is to say, she must be found to be soliciting for the purpose of prostitution, and it must also be to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passers-by?—Yes.

44166. What do you accept usually as some evidence of her being a common prostitute or night walker?—The general question put to the constable is, "Do you know this woman?"—"Yes." "How long have you known her?"—"I have seen her there every night this week," or whatever the answer may be. That is some evidence. "What have you seen her doing?"—"Going up to man after man and speaking to them." "Were you near enough to hear what was said?"—Sometimes they say Yes, and sometimes they were not near enough. If they say Yes, then they repeat what they heard the woman say. If they did not hear what was said, and the constable had seen her speaking to several, she is cautioned. I believe in the Instruction Book instructions are given that they should so give a caution. If, after giving a caution, they are seen to repeat the alleged offence, then it ends in their being taken into custody.

44167. Is that accepted as a complete prima facie case?—That would be the case in a great many cases, but it generally goes a great deal further. One man will not have anything to say to her, and another man will not have anything to say to her, and then she is told by the constable (I mean in the generality of cases, but I do not say in all) that he has seen her do this, and that if she does it again probably she will be taken into custody. It is a regular caution.

44168. Therefore, if I follow you correctly, in the common form evidence which you have been suggesting, which strikes one as quite intelligible, there is nothing said about the annoyance to inhabitants or passers-by?—The annoyance is shown by a person being accosted by a person whom he does not know, or if she puts her arm inside his, or anything of that sort, and she is repelled by being pushed off. Any conduct on the part of a person which shows that he does not wish further to make her acquaintance is sufficient to show, at all events, that there is some evidence that it is to the annoyance of the particular passenger.

44169. But supposing the man in question simply says, "No, I will not go to-night," or uses some phrase of that kind, and he walks on, is that evidence that he is annoyed?—No, that would not be.

44170. So that the mere fact that the man was accosted, and that he walked on after a brief conversation, would not be accepted by you as evidence of annoyance?—I do not think so.

44171. Then what do you say is annoyance of passengers?—I should say a great many people might be annoyed, and probably would be annoyed, by anybody coming up and catching hold of their arm and detaining them apparently against their wish in conversation—strangers—and if a policeman sees that done to one, and he sees the same person go on and do the same thing to another, after receiving a caution, that would very strongly fortify the view which I think I have stated.

44172. It seems to me (I may have misconstrued what you stated) that it practically comes to this, that you presume the annoyance on the proof of certain facts?—That is so.

44173. Is evidence ever given by inhabitants in this class of case by any shopkeepers or private residents, who complain of women walking up and down in front of their houses? Is that kind of evidence ever given?—I do not think ever, and I do not think you could get it. I remember once being consulted, or, rather, asked, by a person whose name I will not mention, but he is one of the most important men in London, as to whether it would be possible to put down the scenes that go on in Piccadilly and Regent Circus. I said, Yes, I thought it would be; but I said, "Have you got the inhabitants at your back?" and I believe they went to this extent that they tried to get some people to come forward, but they could not get one; the inhabitants will not do it. You can do wonders if you have the public at your back, but you can do very little if you have not.

44174. We find from one or two of the cases that have come before us that solicitation is dealt with in London sometimes not under the Vagrancy Act or under the solicitation clause in the Police Act, but under Sub-section 13 of Section 54. That is the clause which deals with insulting behaviour?—Yes.

44175. Do you have cases in which solicitation takes place which you deal with under that section?—No. A great many cases are brought forward under that particular section of using abusive words, and so on.

44176. The section I am thinking of under which one of the complainants who appeared before us was charged is Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act: "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." We took the case I am thinking of in camera, but in substance the evidence was that the lady charged had been accosting, that she had been seen for three or four weeks before accosting gentlemen in a part of Regent Street and Oxford Street, that she had been cautioned, and that then she was arrested by the constable and taken to the station and charged under this Sub-section 13—not under the solicitation clause—and upon that the next day Mr. Denman, I think it was, discharged the case, but he discharged the case under a special section which permits him to take that course where it is a first offence?—But that section would not apply to a prostitute any more than to anybody else doing the same thing, which is specified in that section.

44177. Quite so?—A prostitute might very well bring herself within that section.

44178. In order to bring a case within that section you would require evidence that the words or behaviour were either threatening, abusive, or insulting?—That is what that section points to, and the mere fact of a person doing that, whether a prostitute or not, would not make any difference.

44179. I infer from that that the mere fact of a woman speaking to a man in the way in which prostitutes do speak to people in the street is not insulting language?—The whole thing is "with intent to provoke a breach of the peace."

44180. Taking the kind of case that you gave as an illustration—you gave us a solicitation case—you would not find the woman guilty under this Sub-section 13 in such a case?—That would entirely depend upon what the evidence would be.

44181. (Mr. Dickinson) This is one of the cases the learned Chairman is referring to. I will just read you the two questions and answers. One question was: "Fortunately for me, at any rate, I have not to define the meaning of 'insulting behaviour' here; but, without analysing the meaning of it, I should not have thought that the mere fact that a woman said 'Good-night' to you or smiled at you in passing along the street would be insulting behaviour. Do you think so? (A.) It is an action that many a man resents done in the spirit in which it is done by these women. We get many complaints of women stopping men in a similar way, and that is the only way we can deal with women whom we do not know. (Q.) At any rate, we will take this report to be literally accurate as to the practice. I understand you to say that, that being so, the proper and usual thing for you to do was to take the charge under the section as to insulting behaviour?" The answer to that is "Yes."—I do not know whose evidence that is.

44182. That is the evidence of a police-sergeant. We were clearly given to understand that it is the common practice in the Police Force to make use of that section for the purpose of dealing with cases such as that you refer to?—In my experience I should certainly say it was not a common way of dealing with them.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That was a case at Marlborough Street Police Court?

44183. (Mr. Dickinson.) Yes. That was the method the police adopted in order to cope with prostitution?—Of course, it entirely depends and turns upon whether this language is used "with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned."

44184. (Chairman.) The matter will become clear, I think, if I read to you the substance of the evidence given in the report of the Inspector in regard to the case which we took in camera. The report read as follows: "The police-constable stated that he saw the woman stop three men by placing herself in front of and speak to them, which action they resented. As he had previously cautioned her for a similar thing that evening, and had seen her in Oxford Street speaking to men during the past month, he took her into custody. She was charged." There was no evidence in that case that the language of the woman was in any way insulting, although the constable did overhear one conversation, at any rate, that took place between the lady and one of the men who walked on without going with her. Would you have accepted that evidence mentioned in that report as being insulting behaviour within Sub-section 13?—Not if I stopped reading the section where you have. If you go on and say: "Or behaviour with intent," that is another matter. That is a question of evidence.

44185. Quite; but, apart from the general use of the term, there was no evidence approaching anything like an intention to provoke a breach of the peace?—No, not so far as the answer goes. I do not know what the evidence was which led up to it, unless you tell me that that was the whole case against her.

44186. (Mr. Dickinson.) I think you can take it that this was a case in which there was no question of an actual breach of the peace?—"With intent." I should not, upon that statement alone, have thought myself that there was any case proved to show an offence under that section.

44187. You are not aware that it is a practice?—It is not a practice with us, I know.

44189. If you would rather not express your opinion on a point of law, I should not press it for a single moment, Sir Albert?—No, I will do all I possibly can to help you with the greatest possible pleasure.

44190. This case took place in the Marlborough Street district. The evidence is very short, and I will read it to you: "(Q.) On the 20th March this year, did you see the lady who is now here?" I ought to say we took this case in camera, and the lady's name has not been mentioned in public at all, and it will not be. "(A.) I did. (Q.) What time was that? (A.) About 10.25. (Q.) Where was it you first saw her that evening? (A.) Oxford Circus; at the junction of Oxford Circus and Regent Street. (Q.) Had you been on duty since 10 o'clock? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What did you see her doing at 10.25? (A.) I saw her standing there at Oxford Circus; I saw her looking up into gentlemen's faces and smiling at them. (Q.) How long did you observe her? (A.) A matter of a minute or two. (Q.) What did you see next? (A.) She then went eastwards towards Oxford Street, then to the Oxford Circus Tube Station; she there approached a man who was standing outside; she looked up into his face and smiled, she said something, but I was unable to hear what it was. The man then said to her, 'Go away, I do not want to have anything to do with you.' The man then entered the Tube Station, as if to avoid her, but on seeing me he came out again. He said to me, 'These women are a nuisance, constable.' I then crossed to the opposite side of Oxford Street by Peter Robinson's—that would be on the D Division. (Q.) You crossed to the north side? (A.) Yes, to the north side. There were a lot of 'buses standing there at the time, and I had to cross between the back of one 'bus and the horses of another 'bus. The next I saw of Mrs. —— was I saw her stop a man by Hill's Place. (Q.) That is a turning on the south side of Oxford Street, beyond Argyll Street? (A.) That is so. (Q.) That is to say, the second turning from Regent Street? (A.) That is right. (Q.) Going eastwards? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What sort of a place is that Hill's Place? (A.) A place leading down into the back of Marlborough Street Police Station. It goes into Ramilie Street. (Q.) How do you get down? Are there steps there? (A.) There are no steps there; it is a street. (Q.) Is it a narrow place? (A.) Yes, it is a narrow place; it is narrow as you go to the bottom. It would look like a cul de sac from this end. (Q.) You saw her at that spot? (A.) Yes. (Q.) What did you see her do? (A.) I saw her stop a man there. The man got a matter of a yard or two past her, but he again came back to her, and after a short conversation they both walked together eastwards along Oxford Street. (Q.) How far? (A.) To Berwick Street. (Q.) How many turnings is that along? (A.) The second turning on the right. (Q.) Beyond Hill's Place? (A.) Yes. There are some steps by Buzzard's, and that goes down into the back of the Marlborough Street Police Station again to Ramilie Street. (Q.) When they got to Berwick Street what happened? (A.) They parted; the man she was with came back westwards again, and the lady proceeded eastwards to Wardour Street. She there stopped in front of another man, but the man stepped aside as if to allow her to pass, but she again stepped in front of him, and the man then said something to her, and gave her a slight push. He placed his hand on her shoulder and gave her a slight push. This gentleman then crossed to the other side of Oxford Street. (Q.) That would be to the north side? (A.) The north side. I omitted to say that at the tube station I cautioned this lady. (Q.) Going back to that, what did you say to her? (A.) I said to Mrs. ——, after this gentleman spoke to me, 'You must behave yourself and not molest people.' (Q.) What did she say, if anything? (A.) She said, 'Mind your own business; that was my friend.' (Q.) Is that all that took place at the tube station? (A.) Yes, that was all, till I turned my back on her, and I went across to the other side of Oxford Street. (Q.) When she got as far as Wardour Street, what side of the street were you on? (A.) By then I was on the south side; I crossed over from Wells Street. (Q.) You crossed again to the south side? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Were you walking in front of her or behind her? (A.) Behind her the whole time. (Q.) What happened at Wardour Street? (A.) She there stepped in front of another man. The gentleman stepped aside as if to allow her to pass. I then went to Mrs. —— and I said, 'I shall arrest you for insulting behaviour.'" Upon that she was arrested and taken to the Marlborough Street Police Station; her husband was sent for, she was bailed out, she came before the magistrate the next morning, and, as I understand it, he discharged the case under the section which permits him, in the case of a trivial offence, or a first offence, to take that course. My point is, do you think there is any evidence of insulting behaviour there. It seems to me to be a case of solicitation, does it not?—Is there anything to show under what section she was charged?

Sir A. De Rutzen.

44191. Yes. We have been informed it is a common practice, and that is the reason why this individual case is of considerable importance?—I only want to know whether there is anything to show under what particular section she was charged?

44192. The Assistant Secretary has handed me a note of the case, where it is put shortly thus: "Complaint by married woman. About 10.30, 20th March, while she was waiting in the rain for a motor 'bus at the south-east corner of Regent Street and Oxford Street, Police-constable Cole came up and spoke to her improperly, and, when she resented it, arrested her, and took her to the Marlborough Street Police Station." That is her story. I have just read to you Police-constable Cole's story. The charge taken was, "Using insulting behaviour, whereby a breach of the peace may have been occasioned." The case was tried on March 21st, before Mr. Denman, and dismissed under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdicton Act, 1879"?—Then he dismissed it?

44193. Yes, but he found her guilty. He dismissed it under Section 16?—Yes—the first offence.

44194. Under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, that is, in effect, finding her guilty?—Yes.

44195. The point I am on is this: Ought not the charge to have been taken under the solicitation section, if taken at all?—I should have certainly thought it clear from doubt that she would have been convicted if she had been taken under Sub-section 11, the solicitation clause, but I am not prepared to say but what there was evidence in the other case; I mean to say upon the other charge as presented.

44196. You are not prepared to say there was not some evidence under Sub-section 13?—Yes; but I should have thought it was clear from all doubt that there was sufficient evidence to have convicted her under the Police Act, Sub-section 11, I think it is.

44197. Of course, I do not know, but reading the evidence, I take it the charge was put under Sub-section 13, because it would have been difficult under Sub-section 11 to prove that she was a person who was a common prostitute or night walker. There is ample evidence, for whatever it is worth, of solicitation on the night in question?—That was a question entirely for inquiry originally by the person in charge of the station. He may have been mistaken in his view, for what I know.

44198. (Mr. Dickinson.) I certainly am very anxious to know from you what your view is about this practice which is a recognised practice. I will just quote to you a few words which were stated to us by the Inspector. I asked him about this case, and he said: "I have a return here respecting the number of people who have been charged this year with insulting behaviour, if you would like to look at it. Since the 1st of January, 1905, 578 were charged under the Vagrancy Act, Section 3, of 5 George IV., and 128 people were charged under Sub-section 13 of 2 and 3 Victoria. (Q.) Has that been rather a recent alteration?—Yes, that is to say, it is somewhat recent for this reason: We had a great amount of difficulty in dealing with complaints. I think a little over two years ago there were a number of complaints coming from gentlemen going home from their clubs in the evening, about women soliciting them in the street, and the question was brought before the police by myself, and they told me that they did not know these women to be prostitutes; they had seen them walking about there, but they did not know them to be prostitutes. They could not prove they were such, and the magistrate refused to convict them unless they did so. Then they fell back on the present section. (Q.) When was that?—I think about two and a half or two years ago. (Q.) With the knowledge of the magistrate?—Yes, with the knowledge and sanction of the magistrate. I pointed that out to the magistrate's clerk at the time, and he thought it would be a very good thing to rid the streets of these people. There are a great number of women I know who are not prostitutes, and I have gone up myself in plain clothes because I knew it was dangerous to charge them with being common prostitutes. We have found this Act to be of great service, and I am glad to say a number of women—in fact, I believe more than three-quarters of them—we do not see now; they have left the streets; they saw the folly of it." That is the explanation of the system adopted. What I want to ascertain is whether in your view of the sections, which are a little difficult of application, you do not think some amendment might be advisable with regard to this class of case referred to in this Act?—It might very well be that any person might, under particular circumstances, be guilty of an act under Sub-section 13, whether they were prostitutes or not, if they were guilty of certain acts which would come within the words, but the Vagrant Act and the Police Act are both perfectly explicit on the subject, and, of course, there are different punishments.

44199. Under the one Act you have to show that the woman is a common prostitute, and under the other you have to show that it is to the annoyance of the public. This was a case in which that could not be shown, and therefore they fall back on Sub-section 13, and we are concerned in ascertaining how far the law deals with it with regard to parties plying this trade?—With regard to the fact of a person being a prostitute, it is not in any kind of way necessary for the purpose of bringing a person within Sub-section 13 that you are talking of—not the least in the world.

44200. (Chairman.) I understand you have no practice in any of the police courts that leads to a solicitation case being treated as a matter of course under Sub-section 13?—No. They do not come before me. I have plenty of cases which come before me under Sub-section 13, and it may be, for aught I know, that I have convicted a large number of prostitutes under that section, and it may be that a prostitute may have committed an offence which would bring a person within that section, but it has no special application to a prostitute.

44202. (Chairman.) I think I ought to put to you this general question: What opinion have you formed as to the conduct of the police constables coming before you prosecuting people for drunkenness and solicitation?—That is a question which it is somewhat difficult to answer. I have seen no reason to find any fault with the police evidence in either cases of drunkenness or solicitation. I really cannot recall any case. No case occurs to my memory at the present moment.

44203. Do you think that the action of the police in recent years with regard to solicitation cases has tended to diminish the amount of solicitation in the streets, or the number of prostitutes frequenting the streets?—That is a question which it is really impossible for me to answer, but from all I have heard there is no doubt that in many districts where there was great cause for complaint a great improvement has taken place. That is what I am led to understand.

44204. Do you know whether the action which has been pretty freely taken by the police of late years with regard to the suppression of disorderly houses has had any effect upon the streets in increasing the number of women in the streets or in diminishing them?—To that question, again, I really cannot give you an answer. The only duty cast on the police is upon the application of the vestries or some of the local bodies, and then they take the opportunity, and they do it very effectually, to keep observation on those houses, and to record the number of disorderly characters they see go in. Of course, I have had many of those cases to deal with, and there was reliance to be placed on the evidence given; there was no earthly reason to the contrary; but what the effect is out of doors I cannot say.

44205. Coming to another matter, namely, the solicitation of women by men, have you had many cases in which women complain of being molested and troubled by men in the streets?—I am not at all sure that I have ever had one. I did mention at the beginning of my evidence that I had a sort of hazy recollection of one or two cases, but, as I said, that developed into something more than pure solicitation, and was something in the nature of molestation, or assault, or something of that kind.

44206. Do you think that the law is sufficiently strong to deal properly with cases of that kind?—I think so, because if any woman were to come to our courts, I think, to complain of anything in the way of molestation, or asking a woman to go home with him, we should very easily be able to supply her with a summons under one of those sections, and, if it turned out that she was a respectable woman who had been assaulted in that way by a man, I have every confidence in believing that we should know uncommonly well what to do with him.

44207. The sort of case that has been suggested to us in correspondence is simply this kind of case—a lady is walking along a London street, a man comes up to her, and tries to enter into conversation with her, but does not say anything particularly insulting, and he does not lay his hand upon her, but, mistaking the class of person she is, he wishes to enter into conversation with her. What can a constable do, under those circumstances, according to the law? Supposing a lady complains to a constable, and says, pointing to the man, "He spoke to me," or suppose the lady found out the name and address of the man, and came before you, what would be the powers of the constable or your powers in such a case?—The probability is the policeman would immediately upon receiving such information from some lady or another who had been spoken to, and insulted in the street, give him a caution which would stop him from doing the same thing again, and she would not take out a summons against him.

44208. What offence has the man committed that would justify the police in going up to him?—He would caution him, so far as was possible, with insulting behaviour which is likely to bring about a breach of the peace. It would certainly warrant the constable in taking the line of going up and immediately cautioning the man.

44209. Have you ever really had a case of that kind come before you?—I do not think I have ever had a case of that description.

44210. One or two cases have been mentioned in the correspondence which I have had as Commissioner, and in substance the case put is this—a man goes up to a well-dressed lady walking along, say, Piccadilly, and says, "Good evening, my dear," or "Good afternoon," or very likely he politely raises his hat, and says, "Will you come and have some tea with me?" or something of that sort. As far as his language is concerned it is quite unexceptionable, but it may be that under the circumstances the conversation is commenced with the intention that it might be acted upon. Is that an offence at all on the part of the man speaking?—That would depend entirely upon the particular circumstances of the case. What might be to a certain extent excusable if it were 12 o'clock at night might be perfectly inexcusable if it were 12 o'clock in the daytime, and what might be excusable in Regent Street at 12 o'clock in the morning might be most unreasonable if it were in Grosvenor Square at 12 o'clock in the day. It must depend upon the particular circumstances of each particular case, I think.

44211. I do not wish, of course, to press you in any way, but we want your guidance on the matter. Such a conversation as I have suggested, even if it took place in the light of day in Piccadilly, would not amount to an assault at common law, would it?—No.

44212. It would be one person speaking to another?—No, it would not be an assault, but it might very well be sufficient evidence of insulting behaviour, and if a woman came to me and asked me for a summons under such circumstances I should not hesitate to grant it to her.

44213. You would say there was some evidence of the words being insulting words?—Yes.

44214. Even although the words were perfectly civil in form, if they were spoken by a stranger to a stranger with the obvious intention of an assignation being made?—I should grant a summons at once.

44215. No such cases have come before you, I understand?—No, I cannot recollect one.

44216. Do you think that is because of the comparatively weak state of the law in that case, or because in fact such instances of bad conduct on the part of men are not very numerous?—There are certain signs and symptoms about most people which would perhaps warrant a person in making a remark, but all I can say is that I should not have the smallest hesitation upon a person coming before me in granting a summons. I have known of no such cases, and very likely that arises from the same sort of feeling on the part of women that there really is on the part of men. We cannot get men, and we do not get men, who come before us for the purpose of making a complaint against a woman who is walking the streets who accosts them and asks them to go with them, or whatever it may be; they do not come, and the same kind of feeling which keeps them away may possibly prompt women who might have much stronger reasons for staying away.

44217. There is another topic, and that is the alleged bribery of constables, or the alleged blackmailing by constables of prostitutes. Do you recollect any case in which you have had reason to believe constables have been in the habit of taking money from these women?—No case has come before me which has given me any right to say (they may do it, but I do not know), or which leads me to believe that it is anything but a very extraordinary and isolated case. We have from time to time cases brought before us of people—not police—who levy money in all kinds of ways upon all kinds of people by blackmailing, and I have very little doubt that it may be carried on not only in the cases which I have had before me, but it may very well be carried on in the streets with these women by people in plain clothes going up and saying "I am a detective," or something of that sort, "give me 5s., or I will" do this, that, or the other—"I will take you into custody" or something of that sort. There may be such cases. I am only saying that from the fact that I often have cases of different descriptions before me where money has been obtained in this kind of way by people going up and saying they are this, that, or the other.

44218. (Mr. Dickinson.) Pretending to be a policeman?—Yes, it is quite a common thing, and well known to the police, and it is extraordinary. One sees it in the papers over and over again, and I saw an extraordinary instance the other day of blackmailing, which was a case where it was entirely a representation of the fact that he was a policeman.

44219. (Chairman.) Do you recollect any case in which a witness or a defendant has made the statement that a policeman was bribed by a woman?—No, I have not. There is not one single case that I can recall to memory where there was any allegation made of bribery of the police officers.

44220. I am asking you that because one knows from one's own experience that people do say all sorts of things in Court against the police, and many allegations are made against the police that, of course, the Magistrate has to take notice of, but, as I understand, you do not even recollect any case in which a complaint has been made?—I do not really recollect any case, or else I should be most delighted to tell you of it. I do not recollect a single case. Of course, we have all kinds of allegations made against the police. One of the most common, and one which is no doubt made with a view to degrade the police, for it can be with no other object, is where a woman is brought up for being a common prostitute in the street—a woman about whom there can be no doubt——this does not emanate from the higher class, but the lower you go down the grade the more these things are brought up against the police. This sort of thing very often happens, that a woman says: "This policeman asked me to go round the corner with him, and because I would not go he made this charge against me." You generally know with what object that is made, and we do not pay much attention to it, and we believe there is no more ground, when you see the person, for believing that to be true than if the woman had said: "If you don't take me to the station I will give you a shilling." All kinds of accusations are made, but, at all events, I have known instances in which there has been that imputation made.

44221. Passing on from that class of person, how about bookmakers? Have you heard any allegation that the police received bribes from the bookmakers?—I have not heard myself (and I have heard a great many of those cases) a suggestion made by any single bookmaker. I very seldom say more than a few words in these cases, and I generally say, if the case is proved, "£5." The man goes out, pays his money, and away he goes, and there is nothing more done, but I have never heard a single one of them say he gave a shilling or a £5 note to a policeman.

44222. Now, with regard to one or two other matters. I suppose the policeman who has made the charge is the prosecutor in your Court, and he rarely appears by counsel or solicitor?—That all depends upon the nature of the case, and if it is one of such a character that the police think it is necesary to instruct anybody to appear before us. When you say the policeman is the prosecutor, he goes into the box, he never says a word till he is in the box and sworn, and we take his evidence. In that sense he is the prosecutor, but in that sense, and that sense alone.

Sir A. De Rutzen.

44223. I suppose, even in these classes of cases, he is the prosecutor in the same sense that the same policeman in a larceny case at the Quarter Sessions is the prosecutor?—Yes.

44224. The King is, of course, the prosecutor in one sense?—But there they would appear by counsel, and that would be the difference. The counsel would take it into his own hands, just say a few words in opening the case, and call the policeman, but before us the policeman simply goes into the box, and states what he knows of the facts.

44225. Does the Superintendent or the Divisional Inspector take any part in the proceedings with your consent?—We never hear any witnesses in the shape of a policeman, but we always have a Superintendent or an Inspector sitting in the police-box the whole day to give us any information we may require, and no doubt he is well acquainted with each individual case that comes before us, and frequently at the end of a case one says to the policeman who is in charge of the case, "Now is this the whole of the case or not?" and if he says "No," or if he thinks it necessary, he says, "It is one of the cases in which we should like to have a remand, as we want to make further inquiries about it."

44226. Does it ever occur to you that in cases where the defendant has counsel or solicitor that the police ought to have legal assistance as well. We have had several cases investigated before us in which it appears that the defendant at the trial before the Magistrate was represented, but the policeman was not represented by anybody except himself. Does it ever occur to you that legal advocacy ought to be given more freely to the police in these cases?—I do not think so. We get on uncommonly well, but there are many cases which have called forth from me, and from many others, I daresay, the remark (those are cases of felony, ordinary cases which come on under the Police Act, and that kind of thing, although there is nothing so small that it may not run into something big sometimes) that one was rather sorry the police were not represented, but the cases are so very few and far between that I do not see any occasion for any extension of the rule.

44227. Have you ever been called upon in consequence of anything that you noticed about the conduct of the police in a case to communicate yourself direct to the Chief Commissioner?—The only way in which that is done, as a rule, is by marking the charge sheet, and there is a special column in which, if anyone has any remarks to make either in favour of a police-constable or against him, or anything in particular that ought to come to the attention of the Commissioner, it is marked on the sheet, and sometimes I have spoken privately to whoever may be in charge of the police station about some trifling thing which really amounts to nothing, but is some slight irregularity or something of that kind. I have spoken to the Inspector, and I have noticed how he appears to feel it to be his duty—and I have no doubt it is part of his duty—and he says, "Do you wish this reported, sir?" If it is of sufficient importance I say, "Yes; I think you ought to report it," and in that way it gets reported apart from the sheet. But there are very, very few cases that I can recollect where I have thought it worth while to say that any further steps should be taken beyond what I have to say to the Inspector in the Court, but if it is of any importance I tell him that he should report it.

44228. (Mr. Dickinson.) On that point we have had several cases brought before us, and in one of them I remember it rather impressed itself on my mind that the idea in the Police Force was that when a man is discharged no further inquiry is made into the action of the police-constable unless the Commissioner has made some comment upon it. Do you think it is the duty of the Magistrate to draw attention to any case in which he thinks the police-constable has exceeded his duty or has made a mistake?—I hardly think it is any part of his duty. If it is flagrant on the face of it—and by flagrant I mean that in my belief he has either kept back something or he has overstated something—that might be and ought to be a matter for subsequent inquiry. But my recollection does not enable me to say that I have known many instances or any instances beyond what I have already said.

44229. Then your answer to me would be that, except in a flagrant case, you would not think it necessary for the Magistrate to make any observation?—No.

44230. Then, of course, if that feeling which I have referred to exists, that it is only if the Commissioner draws attention to a case that the case is investigated, then a certain number of cases in which there may have been either a mistake or misbehaviour on the part of the police officers would be lost sight of very easily?—The inquiries are so full in almost every case that is brought before us that it leaves very little opportunity, so far as my experience goes, for any thing to be found out afterwards. If, as you say, there is something flagrant or something that calls for observation or for further inquiry, it is always, I daresay, made.

44231. Of course, I am referring to cases in which, after inquiry, the Magistrate discharges the case—that is to say, says that the man is not guilty, or, at any rate, in his opinion, ought not to be punished. Then there is no inquiry into the action of the police in that case, although the Magistrate has decided that the man has not committed the offence. The case may have been brought quite wrongfully?—There is no inquiry in a case that is dismissed.

44232. When a man is discharged the Magistrate says, of course, the man is not guilty and lets him off, but what I am turning my attention to is the question as to how far there is any check on the police in order to find out whether that case has been brought, you may say, maliciously by the policeman?—The case is disposed of either by the man being convicted or sent for trial, or the case being dismissed.

44233. You see what is in my mind, and I am rather anxious to see how far the Magistrates consider it part of their duty to see that the police are doing their duty properly, or whether their duty ceases with the letting off of this man who is clearly innocent?—We have a number of cases brought before us which involve very minute inquiry into all the different parts of the case, and it may be that at the end of a case there is some shadow of doubt about it or more than a shadow of doubt—some real doubt. Then the defendant always gets the benefit of it, and he is discharged, and very well satisfied he is.

44234. From the point of view of the defendant the thing is absolutely satisfactory, but my observations are directed to the point of view of the police, because it is important that there should be some efficient means to find out if the policeman is bringing a wrong charge, and that he should be discovered in having done so. I quite understand from you that your point of view is that the Magistrate, as a rule, unless there is any flagrant instance, if he has discharged the defendant, thinks his duty is done, and he has no further concern in it?—Yes, and, of course, his duty is done when he feels it to be a case of such doubt that he does not think he could with safety convict the man, and, there being a doubt about it, the defendant always gets the benefit of it, and away he goes. The case is then done with where there is a dismissal. If it is a case of a conviction, then it follows there is an appeal, and so forth.

44236. Do you mean what you said—that you are quite sure it is not the duty of the police to hold an inquiry?—I take it the police would not consider it so after it had been thoroughly exhausted before the Magistrate. There may be exceptional cases where they would feel it their duty to inquire into it, but I doubt whether there is one in a million cases where they would do so after an exhaustive inquiry.

44237. After an exhaustive inquiry which has quite properly resulted in the acquittal of the man, away he goes, and he will not trouble himself about it, but it is important that somebody should trouble themselves to see whether the case ought to have been brought at all. I am directing my mind to the question of the action of the policeman who has accused this man. Obviously it would be the duty of the police to inquire into the origin of the case?—If they found out that the man had committed perjury, then the probability is that steps would be taken, as they have been taken over and over again, in cases against anybody who may have committed perjury. It may be that the Magistrate would suggest that, but I am talking of those cases. I am talking of cases where it has been the subject of an exhaustive inquiry, and a doubt may arise about it which the Magistrate gives the benefit of, as any court would do, to the person who is charged.

44238. Quite so, but I think I understand by that from your point of view the Magistrate, except in exceptional cases, would not trouble himself about how the case originated?—No. If he did his duty, which I have no doubt he would do, he would examine into every fact connected with the case, and not leave it half done, but have an exhaustive inquiry into the whole matter.

44239. Your view is that he has to do justice to the person accused, and the other matter with regard to the action of the police is a matter for the police?—Yes.

44240. (Mr. Dickinson.) Now, may I ask you a few questions about this question of prostitution? You interposed some remark when you were giving evidence to the effect that these cases were growing less day by day. Would you tell me to what extent they are growing less?—I can only speak for my own court, and there, I think, where we used to have three or four cases of a morning, we only get one or two, and perhaps none. That is the district of the Strand, where they used to be rather frequent.

44241. Do you know what cause that is attributable to? Is it that the offence is getting less, or that the police are not prosecuting so much?—I think it is a lesson probably that these people have taken, shall I say, from this Commission. I think they have learnt a lesson, somehow. What particular cause it is I do not know.

44242. We have been told since the Commission has been sitting that the number of cases taken before the courts has diminished?—Yes, and I believe there is no doubt about it.

44243. And the result is merely a transient effect that the number has lessened day by day, waiting till the cessation of this Commission?—I do not think we can reckon on its being a lasting decrease.

44244. The evil is not diminishing?—I do not know that it is, but about that I am not able to give any reliable evidence.

44245. Apart from the sittings of this Commission and the effect of them on the police, do you think the police and the methods adopted by the police have been successful in reducing the evil of prostitution in the streets?—I will not say I have made any inquiries, but from what I have heard, I believe there has been a considerable diminution in the past. I do not say that of my own knowledge. I only say that from what I have heard. I had a conversation the other day with a very well-known missionary, and I take it for what it is worth, but he told me he had no doubt it had decreased in the past considerably, that is to say, on the streets. I am not talking of other resorts.

44246. In the cases which come before you I understand that they are almost invariably brought by one constable?—Oh, no, not by any means.

44247. I do not mean by one individual constable, but it is on the evidence of one constable?—Yes, that is so.

44248. And we have had evidence from other cities that they have found it advisable to employ two constables in connection with these cases. Have you any view upon that?—The more evidence we get in the matter the more satisfied we should be, but, as a matter of fact, there is no such custom here as putting on two constables together for the purpose of dealing with these particular cases, and the consequence is that we do rely on the evidence of the constable who is believed to speak to the particular facts which I mentioned this morning.

44249. Of course that is putting the woman very much at the mercy of an individual policeman, supposing he is not a perfect individual?—It is in conformity with the words of the Vagrant Act, "On the evidence of one or more credible witnesses." I think those are the words but I have not the Act before me.

44250. You think it would not be an improvement if the police instituted a system such as they have in some of the northern towns of two men being employed always on this work together?—That is more a question for the police than for a magistrate, because that would depend on the available force which they have at their disposal, and whether they could put on two constables for that particular purpose.

44251. It would be less likely that a wrongful arrest would be made?—I am not at all sure about that, because two policemen going together would act together, and the probability is that in a short time one would find that their evidence was very similar, and that one would say that he saw such and such a thing, and the other man would corroborate him. I am not imputing to the police that they would keep back any fact, but one might say that he saw this, that, and the other, and the other man would corroborate him. Of course, it would be a sort of safeguard for what it is worth.

44252. Have you ever thought that this system of the caution which has to be given under the Rules is an efficacious system? The system of the Metropolitan Police is that a woman should not be arrested until she is cautioned, and, as far as we can understand, the caution in practice is supposed to be given the same night, the result being that a woman has only to move off to go to another beat, and she gets another opportunity of prosecuting her trade?—If that rule were followed out, no doubt it would be one in their favour.

44253. I want to ask you one or two questions with regard to the procedure of the courts. I suppose I should be right in saying that the great majority of the cases that have come before you are cases in which the police are the prosecutors?—Yes.

44254. The policeman himself is the prosecutor?—In the sense that he is the only witness for the prosecution.

44255. Do you have cases of drunkenness or assault in which the police bring witnesses from amongst the bystanders?—Occasionally, but very occasionally.

44256. Most of these prosecutions are naturally based on the evidence of the police?—As a matter of fact, you may take it that the general case of drunk and incapable begins and ends with the constable; but there are some drunk and disorderly cases where there may be extra witnesses beyond the police who are called in to prove the case.

44257. So that it is really a question of the word of the policeman against the word of the aggrieved person?—Subject to what I have said this morning, that when a person is brought up for being drunk he denies it, and if a doctor has been called, as I have already said, he is immediately told that if he wishes to have the Inspector called who took the charge at the station, or the doctor who examined him, they shall be immediately sent for, and, as a matter of practice, I know that is invariably done, so that he is given an opportunity of having a witness called if he thinks that witness can by any means help him in any kind of way; and where he refuses to have the Inspector who took the charge at the station called, so long as he denies it, I always, as a matter of fact, have the Inspector sent for, whether he likes it or not, so as to corroborate the evidence given by the constable.

44258. Of course, that means that when an honest person wants a particular witness called he can have that witness called?—He can; and if that witness is not present or not available, the practice is to allow him out on his own recognisances, if there is nothing against him to enable him to call that witness; and the police are instructed by the Magistrate to see that that witness is there when the man comes up again to have the case disposed of.

44259. But apart from that, of course, a person who is accused very likely would not have anybody who had been present on that occasion to call as a witness, and I only want to know whether any attempt is made by the police to bring witnesses of the disorderly occurrence. What makes me ask this question is that in the cases that have been before us one has undoubtedly felt that if attempts had been made at the moment to bring one or two witnesses who were present at the time of the assault that would be much more satisfactory?—And I have no doubt the police would think so, too; but the difficulty is in getting anybody who will come forward as a witness in these cases, and I have known the police say they have asked so-and-so to attend as a witness, but they do not do it.

44260. I believe in some countries the police have a right to compel persons who have seen an occurrence to come forward?—Yes; but that involves the fact that they know who the witness is, to begin with.

Sir A. De Rutzen.

and involves other steps being taken to oblige him to come.

44261. Then not only in the police courts do you have to rely almost entirely on the evidence of the one policeman, but that one policeman is practically the prosecutor, is he not?—In that sense the police are the prosecutors, and the evidence of the man who sees it done and takes the man into custody is the only evidence which the prosecution put forward in the matter, unless somebody happens to come forward in some way or another to give evidence.

44262. But, as a rule, I suppose in most of these cases nobody takes the position of prosecutor or accuser except the policeman himself?—No.

44263. Not even the Inspector who took the charge. I understand he is not, as a rule, required to be present?—When the case is heard, do you mean?

44264. Yes?—I do not know that he always attends, but he is always available if the prisoner wishes to have him, and the Magistrate who happens to sit always gives the prisoner every opportunity to avail himself of the Inspector's attendance, if he wishes to call him. So that everything that may have been said by the policeman at the station would come to the knowledge of the Magistrate. He has always that opportunity given him.

44265. With regard to the charge room, do not you thing that the statements that are made in the charge room ought to be taken down in writing?—I believe they are; I do not know. That is a matter entirely for the police. There is no statutory right which obliges that to be done, that I am aware of, but that they do take them down I have very little doubt.

44266. You rather advised us that you do not think there ought to be any further inquiry in the charge room in these cases?—I do not think so, so long as the Inspector makes those inquiries which he is naturally obliged to make, and finds out that there is credible evidence brought before him that an offence has been committed, he could go no further, but allow the charge to be brought before the Magistrate.

44267. You have said that you do not think it would be advisable to have any system similar to that of the Scotch system, under which there is a prosecuting organisation apart from the police. Would you tell us what your reasons for that objection are?—Because it would involve a sort of judicial inquiry at the police station and on the part of somebody or other—what his status would be I do not know; I do not know what is suggested, but he must be something superior to a police Inspector if he is to be an improvement on the present system, and it would be a quasi judicial inquiry which might last not only that particular night, but it might be in inquiry which would necessitate going on the next day or longer, a judicial inquiry, and then the case is to come before the Magistrate in a public court, and he would be faced with the difficulty that something beyond the usual police inquiry, judicial inquiry, had been held by somebody. I do not know whether it is suggested that it would be an improvement to have a Magistrate sitting during the night in the charge room to conduct the inquiry, and that those inquiries should go on day and night. There is no reason why they should not, if you could find anybody to do it.

44269. I am not quite asking that question in that form now. It does seem at the present moment, supposing a man had been wrongfully accused, and as we can imagine a case in which both the Inspector and the constable concerned are anxious to avoid any blame which might be attributed to them for a miscarriage of justice, that they have got almost everything in their favour as regards putting the case before the Magistrates. I am assuming the very worst. Would it not be a protection for the public if there was an official between the police proper and the Magistrate, who would prepare the case, and see that the case was a case which, in his opinion, primâ facie, ought to come before the Magistrate?—To be able to answer that question with any satisfaction it would be necessary to know what was the status of that particular official who was to take the place of the Inspector at the station, and to know clearly what were his duties. I am leaving out now the inquiry, going the length of what is stated in this syllabus.

44270. That difficulty which you raise is a serious one, of course?—I should think if such a thing was ever started, it might be by the appointment of a man in such a position that he would be clear of all possibility of being open to any doubt. He would be accepting a quasi judicial position to inquire into it, and were he, at the end of 36 or 48 hours, to hold that it was not a charge such as he should send before the Magistrate, it would involve a great many questions of very, very serious importance, in my opinion.

44271. I rather want to know if you can give us any idea of the number of cases which, as a rule, a Magistrate has to deal with. Of course, it might be very various?—Very very various. I could have answered the question a few days ago, because the statistics were sent to me with a view to some alteration in the different districts of the Metropolitan Police Courts, but I could not, with any accuracy, give you the figures now. I know at some courts there are sometimes 70 or 80, and I believe up to 100 cases, disposed of in one day, and that apart from summonses which are generally heard in the afternoon. I am giving you the numbers rather at random, but there are such a number as to keep the court not only busy, but as busy as it can possibly well be.

44272. Is not that a number which is almost in excess of what a Magistrate can do. Of course, we have complaints to a certain extent that the cases are too numerous to receive attention?—On a Monday morning, I understand, in many courts, and, indeed, I have had experience of it, it is as much as they can get through. We represented that fact to the Government at one time, and we expected that it would be put upon a better footing, but it came to nothing, and we go on as we were.

44273. Would not the institution of an intermediary, if I may use the word, to a certain extent lighten the labours of a Magistrate?—No doubt, if that would involve an inquiry by night and day, that would give greater facilities for getting through the work, if there was a Magistrate on duty at night, and a Magistrate on duty in the day, but, beyond that, I do not know that I can go.

44274. I do not contemplate the Magistrates working all night. You have, of course, come into contact with the individual members of the police force a great deal. Do you think it is an advisable step to keep the same policemen in the same district for many years?—I think it is certainly inadvisable to do so, but I understand, as a matter of fact, it is never done. I believe, as a matter of police regulations, they are changed, but you must take that really for what it is worth.

44275. At any rate, that is your view?—Yes.

44276. (Chairman.) Were you giving that answer to Mr. Dickinson with reference to all grades of constables, or with reference to the higher grades—sergeants, and Inspectors, and so forth?—I believe—but, as I say, you must take that from me cum grano—that as they go up the tree in the course of general practice, they get removed from one place to another. That is what I have always understood.

44277. (Mr. Dickinson.) I am speaking more of the ordinary constables, who have not got promoted?—Quite so.

44278. Could you furnish us with those figures which you spoke of with regard to the number of cases coming before the different Magistrates?—Those really are in the statistics, which are furnished by the police, and I will send you those. I dare say I can get them.

44279. (Chairman.) I am inclined to think they are in the volume of judicial statistics?—I think so. I have no doubt I can get them.

44280. (Chairman.) The Commission are very greatly indebted to you, Sir Albert, for attending here and giving your evidence?—If I can be of any further service, I shall be very glad to come.

Mr. Alfred Chichele Plowden, sworn.

44281. (Chairman.) You are one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates, I believe?—Yes.

44282. When were you appointed?—I was appointed in June, 1888.

44283. To which of the police courts are you attached now?—Marylebone principally, but I also have occasion to sit a good deal at Marlborough Street during three months of the year.

44284. I think on the invitation that was sent to you to come and give evidence you had the syllabus or memorandum of evidence submitted to you?—Yes.

44285. Have you written out any statement that you would like to make in response to that request, or would you prefer I should ask you questions seriatim?—I think I should prefer you should ask me questions. I may have something to say with regard to one or two of the questions which may be put.

44286. The terms of reference, of course, you have before you?—Yes.

44287. The first general head on which we should like to have your evidence is what in your opinion are the duties of constables in the metropolis with regard to the three classes of cases mentioned in our terms of reference?—I suppose, broadly speaking, to arrest, to take into custody any person endangering the peace. That is the widest definition of their duty, I think—or conduct tending to a breach of the peace.

44288. I suppose that the proceedings of the constables would fall under the two heads of laying an information and asking for a summons or exercising the power of summary arrest?—Precisely.

44289. In these three classes of cases, of course, a constable has by statute a power of summary arrest?—Yes.

44290. And I suppose that the great majority of the cases came before you on summary arrest or on a charge made?—You may say that generally of all street offences as distinguished from criminal offences.

44291. Then I suppose the duty of the constable is that if he is upon his beat or upon patrol or a fixed point duty to arrest any person if he comes to the conclusion that the case warrants him in doing so?—Yes, on his own responsibility.

44292. That there is a primâ facie case of an offence likely to lead to a breach of the peace?—Yes.

44293. And having arrested him to take him to the station to charge him there, and in due course to prosecute him at the police court?—That is the procedure, I believe.

44294. You have now had a great deal of experience, and your opinion upon the question which I am now going to ask you will certainly be of very great value. Do you think upon the whole that their duties are discharged as a rule with discretion, with honesty and efficiency?—Yes, as a rule, certainly.

44295. Have any recent cases of misconduct—I mean by misconduct cases in which there has been irregular or wrong use of his powers by a constable—come under your notice?—I cannot say that any very recent case has come under my notice, but I certainly am not prepared to say that I have never had cases before me of what I should call not misconduct but misfeasance—mistakes.

44296. The word "misconduct" is used as being a broader term than misfeasance, which, I suppose, means actually doing something wrong?—Yes, it does. Perhaps misfeasance is not the right word, but I do not think misconduct is either.

44297. (Mr. Whitmore.) Indiscretion?—Indiscretion perhaps—yes.

44298. (Chairman.) But taking misconduct as being equivalent to misfeasance, do you recollect any case in which constables have wrongly arrested a man?—Oh yes, I have, but they are few and far between, and perhaps for that very reason they made more impression upon me, but I can recall cases where undoubtedly they have blundered.

44299. Not simply blundered from a mere error of judgment, but blundered owing to ill temper or something of that kind?—No. I do not recall any blunder which is due to temper. With all respect to the police I should say their blunders, when they do occur, are due to stupidity. I hope they will not mind my substituting one word for the other there.

Mr. A. C. Plowden.

44300. Can you give us illustrations of what you mean? You need not give the constables' names or numbers?—I can give you the broad outlines of a case where they behaved very wrong-headedly some years ago—perhaps four or five—at Marlborough Street. A woman had been taken to the police station, charged as a disorderly prostitute. The next morning she did not appear. A week or two afterwards the police took into custody a woman whom they persisted was this woman, who had not surrendered to her bail, and she was brought to the court on a summons. In point of fact, you must take it from me, there was a mistake—she was a thoroughly respectable woman. As the case proceeded, and she outlined her defence, which was not only a denial, but consisted of a very strong alibi (she was ill on the day in question), I recalled the constable, and asked him if he still persisted in his story, pointing out the difficulties. He replied that he was still quite certain, whereupon I adjourned the case to give the police further time for inquiries. In the course of the week, I received private intimation that they wished to withdraw. I did not, however, think this a fair course to adopt towards the young woman, except in open court, having regard to the fact that her character had been most seriously assailed by the police. The case, therefore, came on in due course. The police formally withdrew the charge, and at my suggestion consented to pay 20 guineas to the accused by way of compensation. The point of the story is, that what was an unfortunate blunder to begin with, was made worse by the stupid refusal of the police to acknowledge their fault, when it was patent to everybody else that they had made a mistake. There was absolutely no foundation for the charge—none.

44301. That is a question of great reluctance on the part of a constable to say he made a mistake?—I suppose nobody likes to say they have made a mistake when it is suggested to them. It is rather human nature. The mere fact of suggesting that a person has made a mistake makes him all the more positive that he has not done so.

44302. (Mr. Whitmore.) What was the ground of the charge against this perfectly innocent woman. Why was it that a lady who was quite innocent should have had this charge brought against her. Was there any suggestion of malice against the police?—No. I suppose they took her into custody on a fancied physical resemblance.

44303. (Chairman.) It was a case of mistaken identity?—Yes.

44304. (Mr. Whitmore.) There was no suggestion of any malice?—None at all that I can recollect. It was a pure case of mistaken identity.

44305. What you would call honest stupidity?—Yes.

44306. (Mr. Dickinson.) I understand the charge was made out against somebody?—It never was investigated against the real person, because that person never was found. I do not know what answer the real person may have had.

44307. (Chairman.) That is an instance of the kind of case in which you think the police go wrong?—Yes, I think they are apt to go wrong in all that district of which Marlborough Street is the centre. I think that they not infrequently are mistaken in cases of drunkenness simply from their inability, through no fault of theirs, to understand the foreign temperament. A foreigner when he is taken into custody on a charge of disorderly conduct gesticulates and throws himself about, and he is more vehement than an Englishman. These gestures are strange and novel to the police, and they do not recognise them in Englishmen at all, and they do not know what name to put to it except "drunkenness." The more the foreigner gesticulates the more positive the police are that they have got hold of a drunken person. That happens frequently, and it may be a perfectly honest mistake.

44308. I understand your position is this, that though you have been on the bench now for nearly 20 years, you cannot recollect any instances of the misconduct of a constable coming to your notice except in which the matter may be explained either by reference to the stupidity or want of intelligence or obstinacy of the man?—I should say a want of imagination. I think that is borne out by this, which shows it is not any inherent fault of the police. The district of London with which I am best acquainted is the district of which Marylebone is the centre, and I do not recall any case of mistake in Marylebone. It is in this difficult district of Marlborough Street, which is teeming with foreign bad characters and foreign good character as well, that the work of the police becomes much more difficult.

44309. Then I take it from that, that the cases in which the defendant, in charges of drunkenness or drunk and disorderly conduct, disputes the drunkenness are comparatively rare?—Of course, there are many cases where they do not dispute it, undoubtedly, but I think there is a fair proportion of cases where people persist that a mistake has been made. I think drunkenness is a very difficult charge to investigate very often.

44310. I am now putting to you the general question whether misconduct or indiscretion or stupidity on the part of police-constables is a thing of frequent occurrence before you?—No, I should not say it is frequent, and it is associated almost exclusively with Marlborough Street, and in these cases where they have to decide the thing very rapidly they may mistake the symptoms.

44311. What does strike me is this: you know of no case which you call positive misconduct or criminal misconduct on the part of any constable in your experience?—I do not remember one.

44312. Have you any general complaints or criticisms to make in regard to the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force with regard to the classes of cases I have referred to?—No, not in a general form. I may, when I come to a later question dealing with the charges, have something to say.

44314. Are you in a position to give us any opinion as to the clearness of the regulations issued to the police?—Do you mean in the Instruction Book?

44316. So clear that you generally find there is little or no doubt as to whether a police-constable has been performing his part in the machinery of the Force?—I think the meaning of each instruction is unmistakeable. I do not think there is any confusion about anything that is stated in the book. I do not know how it can be stated more clearly. Possibly some of the subjects might be treated more exhaustively, but not more clearly. I am not sure that I am speaking of the same book that you have got.

44317. This is what we have called the White Book, but it is really called the Instruction Book for the Government and Guidance of the Metropolitan Police Force?—Mine is more in the form of a blue book.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think Mr. Plowden is referring to the large book which Sir Edward Henry produced, which contains the regulations in extenso from which this White Book has been extracted.

(Chairman.) Do you mean the White Book is only an extract from it?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes, Sir.

(Witness.) I think what I saw was the general regulations.

44318. (Chairman.) For my purpose it does not much matter. The sort of thing which I had in my mind, which led me to ask you the question as to whether the instructions are perfectly clear, was this kind of regulation: "Constables may leave their beats to act in cases of fire, accident, or other emergencies, but are to return to them as soon as possible. Officers in charge of stations are to enter in the Occurrence Book at the expiration of their tour of duty, a list of constables who have been taken from their beats for any purpose and for however short a time." That, of course, as far as language is concerned, leaves little to be desired; it is grammatical, but I am thinking of one of the cases that came before us, where a man went off his beat in charge of a prisoner at the request of an officer who was on patrol duty. He went to the station, and he was present when the charge was made by the constable who had arrested the prisoner, and then he went away; but in the Occurrence Book there is no entry that he had left his beat, and as far as I can make out in that particular case he must have been off his beat for 20 or 25 minutes. There was no entry in the Occurrence Book. That was the sort of thing that was in my mind when I asked you whether you found the regulations were adequately clear?—What I looked at was a very imposing volume, but I did not make any study of it. I merely glanced through it, letting my attention rest on those points which touched my own work.

44319. You have not paid any attention to that kind of point?—No.

44320. Then I will pass from that. With regard to arrest, you are, I dare say, aware of what is contained in the book on that head?—I may have seen it—I probably did.

44321. Have you any complaint to make with regard to the way in which officers are directed to effect an arrest, or the way in which they do effect an arrest and convey their prisoners to the station?—I am afraid I cannot imagine more than one way of taking a person into custody. It never can be agreeable.

44322. But there is a direction about it at page 249. It is a matter of some importance, because so many witnesses seem to think that the police almost habitually use too much violence. I am not expressing any opinion with regard to it?—Do you mean at the moment of arrest?

44323. Yes?—I cannot conceive how violence can come into play there at all. Violence comes into play when there is resistance.

44324. As I understand that you have not paid any attention to that, I will not pursue it?—I have never had a prisoner in the dock complaining of violent arrest. He may complain of treatment on the way to the station, but that is another thing.

44325. I was only putting those questions to lead up to my next question, which is, do prisoners often complain of the police having been too violent in effecting the arrest or treated them harshly or brutally on the way to the station?—Very commonly—I am not saying always truthfully, but commonly.

44326. Have you come to any conclusion as to whether that kind of complaint is well founded in any case at all?—It is very difficult to get at the bottom of it. There is no one there to speak to it except the constable and the prisoner he has in charge. One does his best by cross-examining the constable about it. I never allow it to pass unnoticed. If a prisoner complains he has been roughly treated I do my best to get some answers, favourable or unfavourable, from the constable. It is very common, when a woman is taken into custody, for her to say, "Look here, the constable has hurt me," and she bares her arm. The first time I saw that in a police court it made a great impression on me, but one gets older and wiser, and I understand that a woman's arm bruises very easily indeed, and that even the clutch of the constable will bruise her arm. It is very common for that kind of complaint to be made. I suppose they rely on the bruises to carry conviction. Of course, men also complain.

44327. Do you think there is anything in the complaints, speaking broadly, taking one year with another year. You, of course, hear these complaints frequently and I suppose many times a week. Do you think there is anything in it?—I should not like to express myself definitely, because whenever a prisoner complains of being roughly treated I naturally turn to the constable and ask him what truth there is in it, and his answer is that the prisoner brought it on himself because he was so violent in resisting his capture and in going to the station. There it has to be left, generally, because there is no means of getting beyond that. Of course in my own mind, without anything more, if I am inclined to think there is some truth, although there may be exaggeration in what the accused person says, I take it into account in the sentence.

44328. (Mr. Whitmore.) Have you often had independent evidence corroborating a complaint of a prisoner?—Do you mean by bystanders?

44329. Yes.—My experience is that whenever there is any reason for any member of the public to think that an accused person is being wrongfully treated that person is generally eager to come forward and testify against the police. If ever I can see my way to getting a bystander to give evidence on one side or the other I am only too glad to avail myself of it, and I adjourn the case invariably if there is the slightest chance of getting a bystander. I look upon a bystander's evidence as absolutely invaluable, however small the case may be.

44330. As a matter of fact, is that often available or forthcoming?—No; I wish it was available oftener. Bystanders are reluctant people to come into Court, but every now and then it happens, and it is most satisfactory when they do come; but I wish they would come oftener.

44331. (Chairman.) I suppose that in case you did come to the conclusion there was some evidence of an assault or excessive violence on the part of the constable you would grant a summons against him on application?—Yes, certainly.

44332. Have you had occasion to grant any such summons?—I think I have. My experience extends over so many years. I do not like to be positive about it, but my impression is I have granted a summons against a police-constable for an assault.

44333. Do you remember what the result was in that case?—No, I am afraid I do not. It is a very long time ago now, and such cases are very rare; but I do not know what else I could do. You can complain to Scotland Yard or to the Home Office, and that is done sometimes; but supposing I should not take that course, I should think the complainant had a right to a summons.

44334. It must be very rare if you do not remember any case?—No, I do not remember any case.

44335. Now I want to ask you a question or two about the charge-room. I take it, it is the duty of the Inspector to maintain proper order in the charge-room, so as to give the accused person (the prisoner) a chance of explaining his view of the case?—I should like to clear my character to start with by saying I have never been in a charge-room.

44336. All you can give is hearsay evidence of what takes place in the charge-room?—Yes, and general knowledge.

44337. Do prisoners ever complain before you that they have not had a fair hearing from the Inspector in the charge-room, or that there has been disorder there, or that they are put into the dock roughly or compelled to sit down unnecessarily and violently?—I do not think I remember any complaints that they have not been treated fairly; but I have had complaints sometimes to the effect that they have not understood the proceedings that are taking place, that it has not been sufficiently explained to them, so that they can understand what is going on or what they are doing, and undoubtedly there are complaints from time to time that they have been treated with roughness.

44339. Do you recollect any particular case in which a complaint of that kind was made, and in which you asked what the Inspector had done, or what had taken place in the charge room?—No, I cannot remember any specific instances, but I know they do occur—not unnaturally. There is no blame to be attached to anybody about it. A person finds himself in a novel position, and he does not grasp it fully. I do not know that he suffers any injustice in consequence of it.

44340. But the impression left on my mind is that the Instruction Book says that a very responsible duty is cast upon the Inspector or officer who is in the charge-room and who may be taking the charge?—I agree, certainly.

44341. It seems to me a very responsible duty that is cast upon the Inspector?—I have some observations that I should like to submit to you upon that generally.

44342. Would you like to do it now?—Yes. I think that something—in fact, everything that can be done—should be done to protect the public from the risk, the constant overhanging risk, of unfounded charges which are not the less unfounded because they may be made in perfect good faith. I think no one will deny that this risk is a real one. Of course, to some people it is of little consequence whether they are brought into a police court or not, or what happens to them when they are there; but to others, and many others—persons of position and character—police court proceedings, even with an acquittal, cause annoyance and humiliation. More than that, such is human nature that I think the more conspicuous a man's reputation may be, the more likely is it that it will be believed against him that there was some truth in the accusation which he had to face, even although he was acquitted. Now, it is easy to imagine cases of that character. Under the present system such cases would come in the first instance before the Inspector at the police station. There it would have to undergo what is in effect a judicial inquiry. I do not mean to say that it is an exhaustive judicial inquiry. The Inspector, of course, cannot convict, but he can discharge; and, not only that, but he is responsible to no one but himself. I am aware—at least, I believe this to be the case—that he has to make some note of every charge which he refuses, which is sent up to his superiors. But that is a very small check. The note is entirely in his own discretion as to how he makes it, and whether it is short or long, and so on. The inquiry, therefore, which takes place—that is to say, the inquiry before the Inspector—takes place virtually with closed doors. When an accused person crosses the threshold of a police station the curtain, so to speak, drops behind him, and no one knows what takes place within that station except the police and the accused person. It is only the following day, when the accused comes before the magistrate that the curtain lifts and daylight is let in. That is the system. I do not for a moment suggest that these powers, which are undeniably great, and the responsibility, which is undeniably great, are in any way abused by the police. I hope I am the last person to make such a suggestion—even if I had the wish, I have not got the materials, and I do not suggest it—but they themselves must feel the responsibility to be very great, and I think safeguards might be devised in the interest of the public to protect them from risks of this nature. It is easy to criticise, and recommendations are difficult, but I should suggest as one recommendation that in cases where there is present to the mind of the Inspector taking the charge a reasonable doubt that the constable who has brought a man, say in a public position, into the station, is making a mistake, and the accused person is there with his card and his name and address and his denial all before the Inspector, then I think the Inspector should have power to take that accused person's bail to appear, not the next morning before the Magistrate, but say in a week's time. During that week the Inspector would have opportunities of meeting with his superiors, or with the very able legal adviser to the Police, with the result that the charge might be dropped altogether, or it might take the form of a summons. At all events, it would prevent that appearance of, I will not say indecent haste, but haste which may tell very harshly against the accused person under the present system. We must all have cases in our minds where that has occurred—a most painful thing. I know not only as a Magistrate, but as a man of the world, that this kind of risk is ever present to the minds of the public at large, and I think they would be glad to see any safeguards introduced to check these risks. Then, beyond that, I think where perhaps such delay as I have indicated is undesirable, or not easily indulged in, I think the Inspector should have an opportunity of consulting with some superior officer, say the Superintendent of his district. The more you increase the position of the man who has this great authority, I think, the greater the safeguard to the public. Then, as an alternative idea, a Magistrate might be consulted before a charge is inquired into, with a discretion to hear it in his private room. I am quite aware that there are obvious objections which could be taken to that, but if you come to think of it, this would hardly be giving the Magistrate more power in his private room than the Inspector has at this moment in the police station. The reputation of a public man does not belong only to himself; it belongs to the public as well. It is in the interests of the public that the character of people who enjoy deservedly great reputations should not be lightly tampered with, or written about in the public Press in great detail and at great length, and therefore I think it would be to the general interest that in cases of this kind a Magistrate should have discretion whether he should hear the case in open court or not. I should suggest that if he was allowed to hear the case in his private room, if he saw cause to convict—that is to say, to inflict a fine—a notification of that fact should be given tersely and shortly to the Press, but no details, and that if he acquitted the defendant, or was of opinion that the charge should not be taken, then the thing would drop, and nothing more be heard about it. After all, I believe a Police Magistrate has power to exclude the public when he tries indictable cases. The power is never exercised, but I believe there is that power, and it has been held there is that power. Of course, we are all familiar with the discretion exercised by the Judges of the Divorce Court, when they hear cases in camera. They do not hear them in camera for the sake of the people whose cases are being investigated, but in the interests of the public; and if the public can be brought to have, as I hope they have, sufficient confidence in the discretion of their Magistrates, I think it would be a lesser evil to entrust the Magistrates with this power, which would be very rarely exercised indeed, rather than that the present system should go on of the police conducting a judicial inquiry at the station before the case comes into Court. In order that I may not be misunderstood in what I have stated, I should like to express myself a little more fully, even at the risk of repeating myself. It must not be supposed for a moment that I am opposed to the "principle" of publicity which prevails in our Courts, and may be regarded as the very breath of our criminal procedure. The basis of my remarks is the extensive power that at present is possessed by an Inspector in dealing with street charges at the police station. Cases under this class may arise at any moment, which would throw on these officials a responsibility greater than they should be called upon to bear. It is no answer to say such cases are too rare to require any special precaution. It is sufficient for my purpose, that they are possible—that they have been known to occur, and may occur again. It is this bare possibility of their happening which creates the general sense of discomfort which I understand to prevail, and which, under the circumstances cannot be said to be unnatural. My point is that the individual who has to deal with a case of this kind at a very critical moment should be an official better equipped by training and experience than can personally be expected of an Inspector, whose career, after all, has proceeded on somewhat narrow lines. If no such substitute can be provided, then the Inspector should be able to look for advice in some higher quarter whenever he may feel that he requires it. Why should not this advice, this assistance, be forthcoming from the Magistrates? I do not, of course, suggest that if an individual, whoever he may be, is charged with an indictable offence, the Magistrate should have a discretion to hear the charge privately. Crimes are attended by severe punishment, and publicity, therefore, is of the very essence of a fair inquiry. Every member of the community, rich or poor, humble or distinguished, must take his chance in life of being wrongfully accused of crime, whatever the inconvenience may be. It is difficult with regard to street offences, which form so large a portion of the work, which goes on in courts of summary jurisdiction. Here the punishment, as a rule, is trifling, but the consequences may be terrible, out of all proportion to the offence. To the man in the street a conviction on a trifling matter is of little consequence. The more obscure his position, the greater his protection. His case is unnoticed by the press, and is forgotten almost as soon as it is mentioned. It is different as the accused rises in the social scale, where it may be a distinguished public servant, or a private individual, to whom his personal character is his most precious possession, is charged wth discreditable conduct in the streets. Even if he is acquitted, or the Magistrate takes no more notice of the charge than to bind him over in his own recognizances, his future may be seriously affected, if not ruined, by the publicity given to the proceedings by the unpitying press. With him, the greater his fame, the more widespread the report. It is in mitigation of the mischief attending an occurrence of this nature that I think a Magistrate might be entrusted with more discretion than he enjoys at present, not for the sake of giving him more authority, but simply and solely in the general interest, and as an improvement on the system which prevails at present. I apologise for expressing myself at such length.

44343. (Mr. Whitmore.) Have we not got into confusion with regard to the word "judicial"? Do you use the word "judicial" as applied to the inquiry in the charge room?—Yes.

44344. (Chairman.) I was going to ask Mr. Plowden when he had finished his statement that very question?—I call it a judicial inquiry if the Inspector has to investigate whether the charge is sufficiently well founded to bring it into court.

44345. The reason that Mr. Whitmore asked his question is probably the same reason that was inducing me to ask you whether you knew that Sir Albert de Rutzen had been giving us this morning rather a different theory?—Sir Albert has much more experience than I have. I did not know what he was going to say, or what he has said, except I heard a portion of his evidence this afternoon.

44346. I did not say I accepted Sir Albert de Rutzen's view, and I was going to call your attention to what is said in the Instruction Book. It certainly gives one the idea that it is directed to a man who is to exercise the judicial faculty, at any rate?—I do not see how you are to get out of it. It is not an exhaustive inquiry, but as far as it goes it is a judicial inquiry.

44347. (Mr. Whitmore.) I only wanted to understand. So far as my own mind is concerned, all I have heard in the course of this long Inquiry does not lead me to think that the investigation in the charge room is of a judicial or ought to be of a judicial character—at all events, not the conclusion arrived at there. I think the Inspector has only to convince himself that there is a prima facie case that ought to be sent to a magistrate?—But how can he convince himself, except by putting questions and forming a conclusion?

44348. (Chairman.) Of course, the distinction is this—that he is clearly not bound to accept the charge. The mere fact that a constable says "I charge that man with being drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly," does not force the Inspector to take the charge?—No, but a constable comes with the prisoner and makes that charge, and the prisoner stoutly denies it, and there is nothing else before the Inspector except the word of the constable and the denials of the accused. He must decide between them. I do not know that he does anything at the station different to what the magistrate does next day, except the magistrate has the power to convict.

44350. (Chairman.) As I understand it, the opinion you entertain is that the proceedings in the charge room are not of a purely executive kind, but that they partake of a judicial character as well?—Yes.

44351. That is your proposition?—That is my proposition.

44352. It rather looks like it at page 251, under the head of "Charges"?—It may be a very reluctant rôle for the Inspector to adopt. I do not say he seeks that kind of duty, but it is inherent from what he has to do.

44353. "When prisoners are brought to police stations and charged with any offence, the statements of persons charging, of witnesses, and of police, are to be made to the officer on duty in the presence and hearing of the prisoners." He has to hear both sides?—Yes, he has to hear both sides, and he does not hear more evidence than the magistrate hears the next day, in nineteen cases out of twenty.

44354. "And if there be more than one police witness in a case, each constable is to make his statement out of the hearing of the other." That also looks rather like a judicial proceeding more than a mere executive proceeding?—Yes.

44355. Then in the Instruction Book there are separate clauses dealing with the case of evidence required. Then I understand that your view is that the proceedings in the charge room as to the taking or refusing of a charge may properly be described as judicial proceedings?—In my opinion, that is so.

There is one more thing I wish to say about it. I think that if the constable is shown to have made an inexcusable blunder there should be some power in the magistrate to deal with him summarily. At present we have only the cumbrous methods of actions for false imprisonment or malicious prosecutions against constables, but I think if it was known that a magistrate had power to deal summarily with gross cases if and when they do occur—I do not say they do, or that they ever will occur—it would be a useful check on the constable to know he could be dealt with in that way.

44356. I believe that magistrates have a jurisdiction as to property, have they not? You may avoid county court proceedings, may you not, by making orders for the return of goods, and so on, in some cases?—I do not quite know what you have in your mind.

44357. I thought there was a jurisdiction on the part of magistrates to order delivery up of goods?—Yes, on a detaining summons you may order the delivery of goods.

44358. To what property does that apply—property detained by whom?—By anybody wrongfully.

44359. You think there ought to be a kind of ancillary jurisdiction enabling you, in a case where you come to the conclusion that a man has been wrongfully charged by a constable, to give redress?—Yes, I think he ought to have some redress, instead of merely going away grumbling. The burden of proof would be on him to show what the constable had really been guilty of, but I think if it was known throughout the force that that kind of remedy was provided by law it would have the effect of producing greater caution, perhaps, by young constables in the exercise of their duties. It would not be a very serious thing to hang over their heads, but there should be a fine inflicted of some sort.

44360. Do you think that constables are unduly zealous in making arrests? That question is rather prompted by your suggestion now?—I do not think as a class they are. I think in the police force there must be individuals of zealous temperament, like there are everywhere, who do a little more than they need.

44362. Now returning to the charge room, do you think that Inspectors are from bias or from a spirit of camaraderie unduly prone to take a charge when made by a constable?—I cannot say. There, again, so much must depend on individual temperament. An Inspector to whom it was agreeable to assume judicial functions would probably not take the charge until he had investigated it very thoroughly. Another one who shrank from doing work of a judicial kind would take it without further consideration at all, to save trouble. It must be a matter of individual temperament. I have no more materials on which to form an opinion than the Inspector has who performs this duty.

44363. You have answered the next question I was going to ask as to the proceedings in the charge room by the statement you have been good enough to make?—In that statement I made I was thinking of the public. I only indicate these remedies. It is for wiser people to think out the proper remedies, but I do see a very real terror hanging over the heads of the public at large when they may be brought into the police station on unfounded charges affecting their character.

44364. If you look at page 4 of our syllabus you will see the first question there, and as I put it to Sir Albert I put it to you: Ought the proceedings in the charge room to be regarded simply as, firstly, a disciplinary check on the action of constable preferring the charge, and, secondly, as a means of securing the attendance of the person arrested at the Police Court by making arrangements for his due custody or his release as also involving a preliminary investigation into the guilt of the prisoner. I gather your answer to the question is in the affirmative?—No, I am not in favour of the preliminary investigation at the police station. I think it is too judicial. It is not easy to avoid it.

44365. I rather gathered that you had told us that you thought in your view the proceedings in the charge room are already of a judicial character?—Certainly that is my opinion, but whether it is advisable or not is another matter.

44366. (Mr. Dickinson.) Would you have no inquiry in the charge room?—That is the difficulty, what to do there; therefore I suggest that if there is no other way except to have a judicial inquiry it should be subject to some kind of appeal or some kind of check.

44367. (Chairman.) There seems hardly room for a tertium quid in this case. In the question which I read to you one theory of the proceedings in the charge room is stated, and the only other theory appears to be the theory of a judicial investigation. The proceedings in the charge room may be regarded simply as a check on the action of the constable who prefers the charge—that is to say, the procedure designed to see that the arrest is properly made, and so on; and, secondly, as to the means of securing the attendance of the prisoners at the Police Court the next day?—Yes.

44369. So on the secondary proceedings in the charge room the Inspector's duty consists of two things—first, he must check the constable's action, and see that so far all the proceedings have been regularly conducted; and, secondly, he has to turn to the prisoner and say, "Do you want bail?"—Yes.

44370. That is the executive theory reduced to a correct and logical statement?—Yes.

44371. If that is all the Inspector has to do his function is purely executive?—Yes.

44372. But at present it seems to me he goes beyond that. It seems to me that some preliminary investigation is involved under the existing regulations?—Yes. I think it ought to be limited to the description you have given of what the executive duty is, and he should abstain from any judicial inquiry at all if it can be done. But if it cannot be helped, if he must put questions which take the shape of a judicial inquiry, then there ought to be some check outside upon him.

44373. I understand that your suggestions were in effect that the proceedings were of a judicial character now?—My suggestion is that, in fact, what does take place at the police station is in the nature of a judicial inquiry. If something less could take place, such as you say would be simply executive—that is to say, reviewing the action of the constable and entering the charge—so much the better, but I can quite understand cases where the Inspector thinks, in spite of himself, he must put questions and must conduct something in the nature of an investigation. Then when that course is forced upon him the responsibility is so great that there should be some check upon him outside.

44374. Quite so. I follow that.

44375. (Mr. Dickinson.) That would mean that every case would have to come before a Magistrate. The first occasion when any investigation could be made would be before the Magistrate, if you take the first alternative?—Yes.

44376. If you limit the Inspector very strictly to the executive action practically no charge would be refused?—I think that would be better.

44377. (Chairman.) Then comes the next question: Having regard to the damage to reputation sometimes sustained by innocent persons in consequence of their being publicly put upon their trial for these street offences, are you of opinion that some reform is desirable in the regulations as to taking and refusing charges. I understand that you are?—I do not think the police ought to have the power of refusing charges. I think it would be much better to limit them to the executive view of their conduct.

44378. Then it really comes to this, you would have at the police station some other person than a Police Inspector to take or refuse a charge?—No, I should require the Inspector to take every charge and bring it before the Magistrate the next day.

44379. (Mr. Whitmore.) Even if it was obvious that the man who was taken to the station was not drunk when he got there?—You say "obvious," but I do not know how it can be obvious. It cannot have been obvious all along, or the constable would never have taken him into custody at all. It is a case of the constable thinking the man was drunk and the Inspector thinking he was not drunk. I do not think a man would suffer by being brought into court the next morning and being discharged there. Some men would rather be discharged by a Magistrate than by an Inspector.

Mr. A. C. Plowden.

44380. I thought that you suggested even if a person is innocent the very fact of his being put upon his trial in public on a charge of being drunk and disorderly would do him a great deal of damage?—I would not put him on his trial in public if he was a person of position and reputation.

44381. (Mr. Whitmore.) Then you would draw a class distinction?—It is very difficult, but there are cases where it is so undoubted that nobody could complain.

44382. (Mr. Dickinson.) You contemplate that when a case like that comes into the charge room the officer in charge should have an opportunity of saying, "I will not bring you before the Magistrate to-morrow morning, but I will bring you before him a week hence," and then in the meantime an inquiry should take place, and then you would have immediately your judicial inquiry, or, at any rate, to a certain extent?—Yes, I am only saying that in theory. I should prefer that the Inspector took no charges at all, but I quite see cases must arise where it would be very difficult for him not to embark on something in the nature of a judicial inquiry, and if, when he is driven to that course, the person who is before him is a person of undoubted respectability, then I think he should take his bail for a week.

44384. You answer that question in the affirmative?—Yes, I think it would certainly be very desirable.

44385. In the light of what you have said as to what ought to take place in the charge room, do you think it is expedient that the duty of taking or refusing a charge should be placed upon a different class of public officer?—I do not know exactly what kind of official you have in view or from what class he might be taken, whether he would be a lawyer or a civilian or what he would be.

44386. We have been told in the evidence we have received from Scotland that there is an officer there called Procurator Fiscal, that is, he is public prosecutor, and therefore as public prosecutor he has to determine whether he will or will not prosecute when the prisoner is brought under arrest to him. Of course, it works out in a big place like Glasgow in this way: The Procurator Fiscal is a lawyer, and he appoints deputies, who are called lieutenants, who are in charge of the various police stations, and these lieutenants are not appointed in the usual way in which other officers of the police are appointed, but they are appointed with the understanding that they have some knowledge with regard to procedure and principles of law. In London, I understand, the Inspectors mostly are appointed from the lower grades of the Force?—Yes.

44387. (Mr. Whitmore.) Entirely?—I understand so. How would that Scottish system work in London, with all the different police stations? Would the Procurator Fiscal have a lieutenant on duty at every hour of the night at every one of the police stations?

44389. My suggestion simply is this, that there is a very responsible duty which has to be performed by an Inspector. Under the present system the Inspector is simply a sergeant or a constable who has been promoted from the lower ranks of the Force. There is no guarantee that he has any knowledge of law or procedure?—No.

44390. Do you think it would be an advantage that only such persons as have some special knowledge of that kind should be appointed?—I think so distinctly, if it could be brought into actual practice.

44391. (Mr. Whitmore.) That would make the preliminary inquiry more judicial?—Not more. It would be as judicial with a better judge.

44392. It would be emphasising the judicial character of it?—Yes. If a judicial inquiry of some kind cannot be avoided at a police station, then I think it is desirable that the judicial officer should be as competent and as impartial as you can get. If it can be avoided, if it can be done, as I say, in an executive way, simply by taking the charge and taking bail, well and good.

44394. What is your general impression? Are the complaints well founded?—There, again, it belongs to the same class of complaint to which I have already alluded. There are no means of getting at the truth. You can believe or you can disbelieve. It is denied generally, and how can you probe it further?

44395. With regard to bail, we know what the regulations as to the taking of bail at the police stations are, but suggestions have been made to us in the course of our inquiry that the sureties or the intending sureties are kept waiting an undue time, or that the police do not send as directed, and so on, to the friends of the prisoner. Do they ever complain to you of that?—No. The only form of complaint I have heard with regard to bail is that the sureties are too long in coming—not that they are kept waiting too long at the station when they are there, but that the prisoners cannot get their bail quite fast enough, which does not necessarily mean any blame on the part of the police at all.

44396. With regard to medical attendance on prisoners, do you recollect any case in which an Inspector has neglected to send for a doctor when he ought to have sent for him?—I should say it is just the other way. I should say the doctor is sent for very often when he is not required at all. The smallest scratch which draws a little blood from the face of a man or woman, the doctor is sent for, and 7s. 6d. goes down in the bill. I think in many cases they might be spared their attendance, because the costs are very serious—7s. 6d. for medical attendance, where often a little cold water and a sponge is all that is required.

44398. I do not quite follow that. If the person is injured it is the duty of the Inspector to send for the Divisional Surgeon: "If prisoners are insensible, from drink, or any other cause, or appear to be ill, or injured in any way, although they do not complain, the Divisional Surgeon is to be sent for"?—I do not think there is any blame to the police; but there is the practice in point of fact that the surgeon is sometimes sent for when he is not in the least required, and I think it would be very desirable with regard to medical men, although I suppose it is impracticable, that they should agree on some standard which they would adopt as a test in cases of drunkenness.

44399. I was just coming to that. You have anticipated my question, but will you please continue? What do you mean?—I mean this. Constantly a man may be charged before me with drunkenness, and he replies he has not been drunk. Then I have cross-examined the constable, and I have ascertained that the prisoner was able to walk to the station without assistance, that he knew what he was charged with, and that his answers there were rational. When that state of things is established to my mind it is rather rash to say that such a person is drunk. I do not say it is impossible. Then comes the doctor's evidence, and although the doctor has satisfied himself that the prisoner perhaps may answer quite rationally, and explain his conduct, and so on, and give every proof in his power that he is a sober person, yet the doctor will require him perhaps to walk along a board, and will look at his tongue, and examine his eyes, and that sort of thing, and then upon the result of those inquiries of his own pronounce the man to be drunk. Personally, I never feel myself satisfied with that kind of evidence, although it is expert evidence. I think if the man appears rational and answers rationally, and he has walked to the station, that is strong enough to upset the expert theories; there is a very great difference in the way doctors diagnose drunken cases—a great difference.

44400. Do you in practice rely upon the ordinary tests that a man, not a doctor, would adopt with regard to the matter, or do you rely very greatly on medical testimony?—I prefer myself common sense to some expert wisdom, but, of course, one must pay regard to it.

44401. What is your practice about medical certificates? Do you receive them?—The practice is merely to have the certificate in Court, without the attendance of the doctor who signs it, but of course it does not rest there. Whenever there is a medical certificate attached to the case and produced in Court, the prisoner's attention is drawn to it. That is the course I always take. I draw his attention to it and read it to him, and ask him what he has to say about it. If he disputes it, then I ask him: "Would you like to see the doctor who has drawn it up and signed it?" and if he says "Yes," then I put him back, and the doctor is sent for.

44402. Then who sends you the certificate? I do not suppose it would affect your mind in the least, because you are a man who has had such long experience in these cases, but it seems to me rather unfair for the prosecuting policeman to send you a certificate at all, supposing it is adverse to the prisoner?—That is the practice.

44403. So that when the police-constable begins the case you have before you already a medical certificate saying that the man in the dock was drunk?—Yes, but I do not look at it until after I have heard the evidence of the constable. It is the last thing I look at.

44404. I am not saying it is of any great importance, but it does seem a practice open to question, does it not?—I do not think the prisoner is prejudiced, because he can always see the doctor if he likes. I always give him the opportunity.

44405. The next topic on which I wish to ask you a question or two is with regard to the statutory proceedings under which these cases are dealt with. In the syllabus we sent you you will find a reference to the sections. I suppose those are accurate, are they not?—I think quite. Of course, you can add to them the Inebriates Act.

44407. In what way? Perhaps you will kindly tell us?—There are, as you know, the two statutes under which these cases occur. There is the Police Act with regard to loitering for the purpose of prostitution to the annoyance of passengers, and there is the Vagrancy Act, which provides for loitering and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner. These cases, so far as my experience goes, are chiefly heard at Marlborough Street. I am glad to say we have very few prostitutes at all who come into the Court at Marylebone. If they do come there they are of the very lowest type, those who frequent the parks, but the street prostitutes, in the ordinary popular sense of the word, are almost invariably cases that come to Marlborough Street. I am not sure that I am entirely in accord with what I conceive to be the tradition of that Court with regard to these cases. I think for some time past it has been the practice there, if a prostitute is brought before the Court for disorderly conduct, it is sufficient to prove that she has accosted somebody, and that she is a prostitute. Then the usual inference is that her conduct has been riotous and indecent, and she is fined. I think myself that is rather straining language against these unfortunate women, to hold that mere solicitation necessarily implies riotous and indecent conduct. What they actually do would not be riotous and indecent conduct in anybody else, and I do not think it ought to be more so because they happen to be prostitutes. I think, in cases of this description, where it is a case of simply accosting, and no passer-by actually complains, it ought to be passed over.

44408. I was going to ask you what your view of Sub-section 11 of Section 54 was. "Every common prostitute or nightwalker, loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation, to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers." I was going to ask you what evidence of annoyance you usually require?—They are not usually brought under that statute. They are usually brought under the Vagrancy Act for loitering.

44409. I understand that your view is that simple solicitation does not afford any evidence of riotous or indecent behaviour?—No, I do not think using language, in its fair sense, that it does, unless a person complains. If a person complains and gives his card, as I have often told constables he ought to be asked to do at the time he makes the complaint to the constable in the presence of the woman, then I should be inclined to receive that as evidence that an inhabitant had found reason to complain; but there again I should, of course, give the accused woman the opportunity of having the man in Court if she wished. But simple solicitation I do not think ought to be dealt with in the way it is, because really the offence that the public want to be protected from is when it becomes a street nuisance, when the woman cannot be shaken off, like a persistent or pestilent beggar who you cannot get rid of. That is a real nuisance from which the public should be protected, and I think that neither of these sections may be said quite to meet the difficulty of loose women in the streets of London. I think a very little rectification of language would be all that would be required, and I should suggest that words should be introduced the same as you have in Towns Police Clauses Act, and as you have in the Vagrancy Act of two years ago, directed against male prostitutes, which is simply that the solicitation should be persistent, and that there is some importunity. If you say "persistently solicits or importunes," then you have a well-defined offence for which women have only themselves to thank if they are punished. But casual inoffensive solicitation, limited to a word or two as a woman passes a man—I do not say it is right or desirable—is to my mind straining the language of these sections when it is applied to conduct of that description.

44410. It appears from one of the cases that we heard in camera that at Marlborough Street it is customary to deal with solicitation under Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act. "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned"?—I do not remember ever having a prostitute brought before me under that section. Insulting behaviour is almost invariably limited to cases of hooligans and such like people in the streets whose conduct may lead to a breach of the peace, but I have never heard it applied to a prostitute. I do not say it could not be, but I do not remember any case, A prostitute is either brought into Court for obscene language or for soliciting, but not for insulting behaviour.

44411. (Mr. Dickinson.) There was a statement that there were 158 cases in the year of this kind brought up at Marlborough Street?—You surprise me. I really do not recollect them.

44412. (Chairman.) I should like to give you the statistics about that?—It comes upon me quite as a surprise. I do not remember women being charged with insulting behaviour, except when there is a doubt by the police as to their being prostitutes. Personally, I should be slow to convict in such cases, unless the insulting behaviour tended distinctly to a breach of the peace. Mere accosting would not be sufficient.

44413. (Mr. Dickinson.) You see from the evidence that we have had that this was initiated with the sanction of the magistrate. That is not yourself?—That is not myself. I am not a Marlborough Street Magistrate. I only go there certain weeks in the year.

44414. (Chairman.) I think you have answered sufficiently, and we may now pass on. I may ask you this general question, perhaps. Has the action of the police in recent years tended to diminish solicitation in the streets or the number of prostitutes who frequent the streets?—I am afraid I am quite incapable of answering that. I have no knowledge at all.

Mr. A. C. Plowden.

44415. We have it upon the evidence that there has been a good deal of suppression of disorderly houses lately. We have had that from some of the police evidence. What effect do you think the suppression of disorderly houses has had upon the condition of the streets?—I should think the natural effect of the suppression of these houses must be to increase the number of these women who frequent the streets. Even a prostitute must have somewhere to stand, and if she cannot stand indoors she must stand out of doors. That is only a general inference.

44416. Have you any recommendation to make as to the regulations issued to the police with regard to solicitation cases. We are told, for instance, that they are not to arrest until they have cautioned a woman, and so on, to make perfectly certain that they have seen her about the street for some time, and that there is no doubt about her identity. Have you any suggestion to make with regard to that?—No, I think if that is carried out you cannot expect them to do more, but it is very desirable they should do that.

44417. Do any cases of complaints by women that they have been accosted or spoken to by men come before you?—No, only in cases where there is what you call a bully, which case is provided for by the new Act, men living on the immoral earnings of women, but in no other case.

44418. I was not thinking of that class of case, but communications have been made to us from responsible quarters, through private persons, that a good many ladies are very often annoyed in the streets and parks, and so on, by well-dressed men speaking to them?—I think that is very likely.

44419. Getting into conversation, not, of course, making use of any improper phrases, but beginning a conversation with the obvious intention, at least, with what the woman believes is the obvious intention, of carrying the acquaintance further and making an assignation. How would you deal with any complaint of that kind, supposing a woman had come before you and said that a man had spoken to her in the street and he was complete stranger. What should you conceive to be your position?—I have never had a complaint of that kind made, and I do not see that it could lead to anything unless the lady complaining could give me some identification of the person who had molested her, if she knew who he was. But even then, I do not know what I could do.

44420. Let me put another case that is suggested. Supposing the lady speaks to a constable, and she says to the constable: "Do you see that man there, he has spoken to me, and wants me to come and have tea with him, and he has looked at me in a very improper way," do you think, in the existing state of the law, the constable would be justified in even speaking to the man?—I think he might take him into custody for insulting behaviour. I do not know what else you could call it.

44421. For a stranger to go up to a lady and commence a conversation, which obviously, though not in terms, is insulting her by suggesting that she is amenable to improper behaviour, is insulting behaviour, or some evidence of it?—I think it ought to be so, and I think it would have a very useful effect; but naturally ladies are very reluctant to bring such charges. I have never had one, in point of fact.

44422. The next topic on which I want to ask you some questions is the topic of alleged bribery of constables, or, to put it in another way, the blackmailing by constables of various classes of people. Take first the case of prostitutes. Forming the best conclusion you can from your experience, is there any reason to suppose that the police habitually receive money from prostitutes?—I have never heard a suggestion of it made in court, and I have no knowledge outside the court more than anybody else has. I have never heard a woman make such a complaint in court, or a man.

44423. With regard to the bribery of the police by bookmakers, have you ever heard it suggested that the police take money from bookmakers in order to be allowed to pursue their avocation unmolested?—No, I have not.

44424. The next topic is the duties of constables as to prosecuting. The constable who makes the charge is the prosecutor?—Yes.

44425. He is not usually represented by counsel or solicitor. What is the practice in your court? Does he conduct his case himself?—There is no case to conduct. He gives his evidence. He does not make any statement of any kind, but he simply gives his evidence. He has his important rôles rolled into one.

44426. But we have had it that in Leeds, for instance, the Superintendent or the officer who represents the Superintendent in Leeds, is wishing to obtain a locus standi in the police court, because he thinks that sometimes the police are at a disadvantage. Do you allow the Superintendent or Inspector who may be present to take any part in the proceedings before you?—I have never been asked by an Inspector or Superintendent to assist their own constables in court. I do not think constables want any assistance of that sort. I think they are protected by the court sufficiently.

44427. You do not think that the constables are at a disadvantage, even when the defendant is represented by a counsel or solicitor?—No; the proceedings in a police court are very summary. I may be a very irregular magistrate, and do all sorts of things which are not strictly in accordance with the canons of legal procedure before higher tribunals, but I always look upon it as my object to get at the truth, even if I have to do it a little irregularly, and I put questions to the constables in the witness-box to a very considerable extent in almost every case, and to the prisoners, too; because certainly very often there is no counsel and no solicitor, and I have to get at the truth to the best of my ability. I do not think the police witnesses suffer at all from being in the witness-box, but they have every opportunity given to them of establishing everything they suggest.

44429. You do not, in any case, write to the Chief Commissioner about it?—I have never taken such a course.

44430. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do you think it would be an advantage if some steps could be taken whereby the police could bring witnesses of an occurrence before the court?—I think it is a very great advantage always to have independent testimony in a case, and I think, for the sake of the police themselves, they are always glad if their evidence can be corroborated from an independent quarter; but it is not easy to get these witnesses.

44431. They never do get them, do they?—I think a policeman is very glad to bring a witness if he can, and they sometimes do. I do not think there is any reluctance on their part to bring them.

44432. No; but you say they sometimes do?—Sometimes the occurrence is seen by a bystander, and perhaps he says to the constable: "I will come and give evidence," and the constable is very glad to have him.

44433. We had some evidence from the Chief Constable of Leeds, who told us that they did all they could to make the police bring up witnesses of their own accord from the bystanders. I do not know whether more advantage could be taken of that?—I can only say, speaking for myself, whenever I think a bystander might have been called, and has not been called, I make it the subject of observation to the police. One cannot do more. I make it known as publicly as possible that independent evidence should be forthcoming if it can be procured.

44434. One more question about this Charge Sheet. I take it your opinion is that really what you call the executive theory should take place, so that the matter could be put in train for hearing by the Police Magistrate. That is the theory?—Yes, I think it is more according to the spirit of our Constitution that an accused person should be taken with the least possible delay before a Magistrate, and not before an Inspector, for his protection.

44435. If that were the practice, would that impede the work of the Police Magistrate or help it?—I do not think it would make any susceptible difference. It might mean the bringing of a few more charges than otherwise. I do not know in the least how many charges in the course of a year are refused at a police station. I do not know what the figures are.

44436. In the case of a Police Inquiry do you think if there was a modicum of hearing before the Inspector it would shorten the hearing before the Magistrate?—My impression is that something in the form of a judicial inquiry takes place, but how short or how long it is depends entirely on the Inspector.

44437. Therefore to that extent the case could be presented in a manner which would accelerate matters when it came before the Magistrate?—No; there is no statement of the case in the police court. The constable goes straight into the witness-box. I do not think it would shorten the actual hearing.

44438. From a practical point of view you do not think it would make any difference?—It might add to the number of cases the Magistrate might have to inquire into, but I do not think it would make those cases any shorter in the hearing.

44439. Do you know whether the refused cases are very numerous?—No. As I have said, I have no knowledge one way or the other.

44440. Yes. The discretion which now is the discretion of the Inspector would become the discretion of the Magistrate, which I think is what is intended, and what ought to be, and he would hear it.

44441. You think the theory is capable of being carried out in practice that some initial inquiry should take place, but you think that inquiry ought to be of a different kind, and conducted by different persons?—That is my view.

44443. One question with regard to drunkenness. Do you ever have certificates brought before you signed by the medical officer with the words "Not drunk, but has been drinking"?—Not quite so specific as that. If he said "Not drunk," I should immediately discharge the prisoner. He generally says "Fit to be detained; has been drinking." I think the conscience is salved in that way.

44444. We have had one or two instances of that, and I was wondering whether you would attach any importance to a certificate in those terms, that is to say, that the man, when he was seen by the medical officer, was not drunk, but there was evidence which led him to think that he had been drinking. Would you attach any weight to that?—I have over and over again said for what it is worth that I do not attach importance to evidence with regard to breath. You might just as well say that a man was a teetotaller because his breath smelt of drinking tea. I do not think drunken cases ought to be decided on evidence of that very refined character.

44445. You think the medical officer when he is called in should restrict himself to saying whether the man is drunk when he sees him?—Yes, and the more tersely he can say it the better one way or the other.

44446. (Chairman.) There is one other question which I think I ought to put to you in order to make your proof quite cover the ground. Do complaints of ill-treatment of prisoners at the police station ever reach you?—Yes, occasionally they do complain that they have been roughly treated.

44447. We have had one or two cases of that sort?—They are to my mind not impossible. If a prisoner has shown great resistance on the way to the station I can understand the policeman when he gets him inside giving him a cuff; whether he does or does not I do not know, but it would not be very surprising if he did if his forbearance and patience had been tried. When he gets into the station the curtain drops behind him. There is one other general remark that comes to my mind. I think it might be useful if constables more often availed themselves of the process of summoning people instead of charging them. Sometimes it is difficult, but there is a great objection to standing in the dock on sentimental grounds, and people do not like to be put there unless they have committed some crime. Take the case of a perfectly respectable man employed by some big contractor; he is driving a van through the streets of London when his horse drops lame; he is stopped, taken to the station, put in the dock, and charged as if he had committed a crime. The man usually says "It is not my fault, but it is the fault of my employer who sent me out." Then the employer is summoned. The next day you have the exhibition of one man standing in the dock who is almost sure to be acquitted, and the other who has been summoned who is almost sure to be convicted. Nothing can be more absurd. That is a ludicrous state of things. Then take the case of a costermonger; he is a shifty person and does not necessarily have a name and address which can be relied upon; on small charges of obstruction he is arrested and put in the dock, but if he could be summoned it would be better. In cases of indecency in the street there is sometimes an arrest, but I do not know why they should not be summoned. These are not faults of intention. I make these suggestions simply in the interests of people who have feelings on the subject.

44448. Are we to understand from that that you think that arrests are effected in cases in which the remedy by summons would be equally efficacious?—Yes, I think it would be as efficacious, and I think more legal. Of course the duties of the police are so difficult and so multifarious that it is impossible to suppose they always know the distinction. A distinction should be drawn in the interests of persons who have feelings on the subject. Some people do not mind whether they stand outside the dock or inside it, but some dislike it very much, and they might make it the subject of a grievance.

44449. I do not know whether I asked you whether you have ever had to report a complaint to Scotland Yard?—You did ask me. I never have. I have once or twice granted process against a constable for an assault, but I have not communicated with Scotland Yard before doing so, because I thought it was right that a person complaining should have a summons against anybody else.

44450. My experience from listening to the cases here prompts me to ask you this question. Do you think there is a fear, but probably an unfounded fear, among what I may call the poorer classes, of the police constables in general. Are they afraid of going to the police station?—No, I do not think so. I think the moral influence of the police over the minds of the public is very considerable, but I should not say that it developed a feeling of fear among the people. I think "confidence" more than "fear" is the term to employ.

(Chairman.) We are very much obliged to you for your evidence

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I thought perhaps the Commission would like to know the kind of examination which Inspectors and station sergeants undergo before they are promoted, so I sent for two sets of examination questions which have been published for the purpose of instructing constables, and they are here. I will hand them in.

(Chairman.) We should be very glad to have them.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I call your attention to them because the only difference between the Glasgow Lieutenant and the London police station sergeant or Station Inspector is one of name except this—with regard to the Lieutenant when he is promoted to that office he is withdrawn from all other duties. That is the only distinction between them. I think if you look at the questions you will find that the men are all tested on law, so far as it affects the police.

(Chairman.) I am much obliged. I shall look at those papers with very great interest.

(Mr Dickinson.) There is the fact that the Lieutenant is acting under the Procurator Fiscal instead of under the police.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) There is very little difference in that except that they are entitled to conduct cases in court.

(Mr. Dickinson.) The Procurator Fiscal is an independent officer; he is independent of the police force.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) He is really in the same position as a station sergeant or Station Inspector, with the exception that he is withdrawn from contact with the police, and police duties, outside the station.

(Mr. Dickinson.) Is that so? I did not understand that to be the position of the Procurator Fiscal. I understood that to be the position of the Lieutenant.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes.

(Mr. Dickinson.) The Lieutenant is a member of the force; he is also responsible to the Procurator Fiscal, and the Procurator Fiscal himself is an independent person?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes.

Mr. HORACE SMITH, sworn.

Mr. H. Smith.

44451. (Chairman.) You are one of the London Magistrates, I think?—I am.

44452. When were you first appointed?—In April, 1888.

44453. At what police courts have you had experience as a Magistrate?—For about ten or eleven years at Clerkenwell and North London generally; those are joined together, more or less, and then the rest of the time (I have been a Magistrate 19 years) I have been at Westminster.

44454. I think you have had a communication from us containing the terms of our Reference?—Yes, I have it now before me.

44455. Would you prefer to read a statement as to the points which we suggest in the memorandum about evidence, or would you prefer that I should ask you questions?—Whichever is most convenient to you. Perhaps I might state generally that I agree entirely with every single statement that Sir Albert de Rutzen has made, gathering it merely from the public press.

44456. I need hardly say that in no newspaper was there a full report of what Sir Albert said?—No.

44457. You see that the terms of reference require us to inquire into and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged, with power to make recommendations thereon. I should like to ask you first in general how you would define the duties of constables in the metropolis with regard to those three classes of cases?—I am rather puzzled to answer that question. I do not know exactly what answer is expected to that. If I may say so, it seems so broad a question that I do not quite know what I should say. I do not know whether you mean the police should arrest or not arrest, and so on. If I may say so, if you would ask me the question more in detail I should be better able to answer it.

44458. Then we will go a little further into details as I proceed with the syllabus. Perhaps you might answer this next general question: Are the duties of the police, as far as your experience goes, and so far as you can judge from your observation as a Magistrate, discharged, as a rule, with discretion, honesty and efficiency?—I think so, most certainly, as far as can be.

44459. I suppose, occasionally, allegations are made against the police by persons coming before you either as complainants or as defendants?—Very frequently.

44460. Do you happen to recollect any recent case of misconduct which has come under your notice—misconduct which you have had to inquire into?—I have had cases of misconduct which I have had to inquire into, but I have had no alleged ill-conduct on the part of the police proved before me. Defendants and witnesses have accused the police of all manner of things, but I do not remember since I was at Clerkenwell anything of the sort occurring; and then that is a long time ago, and I do not want to enter into the past history of that. In fact, I do not remember the circumstances, but I do remember on one occasion having to say that I was entirely dissatisfied with two police constables, and they were, as I heard afterwards, dismissed from the force. But that must be 15 or 16 years ago—15, at all events—and I have had no reason to complain in that way since.

44461. Then I may take it that you have had no occasion to call the attention of the Chief Commissioner or of the Home Office to the conduct of any constable in any case that has come before you?—Not at all since that time. I have not done so at all.

44462. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Does that mean that during the last 15 years you have never had occasion to complain of the conduct of the police?—Yes, I have not had occasion at all.

44463. (Chairman.) The next question that we put to your colleagues is this: Have you any comments or criticisms upon or recommendations to make as to the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force as to these three classes of cases?—I do not think I have, except I should like to suggest—I do not know how far it can be done, I hope it is not an odd thing for me perhaps to say, but I think that the police require some protection in the Magistrate's court; that is to say, that the defendant is now a witness, and supposing that the witness makes allegations against the police, who is to cross-examine and who is to protect the police against these aspersions that are made? I can hardly do it from the bench. I cannot undertake to cross-examine all the witnesses on behalf of the police; I do not think that would be right, and the policeman cannot do it himself, because he is not educated sufficiently to cross-examine the witnesses, and therefore it is left with the charges made against the police which they are unable to meet. Of course, if charges of that sort are made against the police, I remand the prisoner, and say that somebody must appear from the Chief Commissioner's staff to cross-examine the witness. I do not know whether I make myself clear.

44464. Perfectly. I will return to that later on, because there are certain specific questions which I propose to put to you as to the position of the constable who is making the charge, and who is the prosecutor in your court. So much, then, for the four general questions that we have suggested. Do you know the rules and regulations which have been framed for the guidance of the police and which are issued to constables in the form of the Instruction Book?—I have read them, but I do not think I have looked at them lately much. I could do so, of course, if you desired that I should.

44465. We call it the White Book. You know what I mean?—Oh, yes, quite well. I know the book, and I have read it.

44466. Have you any suggestion to make as to amending the arrangement, for instance, of those regulations?—I do not think so. I do not think that I know of anything that I can suggest.

44467. Do you happen to know of any regulation which in your opinion requires amendment in substance?—I do not think so.

44468. I was thinking, for instance, of "Arrest." Taking the general head of "Arrest," do you think that the regulations as to the methods in which the arrest is to be effected are proper and well devised?—As far as I remember they are, and as far as I know the practice of the police seems to be right. Whether if my attention was called to the particular rule I might suggest an alteration of the wording, or something like that, I cannot say, but I am not aware of any point.

44469. As to the way in which the police in practice do arrest prisoners, do prisoners make complaint before you from time to time as to being roughly treated or being treated with unnecessary violence on being taken from the place of arrest to the police station?—Of course some of them do, and some of them certainly do not. Some make complaints which I think often arise from the necessity of the case. A woman will say that she has been bruised on the arm or something like that, and complains of it, but the charge being drunk and disorderly, and there being perhaps 100 people collected around, and so on, one is not surprised at that. Of course, any complaint of that sort I inquire into, and ask if the doctor has seen her, or whether she would like to see a doctor, and that sort of thing, but I am not aware that the police exceed in violence in any way. They seem to me, I must say, very gentle in their handling—marvellously gentle, but I think they are mostly very strong men, and are able to be gentle where weaker men might be obliged to be violent.

44470. Then am I to infer from that answer that so far as you can form an opinion no complaints of that kind that have been made before you have been justified or well founded?—Certainly.

44471. Do you think, or have you any ground for suspecting, that constables use the power of summary arrest unnecessarily, and that they are too prone to take people into custody?—I do not think so; indeed, I should rather suspect them of the other thing sometimes—letting people off when they might arrest them.

44472. You rather suggest that they neglect to take people into custody whom they ought on a stricter construction of their duty to arrest?—Yes, from overcaution, I think.

44473. Do they ever summarily arrest persons whose names and addresses are known or might easily be ascertained instead of taking proceedings against them by summons?—I do not think so.

44475. Then I come to the question of the charge room. I suppose that you have naturally no direct knowledge of what actually does take place in the charge room?—I think I could hardly make any useful observation about that, owing to the fact that I have never been there to see the thing carried through. I am afraid I might make a perfectly useless and senseless observation, because I have really no knowledge of the subject.

44476. But you have read what is stated in the White Book as to the duties of the Inspector in charge of the station?—Yes.

44477. You know when the prisoner is brought in custody of a policeman to the charge room it is the duty of the Inspector either to take or refuse the charge?—Yes.

44478. And in doing that to comply with the regulations which are contained in the Instruction Book?—Yes.

44479. Then I understand you to say that you do not know in fact how the charges are taken or refused?—I can hardly tell. I often have to call an Inspector where a defendant is charged with being drunk and disorderly, and he says he was not drunk when he got to the charge room. Then I have the Inspector fetched, and ask him what happened in the charge room, but I have never found that anything was wrong in what happened.

44480. But supposing the Inspector takes a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct against the prisoner, and you come to the conclusion that the prisoner was innocent of the charge, and dismiss the charge, does that involve any reflection upon the conduct of the Inspector in taking the charge?—I almost think it would unless he could suggest some reason. He might have made some peculiar mistake—I could not tell what mistake, but all human beings make mistakes—and he may have made an absolutely foolish mistake, but I have never had anything of that sort. I always send for the Inspector, and the Inspector says the man was drunk, and then the man comes back and says he knows he was when he is faced by the doctor and the Inspector.

44481. That I can quite understand. I can imagine, for instance, a case in which a constable who arrested the prisoner comes before you and says the man was drunk and disorderly, and describes the conduct and the arrest. Then I can understand also the Inspector coming before you and saying, "Well, I thought the man was drunk, and I accepted the charge," but I can also imagine that even upon that evidence you might come to the conclusion that the charge was unfounded and discharge the prisoner. Has a case like that ever occurred?—No, never. Besides, I should go further. If I had any doubt as you suggest, I would call both the constable and the Inspector, and I might very well doubt their evidence as against the evidence of the defendant, who possibly also might have a witness and so raise a doubt, but then I have still the doctor probably, or, at all events, the fact that the defendant did not ask for a doctor. I do not think that anything could be quite perfectly safe. You may think it is possible, and so it would be possible that all these persons may be mistaken. The defendant may have asked for a doctor and the Inspector refused to send for one, but I have never had such a case. They always do send for a doctor if the defendant asks for it.

44482. I will come to the question of the value of the doctor's evidence in that class of case in a moment. At present I am only putting to you by way of hypothesis that there is a conflict of evidence before you on the issue whether the defendant was or was not drunk, and you decide in his favour. I presume you would give him the benefit of any reasonable doubt that you felt in the matter?—Yes.

44483. Supposing you discharge him, does that in your view imply any blame to the Inspector who took the charge?—I do not think it does imply necessarily any blame, but it might very well mean blame, and then I should give my opinion upon it. I should say in that case I am not satisfied with the evidence that has been brought by the police.

44484. The Inspector may be of opinion, and you with your greater advantages sitting in court and listening to a greater body of evidence might come to a contrary conclusion?—Yes, that may be.

44485. Then may I take it that you do not recollect any case in which an Inspector was clearly obviously wrong or negligent in taking a charge?—No, certainly not. I am not aware of any such case.

44486. Do you recollect any case in which you thought an Inspector had taken a charge with a view to shielding the constable who had arrested the man from proceedings or from disfavour?—No, I am not aware of anything of the sort. I should very much doubt if it could be done. They are under stricter discipline than that.

44487. Let me put the question in another form rather. Does your experience lead you to believe that Inspectors sometimes form a kind of professional bias or from habit take charges that a Magistrate or other competent and unbiassed person not connected with the police would refuse if he was at the station. What answer do you make to that suggestion or question?—I suppose that Inspectors, like other people, will have professional bias and keenness, and the same remark may apply to constables. They are a sort of experts, and keen about their employment in a way. I daresay they may have some bias, but certainly I have not noticed it in any inspector. I have never had the slightest occasion to think that the Inspectors try to protect a constable or anything of that sort. On the contrary, I notice they are extremely alert to listen to the constable's evidence, and to take a mental note when he does not give his evidence quite as he should—not speaking up, and that kind of thing—and they let him understand that he is not to give hearsay evidence. I have seen Inspectors watching with great keenness to see that the police do their duty in court, and I have no doubt it is part of their duty to be there and to see that they do their duty in court; but I have no reason to complain of any bias on the part of the Inspectors. I think they are all very fair-minded men, as far as I have seen anything of them.

44488. These questions have been put with a view to leading up to a general question: What is your view of the character or nature of the proceedings in the charge room? Do you regard them as being in any sense of a judicial nature or are they merely of an executive nature? On page 4 of the syllabus you will find a more detailed question than that, but that is the topic on which I wish to ascertain your opinion?—I should say there must be some sort of investigation, of course. The charge is made by the police-constable, and probably the Inspector asks what he means by a certain expression, and that kind of thing. I think that may be done, but I should say there ought to be no trial of the guilt or innocence of the person charged. I think that would be very improper, to have anything like a trial of the guilt or innocence of the prisoner before the Inspector. It should be very preliminary, as much preliminary as can be, rather than have the police examining and cross-examining in the charge-room, trying whether the man be innocent or guilty. I think that would be a very retrograde movement, if I may say so, and would be wrong.

Mr. H. Smith.

44489. I rather gather from your answer that the proceedings in the charge-room are something more than a mere check on the action of the constable, and a means of securing the attendance of the person arrested at the police court by making arrangements for his due custody or his release on bail?—I think a little more than that. The Inspector might have in his discretion a right to ask some questions which might lead to the innocence of the prisoner. I can hardly suggest a particular case, but something may be said as to the nature of the charge, and the Inspector may find out that the person before him was a respectable person or something like that, and then make further investigation. So that I would not compel them to keep absolute silence, but I should rather caution the Inspectors that they must not try the case before it comes into court, which they might be disposed to do.

44490. The regulations in the White Book appear to contemplate the case of the prisoner calling witnesses, or not exactly calling them in the strict technical sense, but asking the Inspector to hear what his witnesses or friends have to say?—Yes. I should think at the request of the person charged that might be done, but not then to try and cross-examine these witnesses and to call counter evidence, and so on. I do not think that that would be a proper thing to be done by any other authority than the Magistrate.

44491. There does not appear to be any power given to the Inspector to bind over the witnesses to appear at the police court. Why, then, should the duty of listening to the witnesses be thrown on the Inspector by the regulations in the White Book?—I was not aware that it was so. I should have thought the thing was rather in the discretion in each particular case of the Inspector. In some cases where, from the nature of the thing, the aspect of the persons who come before him, the police being injured or the defendant being injured, as the case may be, then I should have thought he might say, "I do not quite understand this charge. You say you want to call your friends to say that the police have illtreated you, or something of that sort. I should like to see your friends." I think he might go so far as that if in his discretion he thought fit.

44492. What I was suggesting was this, that possibly regulations as to the proceedings in the charge-room might be made to this effect, that first the constable makes the charge, and then the Inspector is to see that it is a charge which implies an offence for which the arrest was justified—that is to say, supposing it was a drunk and disorderly case under one of these sections that have been referred to, the Inspector's first duty would be to see as to the form of the charge. Then he would ask the constable, when was the arrest made. Then when the constable has stated that, he might enter the charge, and ask the prisoner what he had to say, and listen to any witnesses who might have accompanied the prisoner there, or might ask them into the charge-room and then bind the witnesses over to appear the next day before the court. In other words, he would listen to their statements, but he would not be asked to form any opinion as to the truth of anyone's statement, but he would simply as executive officer take steps for securing the attendance of the policeman who had arrested the defendant, and the attendance of the defendant and his witnesses at the court to determine the truth or falsehood of the charge?—I should have thought that might be a very useful thing myself. There is no power of that sort at present that I know of.

44493. If that was all the Inspector had to do I think his action would be merely executive?—Yes.

44494. That is to say, wherever a constable makes what is prima-facie a charge of an offence triable in your court, and which justifies a summary arrest, that the charge should be taken and everybody concerned simply bound over to appear before you?—Yes.

44495. That would be simply an executive action, would it not?—I suppose it would.

44497. But supposing the Inspector takes a very strong view that a prisoner who has been arrested, we will say, for being drunk and disorderly is not in fact drunk at the police station a minute or a few minutes after the arrest is made. I understand the charges are sometimes refused on that ground. Is not the Inspector in that case discharging what is a judicial duty?—I suppose he is technically, but it seems to me that every human being has a right to reject absolute nonsense that is put before him. That is the sort of thing, if it is obviously absurd.

44498. The reason I am asking these questions is that I suggest to you in some cases there is damage to reputation sustained by innocent persons in consequence of their being arrested on one of these charges and being put upon their trial even though the charge is dismissed by the Magistrate, and they leave the court, to use a common phrase, without a stain upon their character. Is not that the case?—I know of no such case, but that such a case might occur, of course, is obvious. I can only say that I know of no such case.

44499. You do not think that there is any possible grievance which might be done away with by altering the regulations for the conduct of business in the charge room?—No, nothing occurs to me in that respect. As to the absolute conduct of the proceedings in the charge room, of course, I do not know anything. I do not know what the charge room is like even.

44500. I daresay you are aware that Mr. Plowden suggested that great and unnecessary damage is sometimes inflicted on innocent people by a charge that never ought to have been taken being taken. I am not using Mr. Plowden's exact words, but that was in substance what he said?—I do not concur with what Mr. Plowden said in that respect, as I saw it reported in the newspapers. I entirely disagree with what he said about people of public position being brought into the Magistrates' room in order that the Magistrate might first of all hear in camera the charge that is made against a person of, I think Mr. Plowden said, official position. After all I am only speaking from the newspaper report, but all I can say is I think it would be a most deplorable thing that a Magistrate should be allowed in private to investigate certain cases which are brought before him. I think it all ought to be done in open court. It may be most unfortunate, of course, for the person charged.

44501. That is only one suggestion in Mr. Plowden's evidence for removing a possible grievance?—The report I read made a point of that as being something rather unusual, and I think it is unusual, and I disagree with it.

44502. Let me suggest to you what might be possibly a reasonable alteration in the Regulations for proceedings in the charge room which cannot be open to the kind of objection that you have been making to an investigation in camera. My suggestion is this: Supposing the Inspector is doubtful about the question whether the charge ought or ought not to be taken, supposing he thinks that though the constable makes out a prima facie case, yet the Inspector thinks, taking into account all the circumstances, that it is not likely the charge will be sustained before the Magistrate, might not the Inspector have the power in the first instance of releasing the prisoner upon his giving sufficient bail for his appearance, not in Court but at the police station, at a future time in order that then the question of taking or refusing the charge may be determined. You will see that question referred to on page 4 of our syllabus?—I know the question, and I have thought about it, but I should think it is making the case to be tried before the Inspector. That is what it comes to.

44503. No, I think not?—Practically it comes to that. It does not in the terms in which you put it, but practically if the Inspector is to take bail and make further inquiries and all that, that is practically doing what the Magistrate ought to be doing in open Court. That is my answer to it, and I am afraid it would be so.

44504. At present, I suppose, there is no doubt the only thing the Inspector can do is either to at once refuse the charge and discharge the prisoner, or, secondly, to accept the charge and keep the prisoner in custody or let him out on bail to appear before you at 10 o'clock the next morning?—I think so; I should not like to disturb that arrangement. I think it is the right one.

44505. You will understand I am not expressing any opinion upon these questions. I am only putting them to you to elicit your opinion upon them?—I am very glad to answer all I can with regard to them.

44506. Then I understand your view is that it would not be expedient to alter the present regulations for the proceedings in the charge room?—I do not think so.

44507. Or the existing law bearing upon the question of arrest and the taking of the charge?—No. As far as I have any knowledge of the charges which come into Court I do not think anything has been done wrong in the charge room, as far I know.

44508. I will put the question, although one can anticipate your answer after what you have said, do you think it would be expedient to cast the duty of taking or refusing a charge upon public servants not members of the Police Force and not appointed by the Chief Commissioner or other police authority—in other words, to give the duties which are at present discharged by an Inspector in the Force to another class of public servant?—I cannot myself understand how that would work at all. I should have thought it would not work at all well. I do not know who he is to be or how long he is to sit, or how many relays of laymen you would have to work it out, and so on, and I should have thought the expense would be enormous, and, in point of fact, it would be a trial before the trial before me, and I should be sitting as a Court of Appeal. I do not think that is possible.

44509. All those are details that would have to be determined upon. The question I am putting to you is merely a question of principle?—Yes, but the details would have to be gone into, and I do not understand how it could be arranged myself.

44510. Then passing from the charge room to the cells, do you find that prisoners often complain of their treatment in the cells?—No, I think not. Certainly not now, but there have been great alterations in late years in that respect. I think they are more commodious.

44511. You do not recollect any instance in which the complaint was well founded?—No, not since the new cells at Westminster have been arranged.

44512. Then with regard to bail, you are, I daresay, acquainted with the regulations as to taking bail?—Yes.

44513. Do you find that the prisoners ever complain that the facilities for obtaining bail are insufficient?—I do not think so now. I think for some reason or other persons did not obtain bail sufficiently easily either from the Police or the Magistrate, but I think we have mended our ways, as far as I know. We are much more ready now to grant bail than we used to be, I think I may say.

44514. There have been suggestions in one or two of the cases which we have inquired into, with some particularly, that the persons coming to bail out a prisoner have been kept unnecessarily long. Do you ever hear that kind of complaint?—No. I have never heard a complaint of that sort made to me.

44515. Then with regard to medical attendance on prisoners, are the regulations as to medical attendance satisfactory?—I think so. Doctors are called in every night to see the persons who are brought in either wounded or drunk, or whatever it may be. Every day in the List you see doctors' expenses charged 7s. 6d. or 3s. 6d. Every day they seem to be in attendance, and I always call for them on the charge if the defendant desires to see a doctor.

44517. You have already made some reference to the intervention of the doctor in cases of alleged drunkenness and disorderly conduct. What is the practice of your Court with regard to receiving medical certificates?—I think the medical certificate is always pinned on to the charge sheet, and I ask to see it. After hearing a defendant say he has had a fit or he was not drunk, I say, "What does the doctor say?" Then the Clerk would say to me, "The doctor says the defendant was drunk," or whatever words he used of that sort.

45518. Do you look at that certificate?—Yes, I practically look at it, or I look at it through the Clerk. I say, "The doctor says, you know, that you were drunk. Would you like to see the doctor in order to cross-examine him and to ask him what you say about your different ailments, and so on—that you were not drunk, but that you were suffering from fits, or something like that?" That is the way I do it, and then if he says he would like to see the doctor, I say, "Very well then, at two o'clock the doctor will be here, and you will be put back to two o'clock, and the doctor will be here for you to cross-examine." Then I say at the same time "I should like the Inspector of Police to be here as well, and then we can try the whole case, and you can call any witness you have got to say that you were sober, and when you were last sober, and so on, and anything you like. It is all adjourned to two o'clock." I do that as an invariable practice. I do not use the certificate as being evidence, because it is not.

44519. You say it is not a part of the evidence in the case?—No, it is no part of the evidence, but I invite the defendant to say whether he would like to have the doctor in order that he may ask him what he means by what he apparently has said. That is all.

44520. As I understand it, you first of all hear what the police and constable who is prosecuting and any witness may have to say?—Yes.

44521. Then you ask the defendant, I suppose, whether he wishes to be called and give evidence?—Yes, and whether he would like to know what the doctor said.

45522. Before he has made his defence?—Oh, no, certainly not. Let him say what he has to say first of all, and then probably he or she tells a very long story about it, and say they never were drunk, and they never had anything to drink, and this, that, and the other, and then perhaps I call back the policeman, and say, "How do you know he was drunk?" "Well, he smelt of gin or something or other." Whatever sign he noticed. Then after this has been going on, I say, "The doctor, you know, seems to have certified that you were drunk. I have his certificate here in Court. If you like to have him here you can ask him how he knew what he says."

44523. You would not ask any questions of the defendant, I presume, unless the defendant has taken the book and been sworn?—Oh, no, that is not asking him a question, that is only asking him how he would like to conduct his case. All these poor people who come before one cannot ask questions themselves. They have not the ghost of an idea how to ask a question; they cannot do it, and I have to exercise a fatherly superintendence over them, and say, "What is it you would like to do?" The gaoler would say, "Ask questions—you must ask questions of the witness." I say, "Do not do that—is there anything you would like to say to me, and I will ask the question if you like, if you cannot ask it," and so on.

44524. Do you ever remember a case in which a certificate that the defendant was sober was affixed to the charge-sheet?—I do not know whether I can say that I recollect the case of a man being certified to be sober, but I have seen several certificates which admit that he was not drunk, and upon which I have acted, and discharged the prisoner. The doctor has said he was suffering from hysteria, or something of that sort, but not drunkenness.

44525. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Does that mean that the charge was taken, although the doctor had given that certificate?—Yes, but not that the defendant was sober. I have never seen that on the certificate, but I have seen statements that would lead me to suppose that the man was not drunk—that he had suffered from over-drinking, but was not drunk at the time, and things of that sort.

Mr. H. Smith.

44526. (Chairman.) Not drunk now, but suffering from the effects of excessive drinking?—Yes, and that an hour had elapsed—a certificate of that sort. All those things want to be looked at and examined.

44527. I do not quite understand whether the certificate is put in by anybody. It does not seem to me as if it would be evidence unless the doctor came and refreshed his memory?—No. I should say of that certificate, like I do of every other certificate, it is not evidence at all unless the person is called; but I let the defendant call the doctor, or I will say, "I will call the doctor if you like, and you can cross-examine the doctor," and so on.

44528. The certificate, as I understand, is pinned to the charge-sheet?—Yes; it is pinned for the convenience of the clerk in turning over the charge-sheets until he comes to the certificate in the particular case.

44529. I still do not quite understand the part the certificate plays in the trial. If you look at the certificate, and you see there that the doctor certifies that the man was drunk, that must affect your mind a little, must it not? Supposing you look at it when the charge-sheet is handed up, or before the proceedings commence?—I do not look at it before the proceedings commence. I only look at it at the time when I am going to say what the man is going to be fined. The whole case is practically over as far as the evidence goes, and I say, "7s. 6d. for the doctor. Was there a doctor?" The wretched prisoner in 99 cases out of 100 has no idea of evidence or anything of that sort, or how to manage it, and I have to do the best I can. The charges are entered in my book, and there will be written in, "7s. 6d. for the doctor," or "3s. 6d.," as the case may be. Then I say, "Oh, I suppose that must come in in some form into the fine," or perhaps there is no fine, but only the doctor's fee charged, or something like that. I should look at the book in that way, and then I say to the clerk, "Oh, there is a certificate." Then I reopen the thing, and I say, "Would you like to call the doctor, because I see the doctor was called in, and would you like to ask the doctor whether he thinks you were drunk or not? I can tell you he says here you were this, that, or the other," whatever he says. "Would you like to have him here, and we will ask him how he knows you were drunk?" and so on; but the certificate is not put in before me at all as evidence.

44530. Then I take it you do not look at the certificate till the close of the proceedings, but you look at it by way of further assurance, and when you know there is a doctor in the case you give the defendant the option of having the doctor called?—Yes.

44531. Supposing the doctor is called as a witness, who is to pay his costs of the day?—I am afraid I cannot tell you.

44532. Whose witness would he be? Supposing the defendant complies with your request, would he be treated as the defendant's witness or the prosecutor's witness?—I ought to be able to tell you, but I really do not know what the clerk does in the end, I am sure; I am afraid I cannot tell you who pays the cost of that. It is done certainly at my request.

44533. I do not quite understand about the doctor's fee for the certificate—7s. 6d. You said something about putting it in the fine?—After 10 o'clock it is 7s. 6d., and before 10 o'clock it is 3s. 6d.

44534. The amount is immaterial for my purpose. But, supposing you fined a prisoner 40s., to what fund does that money go?—That goes to the General Police Fund, I think, but really I am afraid I am not much up to that part. It is rather an office subject to see where the fines go, but I put the doctor's fee in my mind as part of the fine in order to simplify the thing. It makes a difference in the accountants going over the books, no doubt, to see what is the cost of the doctor or whether it is part of the fine.

44535. I do not quite follow that, because I could understand your saying the fine is to be 10s., and the defendant must pay the costs; and if 7s. 6d. is payable to the doctor for the certificate it is part of the costs of the prosecution, and the defendant would have to pay those costs to the prosecution. What I do not understand quite is what you mean by saying you fine the defendant the amount of the doctor's fee?—I put it into the fine. I do not know whether it is exactly the logical way of doing the thing.

44536. I am told by my learned colleague, Mr. Rufus Isaacs, that there is a regulation that if a prisoner sends for a doctor the prisoner is bound to pay the fee of the doctor, which, as you say, is after 10 o'clock 7s. 6d., but that does not explain the difficulty which is in my mind about your treating the doctor's fee as a fine. Supposing you find the prisoner guilty, either the Court fines him or does not fine him?—You mean that I should make it 7s. 6d. costs instead of 7s. 6d. fine. That may be so; I do not know which fund it ought to go to.

44537. You say you fine him 7s. 6d.?—It is a fine of 7s. 6d., and it is treated as a fine.

44538. (Mr. Whitmore.) In addition to the 40s., or whatever it may be?—Oh, no.

44539. As part of the 40s.?—Yes. Very often I look at the charge-sheet, and I say: "Oh, there is 7s. 6d. for the doctor." I am disposed to let the man off if it is his first offence, and if he promises me not to do it again I would let him off; but, "Halloa, here is 7s. 6d. for the doctor." Then I say, "7s. 6d. fine, or five days."

44540. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Does that mean he has paid 7s. 6d. for the doctor, or does it mean that somebody else has to pay 7s. 6d. for the doctor?—That is including the fee of the doctor.

44541. (Mr. Dickinson.) You mean in the ordinary case, when a charge of drunkenness is brought in, and the police send for the Divisional Surgeon, then the police have to pay 7s. 6d.?—Yes.

44542. And, finding the man was drunk, you make him pay the 7s. 6d.?—Yes, and I enter it in my book.

44543. (Chairman.) Then the simple way of answering my question is to say what order is made by the Court. You believe the man was guilty, but you think it was not a serious case, and you say, "I will not fine him, but there is 7s. 6d. for the doctor." How does the order of the Court read?—Absolutely, 7s. 6d. fine or five days.

44544. 7s. 6d. or five days?—Yes.

44545. That is the order of the Court?—Yes.

44546. You do not know what becomes of the 7s. 6d.?—No, that is a thing that I do not know. What particular fund it goes into, and whether it ought to be directed to another fund or not I do not know. It is some years now since I have had occasion to think about it, but that is what I have done for years and years, ever since I have been a Magistrate.

44547. Now we will come to Head 7 on page 5 of our memorandum. Under what statutory provisions are cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets dealt with? Do you agree with what Sir Edward Henry told us about that?—I am afraid I have not followed the evidence, and I am afraid I do not know what he said.

44548. Do you find any special difficulty in the application of any of the statutory provisions in the individual cases owing to ambiguity of language or other causes connected with the language of the Acts?—I must say I think, if it could be done, it would be very advantageous to have some consolidation of these various statutes. There are so many of them, and the procedure is so different under one or the other. Although the offence charged may be really identical, yet the procedure is entirely different. In some cases you can give hard labour, and in some you cannot; and in some the fine can be collected by distress and in some it cannot, and so on. These offences all arise under different statutes, and it is a troublesome thing to hunt them all up. There is one thing, I think, with regard to arresting prostitutes, that now it has become the custom apparently to charge them with being violent or using violent conduct which may lead to a breach of the peace. It seems to me that that is absolutely foolish.

44549. Is that in solicitation cases?—Yes.

44550. I was coming to that?—That is one of those things that is found roaming about some of the Acts of Parliament. Somebody has found out this particular thing, and invented that as applicable to prostitutes. It could not have meant anything of the sort, and it means quite different conduct. Going up and hitting a man in the eye is violent conduct which leads to a breach of the peace. But a woman coming up to a man and saying, "Will you come home with me?" is not violent conduct leading to a breach of the peace, and I do not think it ought to be so held.

44551. Do you have a good many of these solicitation cases to try at Westminster?—Not a very great many—nothing like Marlborough Street.

44553. The evidence of one constable is sufficient on that point, in your opinion?—I do not say that at all. It depends on what sort of evidence it is that he gives and how it consorts with the rest of the circumstances of the particular case.

44554. What evidence do you require of the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers?—I do not think generally that cases are brought in my court under that particular section. Is that the Vagrancy Act you are referring to?

44555. No, the Police Act, Section 54, Sub-section 11?—When they are charged with being prostitutes I think it is generally under the Vagrancy Act 5 George IV., cap. 83.

44556. The words of the Vagrancy Act are "Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways or any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner." What do you accept as some evidence of riotous or indecent behaviour?—I do not quite understand you. Do you mean what number of witnesses?

44557. No. Supposing a constable charges a woman with having committed an offence under the Vagrancy Act of 1824, he must make a primâ-facie case in court before you?—Yes.

44558. Then he must give first some evidence that the defendant is a common prostitute?—Yes.

44559. That is the first thing?—Yes.

44560. And secondly some evidence that the defendant was wandering in the public streets or public highways or in some place of public resort?—Yes.

44561. And behaving in a riotous or indecent manner?—Yes.

44562. My question is what evidence do you accept as affording the court some evidence of a prima-facie case of riotous or indecent behaviour?—I can only say that it must be riotous, or it must be indecent. You may have both.

44563. Supposing the evidence simply is that the woman, after being cautioned, continued to solicit men in Victoria Street, Westminster, and then the constable goes on to say, "On the last night she spoke to three men, and they went away. The only thing I heard her say was, 'Won't you come home with me, darling?'" or some words of that kind. He then arrested her. Would you accept that as some evidence of riotous or indecent behaviour?—No, I do not think so. I do not think that would be riotous or indecent at all. It would be stretching it very much, I think, just as under the other sections that I have mentioned. I think it is stretching the law very much to say that a breach of the peace may be occasioned.

44564. You have sometimes convicted, I presume, prostitutes under these sections or one of them?—Yes, I think so. For instance, in this case if she had her clothes up over her head and exposing her person, then I should say that was riotous and indecent conduct.

44567. (Mr. Dickinson.) I understood you to say that they did in your court make use of that section?—They have done it in my court, and I have followed the general practice, and I have said that I do not like it. I have sat at Marlborough Street, as we do sometimes sit for a brother magistrate who is ill, and when I have been there I have said, "How is this—surely this is straining the thing very much." They say, "But we do it so now."

44568. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) But the charge of soliciting must come under one or both of those Acts, must it not?—Yes, but I think there is another section.

44569. (Chairman.) Do you remember the last case of solicitation that you tried, the last prostitute that was brought up before you at Westminster?—I think perhaps I ought to tell the Commissioners that I have had three cases since last July of persons charged as being prostitutes and soliciting, or I think in one case it was for having connection in the street, which is more frequently the case in my court. That is what it is generally at Westminster, but I have had three cases where prostitutes have been charged with soliciting, and in which they have accused the police of all sorts of things, and certainly perjury in their evidence, and on each of those three occasions they have called a person into the witness-box who has sworn that he was the husband of the person in the dock and she was a respectable married woman. In two of those cases I adjourned them, and I examined the man who called himself the husband, and asked him where he was married and when he was married, and so on. I found out it was absolute perjury. Two of those cases were tried at the Central Criminal Court before the Common Serjeant or the Recorder, and those men who said they were the husbands of the women in the dock and that they were respectable women have been sentenced one to six months and the other to nine months for perjury. With regard to the other case, I do not know why it was not proceeded with, but it was a most extraordinary case. A man came and swore in the morning that he was the husband of the lady in the dock, that she was a respectable woman, and so on, and stated when he was married and where he was married. I asked him all those questions and he told me. In the afternoon a solicitor came into court to say that he had been instructed by this man to say that all the evidence he had given was absolutely false, that he was not married to the woman at all, and that she had been convicted of being a prostitute more than once. That was the first case that I had, and although the Chief Commissioner sent a solicitor up to say it was a most outrageous thing, and all that, and it was quite clear it was a case of perjury, yet he did not propose to go on with it—at which I was rather surprised. However, it was not gone on with. Then the cases of these other men occurred at different intervals. One was on October 23rd of last year, and the other was on the 30th November. It was found out that those were the most gross cases of perjury that you could possibly have—all three of them. In the case that was not proceeded with the man himself said he had committed perjury, and sent the solicitor in to apologise for having done so, but he was not proceeded against, and why I really do not know, except that perjury cases are not very easy cases to prove, as everybody who is a lawyer knows.

44570. Take one of the cases, the one that is most fresh in your recollection. What was the substance of the police case. What were the material allegations made by the police-constable?—That the woman was soliciting, talking first to one man, then to two men, and then to three—that sort of evidence, and then that she was watched, and then taken up. Then when she comes into court she says, "I am a respectable married woman, and was waiting for my husband," and so on, and she proposes to call her husband.

Mr. H. Smith.

44571. What evidence was there under any one of these sections against the woman if that was all the police said?—There was a good deal of evidence. In one case I remember a peculiar state of things. The defendant said that she had been bitten by a dog, and that her husband had also been bitten by a dog, but the police said she was there with her clothes up, and so on, and she said in excuse for that that she had been bitten by a dog and her husband had too, and that they were both examining their wounds when the policeman came up, and they were not doing anything indecent. Of course, that all had to be inquired into. It did turn out curiously enough as a matter of fact that they had been bitten by a dog, or one of them had at all events, so that there was that amount of truth in it. But they said that they were husband and wife, and were in bed, but they could not endure it any longer, and they had to go out to the hospital to have their dog bites seen to, and it was while they were on their way to have their dog bites seen to that they encountered the police, while, as they said, they were examining the dog bites. There is all that sort of thing.

44572. That does not appear to have been a case of solicitation, but a case of indecent behaviour in the street?—There was a woman charged with soliciting. She said that she was taking her husband's supper, and this was part of the evidence: "My wife has been in the habit for a week of bringing my supper"—this is the evidence for the defendant, but she was not the man's wife at all. "She is a sober woman, clean and respectable. One of the constables called my wife round the corner and made water in front of her." Then I remanded the case. Then he said the name of the woman was entirely wrong; it was a false name, and that she had a husband named John Mills, "but we have been living together. She is not my wife, but she is a respectable woman as far as I know. I shall not answer the question whether she has been in trouble before."

44573. What did the police say?—It was proved the woman had been in custody three or four times, and once at least to the man's own knowledge.

44574. Was that a case of solicitation?—Yes, so my note says.

44575. What was the character of the police evidence? What were the material allegations?—The policeman made the allegation that she was there with a man, and that she had got her clothes up, and so on.

44576. But that is not a case of solicitation, is it?—I think it was charged so.

44577. (Mr. Dickinson.) Might we have the names of the cases?—The dog case was a case of sexual intercourse, but the other case about the supper was a solicitation case.

44578. What was the name of the dog case?—Thomas Bentley. That man Bentley had six months' hard labour for perjury.

44579. Can you give us the name of the other case?—Louisa James and Louisa Wood were both charged with soliciting, and Louisa Wood admitted the offence. Louisa James called Albert Edward James for her defence, who said he was her husband. That was a charge of solicitation. He said she was in the habit of bringing his supper, and so on.

44580. What was the name of the third case?—It is the first one in order of date—Mary Mead. Her mother was a Frenchwoman and her father was an Italian, and she was charged in this way. She called this man who said he was married to her. She was charged with soliciting. This man swore he was married to her five years ago at Holy Trinity Church, Sloane Square. I asked him when he was married, and so on, and he told me there and then. Then he sent a solicitor in the afternoon to say it was all untrue what he had said.

44581. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That was the man who was not charged with perjury?—He was not charged. That was the first case really. I think perhaps they were afraid of the charge of perjury, but when I sent them two others they took them to the Court and they were sentenced.

44582. (Chairman.) Do you remember what the material allegations of the prosecution were in the solicitation case where the defendant said she was taking her husband's supper?—I do not know. I could not tell you that. Of course I could supply you with a note of the evidence. I have only just scribbled down something about it, 44583. Do you remember under which section these solicitation cases came. Was it under the Vagrancy Act or under the Police Act?—I think it was under the Police Act.

44584. Under which section?—She was charged with conduct leading to a breach of the peace, I think.

44586. Quite so, but it clearly appears that the police were speaking the truth. There is no complaint against the police in those cases—I quite gather that, nor have I suggested that there is; but what was the evidence in those solicitation cases in which there was this dreadful perjury. What was the character of the evidence given by the police constable?—I am afraid I cannot tell you that. I suspect it was just seeing them speak. One case was sexual intercourse—the dog case—and the other cases were soliciting, and I suspect it was merely accosting gentlemen.

44587. No evidence of riotous or indecent behaviour?—No, I do not think there was.

44588. And no evidence of annoyance of passengers?—No.

44589. Then the case ought in any case, whether the defendant and her witnesses spoke the truth or not, to have been dismissed, I take it. I understand you to say that there was no evidence in either case of riotous or indecent behaviour?—No, I fancy not.

44590. Or of annoyance of inhabitants or passengers?—No, I think not. That is rather what I have had to complain of.

44591. Then, quite apart from evidence for the defence, I suppose you were prepared to dismiss the case?—I rather bow to what is said by my brother magistrates. It may come within that. It is for the Court above to say whether their interpretation is right or wrong. I think that we are wrong. That is my impression.

44592. (Chairman.) I did not know whether there was any general agreement between the magistrates as to what evidence is sufficient?—I do not wish to say that there is absolutely any agreement, but of course we meet together and talk together, and the general opinion I think is that it is sufficient.

44593. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Your view is that in order to bring them within the law it is necesary to give that interpretation to one or other of these sections so as to make it unnecessary to give specific evidence of accosting and plying the trade of a prostitute?—Yes.

44594. And if it does not come within the two subsections of Section 54 or under the section of the Vagrancy Act no offence is committed by a woman who accosts a man without annoying him or without being guilty of riotous or indecent behaviour?—Yes.

44595. (Chairman.) I daresay my honourable colleagues will ask you some further questions on that point. Now I come to the next head, which is alleged bribery or blackmailing by constables?—I do not know of any such thing.

44596. Have any persons complained in your Court that they have been blackmailed by constables, and have any cases of accepting bribes by constables come to your notice?—None whatever.

44597. Have you any ground for believing bribery of constables by prostitutes or bookmakers is common or widespread?—Not at all—not in the slightest. I have never heard any suggestion of the sort in Court.

44598. Do you find that constables generally do their work in the Courts in a satisfactory way?—I think so, certainly.

44599. And in a fair way towards the defendant?—I think so, certainly.

44600. Do you find that they press the charges unduly?—No, I do not think so. I consider they are expert persons; they are trained to give their evidence; they give their evidence very well, and I should suppose if they wished to tell lies they would do it very cleverly; they give their evidence excellently, and my impression is that they give it very fairly, so far as human nature will permit; I think they give it wonderfully fairly.

44601. Do you approach their evidence with the suspicion that one naturally approaches such evidence?—I do, I think they require watching; a Magistrate also requires watching, but I think there is no harm in that; and I think they are pretty well watched, if I may say so.

44602. Do you think in any case that possibly injustice occurs owing to the fact that the police are not represented by counsel or solicitor?—Yes, I think so. I think it would be very much better, if it could be managed, that there should be somebody representing the police. I think it would be fairer to everybody all round.

44603. I suppose you do not allow the Superintendent or Inspector or other superior officer in court to take any part in the proceedings?—No, I do not; I do not say I do not sometimes. If there is some particular point in the case that I think the Inspector or the constable would know, I say, "You may ask a question like that if you like," for I do not know myself how to ask it—something about the nature of the ground, where it took place, or something like that.

44604. You do allow the Superintendent or Inspector to ask some question of that sort?—Some question that I do not know myself; but when they want to cross-examine I say, "No, you have no right to cross-examine; I cannot allow it."

44605. Supposing there is counsel for the defendant, and the police-constable under cross-examination is getting into difficulty, do you allow the Superintendent or the Inspector to re-examine?—No.

44606. You never do?—No, I do not think they have any right to open their mouths at all except in small testimony.

44607. But my point is this. One of the Chief Constables who has given evidence before us (it was the Chief Constable of Leeds, I think) said there was a strong desire felt that the Superintendent of Police should be given a locus standi in court; but you do not think it is necessary to have counsel or solicitor in every case?—Not in every case, but I think the police might use the liberty more freely than they do to send a solicitor to represent them; and if I remand a case in which there is any difficulty, then I think the police ought certainly to take it up for themselves and send a solicitor.

44608. Can you recollect any case in which a member of the public, quite apart from any actual proceedings instituted or pending in your court, has made complaints against the police—I mean to say, a householder complaining of neglect, or some person saying he saw a constable treat a man very roughly in the street? Have you ever heard any complaints of that kind?—No, none at all.

44609. If you have had no complaints my next question is unnecessary, but perhaps it may serve to recall something to your mind. If any complaint is made, do you communicate it to the Chief Commissioner or to the Home Office?—I have never communicated to either.

44610. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I should like to get this matter quite clear, and to get your view with regard to the way in which solicitation is dealt with in your court by you and other Magistrates. I follow what I think we have been told before, that the offence of solicitation, as we understand it, in order to be punishable in law must come under either two sub-sections of Section 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act or under a particular section of the Vagrancy Act, 1824?—Yes, I think that is so. I do not know of any other section it could come under.

44612. That I take to be clear law. Under sub-section 11 of Section 54 of the Police Act the words are: "Every common prostitute or night walker loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers." As I understand the evidence which you have given, the "annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers" is assumed as proved by evidence that the woman was plying her occupation as a prostitute in the public streets and soliciting and accosting passengers and passers-by?—Yes.

44613. If you get those facts proved, your view of the law, as I understand it, is that that is soliciting "to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers"?—That is so.

44614. As we have heard during these cases, you do not, get, and naturally, presumably, you would not get, the evidence of persons who say they have been annoyed?—We never do, hardly.

44615. You cannot get persons to come forward?—No.

44616. The consequence is you have to assume that if those facts are true and proved, that would be "to the annoyance of the inhabitants and passengers"?—It is not absolutely a good sound basis, is it?

44617. It is for that reason I am putting the question to you. It does not seem to me necessarily to follow. Of course I appreciate the difficulty Magistrates are in in having to deal with this class of offence. Then under the other sub-section the words "Every person who shall use threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned," do not seem to be very apt words to describe the offence of a woman soliciting a man?—No, and they never were meant to apply to it. It is an old Statute that had nothing whatever to do with prostitutes soliciting.

44618. That is a section of a general character to punish for an offence any person who does certain acts which might induce a breach of the peace?—Yes.

44619. That is not the sort of thing you would expect in the case of a woman soliciting a man?—No.

44620. The only words which I conceive it might be brought under are the words "using insulting words or behaviour," but that is not sufficient, because it seems to me to go on, and it is not only the use of insulting behaviour, but it must be "with intent to provoke a breach of the peace"?—Yes, or which may provoke a breach of the peace.

44621. "Or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned"?—Yes, it might; but I do not think it wise to take a section of an Act of Parliament, which never was intended to apply to particular circumstances, and, by squeezing the words, try to make them apply.

44622. You might have facts proved which, in a particular case, as distinguished from the general class of these cases, would amount to "insulting behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace," or which might provoke a breach of the peace?—Yes.

44623. But then that would be met by the sub-section itself, apart altogether from the woman being a prostitute, would it not?—Yes.

44624. Then, in order to come within the Vagrancy Act, there must be "behaving in a riotous or indecent manner"?—Yes.

44625. There, again, if you have any such evidence as exposing the person, or anything of that character, that is an offence apart from a woman being a prostitute or soliciting?—Yes.

44626. And that is what that section is meant to deal with?—Yes.

44628. Of course, within the meaning of that section?—Yes. If you like to wrest the words round to your meaning you can do it, but it takes a deal of doing. I should like to use such a word as "improper behaviour."

44629. It might come in under the words "Common prostitute found wandering in the streets and behaving in an indecent manner"?—Yes. Is it behaving in an indecent manner to say "Will you come home with me?" Behaving in an indecent manner would be exposing the person, or making a noise perhaps with your mouth might be indecent or insulting, and so on, but I do not see how merely that sort of accosting "Will you not come home with me?" or something of that sort, can be. A common prostitute coming up to you, and saying "Good evening" is an annoyance, of course, to anybody, but it is not indecent conduct, and it is not riotous.

Mr. H. Smith.

44630. It would be rather difficult if you had the word "improper." I do not know whether that would carry you any further than "indecent." It might, of course?—It might. Besides, if it was meant to do so, one could say that it did mean what it said, but when you come to old Acts of Parliament, which have nothing whatever to do with the thing, and try to wrest the words round to your meaning, then, as I say, you can do it, but it takes a deal of doing.

44631. I am not expressing any opinion, but, if I follow, your view is that this, if it was meant to be punished by legislature, should be made in terms an offence so that you might know exactly what it was you had to deal with, and that the law should not be, as in your view it is, a little strained in order to get that part of the offence under any one of these sections of the Act of Parliament. That is your view?—That is my view if it could be done. After all, I am not a legislator, and somebody else must make the Acts of Parliament.

44632. But you have to administer them?—Yes.

44633. You would know best what the difficulties are?—I do not know about that.

44634. You have told us about the complaints which have been made before you, but I am not quite sure now whether I correctly apprehend an answer you gave me earlier. I asked you whether during the last fifteen years you had had any occasion to complain of the conduct of any police-constable, and I understand you to say that you had not?—Yes, I do not remember any such case.

44635. That means that during the last fifteen years in all the cases that have come before you, notwithstanding complaints may have been made, in your view they have been unjustified?—Yes.

44636. Would you always investigate any complaints that were made against the police in the course of a case?—Certainly, I should deal with anything of that sort, and I always do.

44637. I will tell you what is in my mind about it. Suppose, for example, you were trying a charge against a person, and that person in giving his statement before you complained of having been ill-treated by the police, either in being taken to the station, or after he was taken to the station, which in itself would have nothing to do with the offence which you were trying, I mean it would not be relative to the charge you were trying, would you, nevertheless, inquire into the conduct of the police?—Certainly, because probably it would affect not the absolute issue of Guilt or Not Guilty, but the possible punishment or sentence.

44638. Then it would be your practice, under such circumstances, to refer the matter to the Commissioner?—No, I do not think so. I am not so very overburdened as I know some of my brother magistrates are with excess of work, and I have not that to complain of at Westminster. I have quite enough work to employ me, but I am very much interested in my work, and I endeavour to do it thoroughly. I mean to say I take endless pains, if I may say so, to try and be fair to both sides, and particularly to the defendants, and to steer them as well as I can.

44639. Most of the charges that are brought in your Court I suppose are charges against poor persons?—Yes.

44640. And mostly against ignorant persons?—Yes, quite so.

44641. You seem to be very much impressed with the ignorance of the defendants who in most cases come before you?—Yes, they cannot defend themselves.

44742. They do not know how to put questions or how to defend themselves?—No.

44643. That might lead to the conviction of an innocent person if there was not sufficient time for the magistrate to inquire very carefully into the whole of the circumstances, might it not?—I think so.

44644. What occurs to my mind on hearing your statement is this. It might be that a poor person was charged who had no notion of how to defend himself, but nevertheless there might be a perfectly good defence which might never be elicited. That is so, is it not?—Certainly, I think so, and I am so impressed with that that I never leave a stone unturned. I ask everybody what they want to say. I say "What do you want to say to me; tell me anything that you can say about the case."

44645. What occurs to my mind is that that person might in a room quietly, and not in a public court, talk more freely?—I often have to do that. I have an excellent missionary at my court, who does everything he possibly can, and he takes the slightest hint from me. If there is something I want to ask, and I can see that there is some reluctance about a defendant to say something or other, or that there is something in the background that they do not like to mention, and so on, then I say, "Let him or her stand back and see the missionary," and I will talk to the missionary afterwards. The missionary comes and tells me some story about a man living with another woman, or something or other, and that sort of thing, and then I see what the defendant's general excuse is. I had a lad the last time I sat charged with snatching a purse. That lad had simply snatched a purse from a lady, and it was a very bad and serious offence. He was nineteen years of age. I thought he looked very downcast, and very curious, and I asked the police, "Do you know anything about him?" The case was clearly proved, and he admitted it; he said he had done it, and, of course, he was out of work. The police could not get anything from that lad at all—who his people were, what he had done, where he had been, or anything at all; the police said they could not find anything out about him. I remanded him for a week for inquiries to be made about him. I thought I ought to send him for three months, and in all probability to send him to the Sessions. The police said they could not find out anything about him. I thought the lad was very curious; I could not make anything of it, and I told the missionary to talk to him. The missionary came back and told me that the lad had been at a Home and at work, and had done well throughout the whole of the time, until just before he had got out of employment and stolen the purse. I think all cases require looking after in that sort of way. I do think some of the Magistrates are over done. Marlborough Street, I should suggest, is decidedly over done, because you cannot go into that kind of thing without some degree of leisure.

44646. That is what was occurring to me. You mean that these cases take up a great deal of time and trouble, but however much time the Magistrate is desirous of giving to it, he cannot do it, and he must leave it to a certain extent to other persons?—Yes.

44647. In those cases it would necessarily follow that some of those persons who were convicted might have a perfectly good defence which had never been raised?—He might even have a good defence, but things are too much hurried, and there is too much pressure of work.

44648. Supposing a young fellow is charged with being drunk, and, having the police evidence against him, he is simply content with a denial—that is to say, he is simply resting on his denial; he seems to be in a very difficult position in court because he has got the police evidence against him?—Yes; but then what can I do? I say, "Can I send to any of your friends, or can you call any evidence as to your character? I will do anything for you I can, because I can easily get anybody you like to call"; but then, as I say, I have more leisure. I hope I do not talk too much as a Magistrate.

44649. I suppose in the majority of these cases there is no defence?—No.

44650. I mean there is no defence offered?—No. They plead guilty. Then I ask if there is any excuse to be made, and if they do not understand that I repeat it. I say, "Is there anything you want to say at all why you got drunk?" or anything of that sort. I never deal with them straight away without inquiring from them. They may have an excuse that a relation died two or three days ago, or something like that.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs) Mr. Muir, some time during the course of this Commission it was stated to us that the 7s. 6d. for the doctor's fee has to be paid by the person who asks for the Divisional Surgeon to be sent for. I think that is so.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think what was said was that if the Divisional Surgeon is sent for, and the man comes up to the police court, then he is fined, but if he wants to have his own medical man sent for he must pay for his own medical man. That is my recollection of what was said. Supposing the next morning the man is only fined 2s. 6d., then obviously the fine would not completely reimburse the police the expense to which they have been put; but I think perhaps the Magistrate bears that in mind in imposing the amount of the fine.

44651. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Now I want to ask you about the charges of drunkenness of which you have told us. Taking, for example, the last three years, not to go back too far, do you recollect any instance of your having dismissed a charge of drunkenness brought before you, although it was supported by the constable and Inspector who took the charge?—I do not remember any one on the ground that I thought the evidence was false, but I frequently discharge a drunkard on the ground that I hope he will not do it again.

44652. That I can appreciate; but it does not follow that because you dismiss a charge the police evidence is wrong?—Oh, dear, no.

44653. You take a very lenient view of the case?—I do if I think it will do good. Of course, I cannot be sure whether it will or not.

44654. What I was directing my question to was this: Suppose you had a police-constable who gave evidence that a person was drunk, and that was supported by the police Inspector who took the charge, and he was sent for, and he came before you and said this person when arrested was drunk, and then you had a certificate from the doctor, who said the person was not drunk when he was sent for, but was suffering from the effects of excessive drinking. Have there been any such cases in which you have come to the conclusion that the police-constable and the Inspector were wrong in their view that the man was drunk?—I do not remember any. I do not think so.

44655. Supposing you had a certificate from the Surgeon that the person was suffering from intense excitement, hysteria, or something of that character, and the constable and the police Inspector both said the man was drunk, and the man said he was not drunk, and the certificate of the doctor was quite consistent with his not having been drunk, what would you do in that case?—As you state it, I think I should give him the benefit of the doubt, and say the doctor did not seem to be quite certain, and the constables may have mistaken some disorder of the brain, some hysteria, or something of that sort, for drunkenness.

44656. That would be an instance, would it not, of your having dismissed a charge because you were not satisfied that it was true, notwithstanding that the constable and the police Inspector had both sworn that the man was drunk?—Yes, it would, only I think the question that was asked me before was whether I meant that the constable had therefore committed perjury. I do not say that.

44657. My question was not intended for a moment to suggest that?—No, but I think I was asked before whether I had ever had such a case, and whether I dismissed it on the ground that I thought the police were not speaking the truth. I do not remember anything of that sort. I believe they were telling the truth, although, medically speaking, they were wrong.

44658. My question referred to their describing the symptoms they found. That is what my question was directed to?—That may happen, and I think it does happen, but not very often; it does happen sometimes.

44659. Supposing a person is charged with drunkenness, and supposing a doctor is called in, and he gives a certificate which in your opinion shows that the person was not drunk, do you think the Inspector ought to have taken the charge?—I cannot tell. It is difficult to say. Sometimes there may be a man who has only one leg, or there may be a man who cannot speak, or who is partially dumb, and only makes inarticulate noises; in such a case as that the constable may assume that the man is drunk because of his behaviour, his inability to walk, and one thing and another, and they may diagnose the thing wrongly, but honestly. Then when the man comes before the doctor he says "No, this man has an impediment in his speech, his gait is limping, or he is wandering," or whatever it is.

44660. That is a very good instance of the case I had in my mind. Supposing the doctor comes and says that, what ought the Inspector to do—ought he to refuse to take the charge when the doctor has told him that?—I do not know. I expect that that takes place after the charge is taken, and the man is brought back again to be examined by the doctor.

44661. Is not the whole point of sending for the doctor for the person to prove that he is not drunk, and therefore ought not to be detained, and therefore ought not to have a charge preferred against him?—Yes.

44662. Supposing the doctor is sent for under those circumstances and he gives an explanation as you instanced just now, in your view ought not the Inspector to refuse to take the charge?—Of course, he would if he thought the policeman was not speaking the truth, but he might think he was doing the best he could to speak the truth, and he might say that he found the man doing this, that, and the other. It is trying the case, is it not, to say that you will pit the doctor's certificate against the policeman's evidence, and so on? If the Inspector is to do that, that is really trying the case.

44663. Is that so? The Inspector's duty would be, as I suggest to you, to see that there is a prima-facie case, and that is all?—Yes.

44664. Once he is satisfied that there is a prima-facie case, he then takes the charge, and the matter comes before you for trial, but in the instance you gave just now there is no suggestion of mala fides, or of any dishonest statement on the part of the police, but they mistake certain symptoms for evidence of drunkenness which are explained when the doctor comes upon the scene, and he finds some other cause. What I am suggesting to you is that under those circumstances no Inspector ought to take the charge?—If the doctor is there within a reasonable time, and says that the man is sober (that is putting a strong case), then I think the Inspector would certainly say, "He must go; the doctor says he is quite sober; he was only taken up an hour ago."

44665. It is a much more serious thing for a man to be charged in the police court next day than it is for him simply to be taken to the police station, the charge preferred, and the Inspector refusing to accept it?—Yes.

44666. Something has been said about men in a public position, but I would suggest to you that it is very much more serious for a man in a humble position to have such a charge made against him?—Yes, because he might lose his employment.

44667. With respect to the distinction that is put to you between executive and judicial, would you agree that the proper dividing line between the two would be that the Inspector should satisfy himself that there is a prima-facie case, and not go further?—Yes, quite so.

44668. If there is to be a trial and a conflict of evidence, and a difficulty about it, that is the province of the Magistrate?—Certainly.

44669. As I follow your answers to the learned Chairman, you think it would be very undesirable to entrust the Inspector with any further powers which would be really giving him power to try the case?—I am certainly old-fashioned enough for that. I know Chief Justice Cockburn used to be very strong on that point about policemen cross-examining the defendants, or would-be defendants.

44670. Of course, that would apply all the more if there was no right of admission to the public, or if there was no public court?—Yes.

44671. It might lead to very unsatisfactory results if there was a trial and cross-examination of the defendant or the witnesses which would not have the full light of publicity beating upon it?—Yes.

44672. I am only asking you these questions to get the benefit of your long experience. Equally it would follow in your view that a police Inspector ought not to content himself with being a mere registering machine of the charge preferred by the constable?—Yes, I do not think he should do that, I think he should understand that it is not his province absolutely to weigh evidence, and so on, and to decide which is the weightiest on the one side or on the other. I do not think he is trained to do that.

44673. There is a certain amount of discretion which must be left to him?—Yes. Everybody must have in all affairs of life some sort of discretion.

Mr. H. Smith.

44674. That discretion is really meant to be exercised to prevent a baseless charge being made, or which appears to be baseless on the statement made to him?—Yes; absolutely false on the face of it. There must be ordinary discretion exercised.

44675. Is it the result of your experience that Inspectors do exercise a wise discretion in dealing with the cases which are brought before them?—I think so, because I have had no occasion to say the contrary.

44676. You mean you do not remember a case coming before you in which you have been of opinion that upon the evidence the Inspector ought not to have accepted the charge?—No, I know of no such case at all.

44677. Have you had occasion at all to consider the question of every person who is charged with an offence being defended?—Yes, I have often had in my mind something of that sort.

44678. It is rather in my mind after the evidence you were giving us this morning. Do you see any great practical difficulty in allowing every person being defended who is charged with an offence if a person desires it?—I do not see any difficulty beyond the expense. Of course, I have nothing to do with that. With whose pocket it is to come out of, or whether the prisoner can afford it, I have nothing to do.

44679. It might occasion very little expense?—It probably would.

44680. But it would be in the interests of justice, would it not, that every person however poor if desirous of being defended should be defended?—I think so certainly. I think it would be very desirable from the very reason that they cannot appreciate the point of the case at all, and they cannot by any means ask a question. If he wants to cross-examine he must ask questions, and if he wants to elicit another view of the case he must cross-examine in order to do it. Ninety-nine persons out of one hundred who come into my Court have no more idea of asking anybody a question than of flying over the moon.

44682. In the vast number of cases they are brought up and charged, and there is no question of the offence having been committed?—No. The only thing is whether there is any excuse for their conduct. Sometimes a baker comes up and he says "It was so hot in the bakery. I sat up till 4 o'clock in the morning baking"—and so on—"and then I had a drink." Then I say "You can go away and do not drink any more." As you say, in eight out of ten cases certainly there is no dispute of the fact of being drunk.

44683. It would not be such a very serious thing if any person who was detained, and said he was not guilty, had some sort of right to be defended, if he had the assistance of the Magistrate to try the case?—It would be very much better, I think.

44684. Both from the point of view of the Magistrate who was trying the case, and from the point of view of the person charged?—Yes.

44685. (Mr. Dickinson.) What are your divisions of the police?—A and L.

44686. That is Lambeth?—Yes. When there was a Departmental Committee which inquired into the question of the courts and districts some great changes were made, because some courts had more work to do than others. When I was at Clerkenwell there was much more work to do than any man could possibly do. Then I was removed to Westminster, and there was a great change there with comparatively nothing to do. Then by arrangement I took over a large slice of Lambeth. I do not think I could complain of too much to do.

44687. On the north of the river does your district extend up to Piccadilly and Regent Street?—No, just up to Hyde Park Corner.

44688. Does it go down to Pimlico?—Yes, part of Chelsea and part of Battersea.

44689. And you have a poor population?—Yes, very poor, and especially in Lambeth where people are very poor and very rough.

44690. Where do the cases of prostitution chiefly come from?—From the Embankment I should say.

44691. You have the Embankment cases?—Yes. They are a very low class.

44692. Are they a low class?—A very low class. The women are old women.

44693. I suppose you have a good many cases?—No, not a very great many.

44694. Can you tell us at all in your experience whether such cases have been diminishing in number?—In that respect do you mean?

44695. Yes?—No, I do not think it would be perceptible.

44696. You still have a continuous stream of them?—Yes, of the same sort. I do not think there are less. There are more I should think.

44697. How many a week do you get?—I do not think I could tell you. It depends on how many days I sit there. Supposing I sit there three days, perhaps, on an average, there would be one a day, sometimes there would be two or three, and sometimes there would not be one, or something of that sort. Might I, without interrupting you, say that there is one question I have not been asked about, and that is as to the quantity of drunkenness. My impression is that drunkenness has decreased considerably, but not so much amongst women. I am speaking of Westminster where the women are very poor and of a very rough class, and the number of women who get drunk seems to me to be increasing.

44698. But as to the men, they are not?—They are not.

44699. Does that apply to Lambeth as well?—Yes.

44700. Now, with regard to this question of prostitution. We have had some little conversation about the different Acts and Sections under which you proceed, and I think you have told Mr. Rufus Isaacs that you think that they should be at any rate made clearer. Have you ever seen the section which governs this matter in Glasgow? I was going to ask you whether you thought that would be a suitable form of words. The words are these: "Every prostitute or street-walker who, on or near any street, loiters about or importunes passengers for the purpose of prostitution shall be liable to a penalty"?—I assume it would be for the purpose of prostitution if they talked to several men one after another.

44701. You are suggesting for an improper purpose?—Yes. Would you mind reading those words to me again?

44702. No. "Every prostitute or street walker who on or near any street-loiters about or importunes passengers for the purpose of prostitution shall be liable to a penalty"?—I should think those last words would be very good, but I do not know about "loiters about or" (the disjunctive) "importunes passengers."

44703. You think it ought to be "and"?—Yes, I should have thought that some words like that would do.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) No doubt the words at the beginning of that section are in the Police Act—"to the annoyance of passengers."

(Mr. Dickinson.) The Police Act has those words "to the annoyance of passengers." Leeds having had a somewhat similar form which did not include those words, the House of Lords in making the foundation of their Local Act put in the Glasgow words, omitting those limiting words "to the annoyance of passengers."

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That is so.

44704. (Mr. Dickinson.) So that the Act of importuning constituting prostitution is construed in that way?—I do not know how it is worked, or anything about that. That is the sort of thing I would rather suggest, that is all.

44705. I have only one or two more questions to ask you. You say you never heard of any allegation of bribery or blackmailing brought against the police?—No.

44706. Has nobody ever made any wild complaint, if I may use the word in that sense, in your court about that?—No.

44707. Neither in connection with cases of prostitution, nor in cases of street betting?—No.

44708. I suppose you have street-betting cases?—Yes, constantly there used to be, but now there are none. You cannot take any money nowadays. We used to have four or five every day, and they were fined £5 each. Now it is all gone.

44709. When did that commence?—Under the new Act.

44710. The new Act has cleared them off?—Yes, they are not there.

44711. When you used to have those cases did you then have any allegations made against the police?—No. They very seldom defended themselves at all. They simply pleaded guilty, and I would take £5 from them. I would say, £5, £5, £5, £5.

44712. They thought it better to pay the £5?—Yes. They do not like the £10, and they do not like the prospect of £50, or imprisonment. The game is over I should say.

47713. At any rate, during the course of years you have never had any accusation brought against the police?—No.

44714. Now I want to ask you a question about the procedure in the courts. Under the present procedure in most cases the prosecuting counsel, so to speak, is the policeman?—Yes.

44715. The police-constable who has arrested a man for drunkenness comes up to your court, and he conducts the case?—He gives his evidence.

44716. You said that you did not like the police cross-examining the witnesses on the other side, but you thought that there might possibly be some other person charged with that obligation?—Yes.

44717. Would there not be some advantage if some prosecutor not directly connected with the police were to have that duty placed upon him?—Some prosecutor?

44718. What is in my mind is what perhaps you may not be aware of. We have heard that under the system in Scotland there is a Procurator Fiscal who is independent altogether of the police who is officially charged with taking up cases, but he does not take them up unless he likes; his subordinate is a member of the police force, but he himself is independent, and, therefore, he takes the place of the Public Prosecutor in these courts. I was rather wondering whether your experience would lead you to favour any such system as that?—Of course it would be a good thing, because not in cases of simple drunkenness, but in all other cases of larceny, and such like cases, fraud, and complicated cases, there is nobody to tell the Magistrate what it is all about, and the Clerk to the Magistrate has to say, "Who is the first witness?" and we have to begin without knowing anything more than just what is on the charge sheet. We do not know anything of the facts and circumstances, they are not a bit arranged, and we blunder about as best we can, and in the end we get it into shipshape, but if we had somebody to open the prosecution it would no doubt be very much more convenient. You could not let a policeman open a prosecution and tell his own story without he had been sworn, and things of that sort, so there might be, as you say, some official of that kind.

Mr. H. Smith. 4 May 1907.

44719. I take it you would approve of a system like that?—I do not see any objection to it. It is done by the Magistrate and his Clerk as well as we can do it, but of course the case is not marshalled, and sometimes it is so difficult that I have to send to the Public Prosecutor and ask for his assistance, as I cannot conduct the case because it is full of cheques and bills, and all manner of details.

44720. It is not impossible for a policeman to come and take the case right through the Magistrate's court?—No, I should think not. It might be possible.

44721. But you say you have not known of such a case?—No, I have not.

44722. Because you say the defendant has never asserted the contrary?—Yes, he may assert it, but it has always turned out to be quite wrong. They shout at the prosecutor, and call him a liar, and things of that sort, but it does not follow that he is. I do not think I should be lost if a policeman were trying to tell me an absolutely false charge.

44723. You told me that you never have had such a case as anybody complaining in your court of the action of the police?—No.

(Chairman.) The Commissioners are much obliged to you for having come here, and for your valuable evidence.

Mr. Ernest Baggallay, sworn.

44724. (Chairman.) You are one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates?—Yes.

44725. When were you first appointed?—I was Magistrate at West Ham for 14 years, and for six in the Metropolis—20 years altogether.

44726. I think you have received from our Secretary a memorandum of heads or points on which we propose to ask you some questions?—I have.

44727. I need not read the terms of reference which appear on the first page. You will see we are limited to inquiring into three classes of cases—drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets. I should like to ask you first of all one or two general questions. Could you concisely state to us what you conceive to be the duties of constables in the Metropolis with regard to those three classes of cases?—I doubt if I could do so concisely. They are to do their best to clear the streets. Of course every case must depend on its merits as to how they are to do their duty, and it must depend on the circumstances.

44728. We will take it in this way: the duty of a police constable in the Metropolitan force is to discharge the duty of a constable according to law?—Yes.

44729. I think there are special Acts relating to the Metropolis, or there may be general Acts as well, which give them the power of summary arrest?—Yes.

44730. What do you say is the duty of a constable on his beat when he observes anything in the nature of disorder, or when he observes solicitation? How would you define his duty?—I should say he has first to try and stop it, to persuade those who are disorderly, or are prostitutes annoying people, to put a stop to it; and if he fails he must arrest.

44731. You have had, you tell us, over 20 years' experience, and of course during that time a great many constables have appeared before you, and you have heard a great many cases in which there have been issues of fact as between the prisoner and the constable?—Certainly.

44732. You are in a position to form some opinion as to the way in which the police discharge their duties. Do you think the police-constables in the metropolis as a rule discharge their duties with discretion, with honesty, and with efficiency?—I do; and in that respect I would say that during the 20 years I have seen a distinct improvement.

Mr. E. Baggallay.

44733. In what direction?—The improvement is shown by the fact that there have been less complaints made to me as time has gone on of the police exceeding their duty either with regard to violence or false evidence.

44734. I suppose that some cases have come before you in which there appears to have been prima facie some misconduct on the part of the police?—Yes; not only prima facie, but where there has been misconduct.

44735. Do you remember any recent case?—No, not since I have been at Greenwich or Woolwich.

44736. That would not be for six years?—No, not during the last six years.

44737. We will not go into the West Ham cases. We have put another general question, which you will find on page 2 of the memorandum. Have you any comments or criticisms or any recommendations to make as to the organisation and work of the police?—No, only with regard to their presence in court; but that probably the Commission are not interested in.

44738. Yes. I think we are interested in it to this extent—where constables have arrested persons for committing any of the offences mentioned in our terms of reference, and are conducting the prosecution in your court?—That comes later, I think, in the syllabus.

44739. Then I will defer that until later. Now, with regard to the rules and regulations which are contained in the instruction book: do you think that they are in substance well adapted for the purpose?—They have only been in my hands a week or two. The instruction book is not in the hands of the Magistrates except at Bow Street, I believe, so that this is really quite new to me within the last fortnight. The book consists of 570 pages, and I have been through it very carefully. In my opinion the law and the advice given to constables are properly stated, but the construction of the book and the arrangement of it seem to me very faulty.

44740. I was going to ask you whether you thought it was as well arranged as it might be?—No. I should say I found, myself, considerable difficulty in tracing exactly what a constable ought to do under certain circumstances. It is all there, but the book, in my opinion, wants a considerable reconstruction, and I should think for a young constable it might be considerably reduced, even taking the part which refers to crime. Of course the first 100 pages are merely the details—the constitution, and so on, of the force.

44741. Coming to the topic of arrest, have you any comments to make upon the regulations—as to their method of effecting the arrest?—No, I think that is well stated.

44743. Have any prisoners or defendants before you recently complained of ill-treatment by constables?—Yes. Only within the last two or three months I had a Sub-Inspector summoned for ill-treating a man and his wife who applied at the station. I heard the case throughout, and I came to the conclusion that the charge was entirely unfounded.

44744. And apart from that case you have not had any?—I have not had any during the last four or five years. That is the only charge against a constable or a policeman that I have had.

44745. Have you any ground for believing that constables ever use or often use their powers of arrest unnecessarily and improperly owing to ill-temper or other cause?—I should say very rarely.

44746. Do you happen to recollect any case in which a constable, giving way to temper or irritation caused by the circumstances of the moment, has run a man in, if I may use an ordinary expression, and charged him with being drunk and disorderly?—I could not give an instance; but there is something on my mind. I have known something of the sort happen, but not recently, certainly.

44747. You think that it is a very rare case indeed?—It is quite rare.

44748. Putting aside that kind of case in which a constable is wholly wrong in his action, do you think that there are cases in which the constable arrests a person when he ought to proceed by summons?—Yes. Sometimes I have had to complain of that. I do sometimes complain that constables have arrested in assault cases where they should have left it to summons.

44749. Where they could get the name and address?—Not only get the name and address, but where I have thought there was not sufficient corroboration, and therefore they ought to leave it for a summons.

44750. Would you kindly explain the distinction you draw between the two cases of proceeding by summary arrest and proceeding by summons as far as it is affected by insufficient evidence of corroboration? I did not quite follow what you said upon that?—Take a man or a woman who charges somebody else with assault, and there are some marks of violence, but there is no corroboration whatever apparently.

44751. That is a case in which the affray has not been observed?—He has not seen it, and there is no reason to suppose it will be renewed, but at the sight of blood or violence he arrests. Once or twice I have commented upon that, and I have said, "The only result is that the assaulted person, or the injured person rather, gets the benefit of the medical attendance at the police station, and never turns up the next day to prosecute; the result being that the police have to pay for the expense of doctoring the injured person, and the case is not proceeded with." That is a case in which I say it would have been better for the constable to leave it for a summons.

44752. Now I come to the subject of the charge room. Have you read in the instruction book the regulations as to the duty of the Inspector in charge of the station?—Yes, I have. Those appear on page 252 of the book.

44753. Are they, in your opinion, satisfactory regulations?—I think the first few paragraphs are excellently stated—for instance, paragraph 194 and paragraphs 199 and 200. If those are carried out, and there is no reason why they should not be, the duties are admirably stated.

44754. Let me call your attention to paragraph 203 on page 252 of the general instructions: "Good order is to be strictly preserved whilst the witnesses are giving evidence, and their statements, and any made by the person charged, are to be patiently and attentively heard"?—Yes, that is rather a platitude.

44756. You think these regulations are eminently satisfactory?—I said Nos. 199 and 200: "The officer on duty, before receiving a charge, is to ascertain that there is reasonable ground for preferring the complaint against the accused; and unless the circumstances be such as to entitle the accuser to be believed, a charge is not to be taken." If he is satisfied that there is a credible witness, and what he says amounts to a charge, he ought to take it.

44757. Look at Rule 203, which I have just read to you: "Good order is to be strictly preserved whilst the witnesses are giving evidence, and their statements and any made by the person charged are to be patiently and attentively heard." If the proceedings in the charge room are to involve any kind of judicial investigation, what construction do you place upon Rule 203?—I do not know. I did not draw it. I do not say anything about Rule 203. I should say "giving their evidence" was really making their statements, because they are not put on oath. They are not giving evidence in court.

44759. But if the Inspector refuses the charge the prisoner goes away, and, of course, primâ facie has a right to bring an action for false imprisonment against the constable who brought him there?—I do not know. That depends upon the circumstances of the case entirely.

44760. Undoubtedly, and that is why I used the term primâ facie?—But not necessarily would you have any primâ facie action; and, on the other hand, it would be open to the constable or any other person who was interested to take out a summons.

44761. I did not mean that the refusal of the Inspector was any evidence on which an action for false imprisonment could be brought. What I meant was this, that if a constable arrests a man in Piccadilly for being drunk and disorderly, and takes him to Vine Street, and the Inspector refuses the charge, then primâ facie the arrest in Piccadilly cannot be justified, in fact. I do not mean to say that the actual refusal by the Inspector is any evidence in the matter at all necessarily, but that is only an incidental observation?—That is rather outside my beat.

44762. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I suppose Rule 203 may very well apply to the case of a person charged by a police-constable and calling witnesses in denial of the charge. Then I suppose the Inspector would have to inquire into it, and if the witnesses who support the accused are credible witnesses, as I read the rule, he ought not to take the charge?—No, that is so.

44763. The case you were putting, as I follow it, was the case of a person not a constable preferring the charge, but a credible witness preferring the charge?—Either a constable or any other witness.

44764. If it is a constable it seems to me it would follow the moment a constable prefers a charge that, according to your view in answer to the Chairman, the Inspector would be bound to take it notwithstanding the statement of the witnesses?—No.

44765. (Chairman.) I thought I had safeguarded myself by my initial questions from asking you to consider the case of a private person coming. We are only dealing with the conduct of the police with regard to these matters?—I think if a constable makes the charge and three or four people come in on behalf of the accused and satisfy the Inspector that probably the constable is wrong, I think that the Inspector's duty would be to refuse the charge.

44766. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That is Rule 203?—Yes. I rather took Rule 203 to refer more to the effect that they were to be listened to, and they were to be heard.

44767. (Chairman.) It is perfectly clear that the person at the station is discharging a judicial duty. He is saying whether there is a primâ facie case against the accused or not?—Yes.

44770. Supposing there were no witnesses at all, if the Inspector thought the constable was not telling the truth for some reason?—Oh, yes.

44771. Supposing the charge is not simply drunk, but drunk and disorderly?—Yes, or assault on the police where there might be two or three witnesses. The man actually assaulted might not be able to give evidence himself.

44772. Of course you frequently—not in the majority of cases, but still you frequently do dismiss a charge?—Oh, yes.

44773. Do you think the dismissal of a charge necessarily involves any reflection on the Inspector who took the charge?—Oh, no.

44774. Do you think it ever does?—It is possible, yes.

44775. Do you recollect any case in which you came to the conclusion the Inspector ought not to have taken the charge?—I do not.

44776. The Inspectors are nearly all of them, if not all, I believe, men who have been promoted from the grade of constable or the grade of sergeant?—I believe so.

44777. Do you think the fact that they have been probably for some years members of the Police Force gives them a kind of professional bias that unduly inclines them towards believing what a constable says as against what an accused person will say?—I do not think I would go so far as that, but I suppose every profession has feelings towards its own members.

44778. It has been rather pressed upon us, or rather suggested to us repeatedly, from different quarters, that considerable damage to the reputation of innocent persons, persons who are found to be innocent by the Magistrate, is done by the fact that an arrest takes place in a crowded street, a person is taken to the station and charged, the charge is accepted, and then the matter is publicly tried the next day, and the Magistrate dismisses the case. I suppose that there would be in such a case some damage to the reputation often?—I do not know. If a false charge was made against me I should not be afraid of it.

44779. But assuming that owing to the spread of news more or less condensed through the papers, owing to the distortion of facts, there comes in the story or circumstances of a case?—I am afraid neither the police nor the Magistrate is responsible for the Press.

44780. No, but I am assuming the existing machinery of a court of justice, and I am assuming without any fault on the part of anybody except possibly on the part of the constable or the inspector, damage is done to an innocent person by this kind of street charge being publicly investigated. The suggestion, of course, is that greater care might be taken to investigate the charge in the charge room before it becomes a matter of public investigation in a court of justice. Do you think it would be expedient to alter the regulations in that direction?—So very few innocent men come before me, as a matter of fact, on these street charges. It is very rare that an innocent person is brought up. The great majority of them plead guilty.

44781. Then if you look at page 4 of our memorandum you will see that a suggestion is made there for your consideration. At present the Inspector is bound when the prisoner and the constable come in to decide according to the regulations whether he will take or refuse the charge, and if he takes the charge he is then either bound to keep the prisoner in custody or allow him out on bail. But supposing the Inspector should happen to be doubtful as to whether he ought to take the charge or not, might not there be the process of allowing the prisoner out on bail, the condition of the bond being that he should attend at the police station at a later time for the further investigation by the Inspector of the question of taking the charge?—I think it would be a very dangerous thing indeed.

44782. On what ground?—It would be an opportunity given for manufacturing evidence. It is all before the case is brought into court. Is not the court the proper place? If he is doubtful about there being a case, he ought to say there is not sufficient to make the charge. If there is sufficient, he might let him go the next morning before the Magistrate in open court.

44783. But supposing he is doubtful whether there is sufficient evidence or not?—He must make up his mind one way or the other. We have to make up our minds.

44784. Taking into account what you have read in the White Book, and what is your general experience, do you think that the conduct of the proceedings in the charge room may well be left to the Inspector or the acting sergeant, who now discharge the duty?—Yes, I think the suggestions made for alteration are not at all satisfactory. I have not only seen these suggestions made in your memorandum, but I have seen in the papers a suggestion for altering the procedure in the charge room.

44785. You have read Mr. Plowden's evidence in a summarised form?—I did see it in one paper, but, of course, not in detail.

44786. It is hardly worth asking you anything about it, because we do not happen to have the full notes of what Mr. Plowden did say, and none of the papers quite express what he recommended?—But I wish to say emphatically that the adjournment, as is suggested here, would, to my mind, be very bad, and any suggestion that any person of public position should have an advantage over somebody else is, in my opinion, very bad indeed.

44787. (Mr. Dickinson.) Why is your objection to the adjournment so serious?—Because it once gives an opening before the case is brought in the public court for corruption or hushing up.

44788. (Chairman.) But a remand does that, does it not?—When once the matter is in open court it is a different matter.

44789. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As I understand, your view is that if it is a charge which the Inspector thinks is a bonâ-fide case made out before him he ought to take it, and then any doubt or difficulty there may be in regard to it is a proper matter for investigation by the judicial authority, which is the Magistrate?—Yes, the next morning.

44790. And if you introduce anything more, you are taking away some of the judicial authority which is given to the Magistrate and placing it on the Inspector in charge?—Yes.

44791. And if the effect of it was that he was to order an adjournment for the purpose of further inquiry, it must be for the purpose of hearing further evidence, and, hearing it, he, one way or the other, must make up his mind as to whether it is a fit case to be sent to the Magistrate?—Yes. The Magistrate is the right person to go to. It weakens our authority and puts an immense power in the hands of the police.

44792. (Chairman.) The suggestion merely is that a judicial investigation should commence at an earlier point in the totality of the proceedings?—But we are talking of the Inspector. What I wish to point out is this: that if you are going to alter the present practice, and give an adjournment, not only as has been just suggested to me, but you weaken the position of the Magistrate, and you very much alter the position of the police, too. You practically put the police, through their Inspector, in the position of the Magistrate.

44793. Take it so; then as long as the Inspector remains an Inspector, and has to perform the duties that are prescribed in the regulations in the charge room, you are opposed to any change in the procedure at all?—Yes.

44795. Into a public court?—A court to which the public have access. This man whom you propose would only be the Inspector glorified.

44796. No, because he would be a person skilled in the weighing and sifting of evidence?—Yes, but he would be hearing the case in the dark, in camera at night, with nobody there but the police around him.

44797. But if he yielded to those influences he would not be doing his duty. Are you acquainted with any of the foreign systems dealing with this matter?—No.

44798. Then I will not make any suggestion, but the suggestion is that it might be somebody—a Magistrate if you like—in the charge room, and that he would determine there on the material before him whether he would at once order the case to come on in public at 10 o'clock the next day or not to come on at all, or he might say, "No, I have heard this case, and I do not think this case is sufficiently strong to be tried in public, and I shall remand you all or bind you all over to come up before me to-morrow afternoon here in the charge room"?—I think it is of the highest importance that the man should be brought into a public open court as soon as possible. Something of the kind that the learned Chairman has suggested, I think, was in existence in the days of the old Bow Street runners. In the earlier days the Magistrates used to attend all night. I have no objection to attending all night, but I do not think it would be suitable in these days to revert to what I think was intentionally abolished.

44799. Your opinion is that there is no necessity, as far as your experience goes, for altering the charge-room regulations at all?—No, and I saw it suggested with regard to this matter that the Magistrates should hear a case in private.

44800. That was Mr. Plowden's suggestion?—I saw it suggested, and I wish emphatically to say that I would not consent to anything of the sort in my court. I think it would be fatal to our position to hear anything in the nature of a charge like that in private.

44802. (Chairman.) In effect you say that the appearance before the Magistrate in the public court the next morning is the best security the public can have against any excess of authority of the police?—Yes, with the presence of the Press.

44803. Now, passing from that to the cells. Do the prisoners complain about the condition of the cells at all or their treatment in the cells?—No, I think the cells are very good and well managed. The Magistrates are now asked to look after them a bit.

44804. With regard to bail, I suppose the regulations as to taking bail are quite satisfactory in themselves, but do the prisoners complain ever that they are kept waiting unduly because their friends are not communicated with promptly?—No, I think the only complaint has been that the man was not sober enough to go out; that is the only complaint they have had to make.

44805. Do they complain that the sureties who come for them are kept waiting for too long a time?—I have not heard any complaints of that sort. I do not think those would come before us. They might exist without their coming before the Magistrate. I personally would not encourage a question of that sort. I think their complaint could be made to the Commissioner of Police.

44806. I thought from the evidence already given by some of your colleagues that prisoners complain against the police on all sorts of grounds when they are in the dock or in court?—Oh, yes, trivial complaints are made, no doubt, but they are rarely of any substance. I am bound to say my own view is that I should not take much notice of complaints of people who were bailed. I should let them make their complaints to the Commissioner. I am sure the Commissioner and his officials would inquire into it.

44807. I will ask you a question about that later on. Now with regard to medical attendance. Have any cases recently come under your notice in which there has been improper neglect to summon medical assistance?—No.

44808. In cases in which drunkenness is an element in a charge against the prisoner, what is your practice about receiving medical certificates. We have been told what the practice about the examination in the charge room is by other witnesses, and we find that the practice is for the doctor who examines a prisoner to ascertain his condition, and make an entry in the Occurrence Book, and we have been told that a copy of that is sent to the police court. What is the practice in your court as to the use of those certificates?—It is not legal evidence. If the man denied being drunk, and I saw that he had been seen by a doctor, I should look at what the doctor had said—whether it is evidence or not—and probably it may be sometimes in favour of the prisoner. But I should look at it certainly, and I should probably tell the prisoner exactly what it was, and say, "Would you like to have the doctor here to cross-examine him?" That is what I should do, and what I do do. In those little matters we cannot be bound too strictly by the laws of evidence. The man is there, and he does not know how to defend himself. I think we ought to defend him a bit.

44809. You look at the certificate which is pinned to the charge-sheet?—Yes.

44810. At what stage do you look at it?—Directly I find the man is seriously denying the fact that he was drunk. They often deny it, but not seriously, and then it soon passes over.

44811. Mr. Plowden made some remark on the value of medical evidence in this class of case. He rather pointed out there was frequently some divergence between the evidence of the medical man which was founded on strict scientific proof of condition or diagnosis, and the general evidence given by the constables or the prisoner himself. For instance, he said that sometimes it was shown the prisoner when arrested had walked to the police-station quietly, and that he had denied the charge at the police-station, but admitted he was a bit excited, and so on, and that if the evidence remained in that condition, simply unskilled evidence of the conduct or appearance of the prisoner, then Mr. Plowden would be inclined to think there was no case of drunkenness, and then a medical certificate is put in or read by him, or a medical man is called and evidence is given that the pupils of the eye were examined, the man was made to walk up and down on a plank or pass along some corridor, and that it altered the whole aspect of the case. Have you any opinion to offer with regard to that? Do you generally act on unskilled evidence, or do you attach great importance to medical evidence in these cases?—I attach more importance to the medical evidence than I would to the evidence of the constable. But my feeling is rather to put the two together and see what the probable state of affairs was. It is rather difficult to lay down exact grounds.

44812. Mr. Plowden said having to decide whether a man was drunk or not was a difficult question?—On that point I would not disagree with Mr. Plowden.

44813. Under what statutory provisions are these cases dealt with? If you look at head 7 in our Memorandum you will see what Sir Edward Henry told us?—Yes, those are the Acts under which we work.

44814. With regard to the application of these Acts, do you find any special difficulty in the application of these statutory provisions in individual cases arising from the language of the Act?—No. Of course the two Acts referring to prostitutes are a little troublesome, but not much. You can get over them. The evidence either proves the offence or it does not. The difficulty is the different wording of the two Acts which apply to prostitutes, the Vagrancy Act and the Police Act.

44815. Take the regular solicitation clause in the Police Act—Sub-section 11 of Section 54. What evidence do you require that the defendant is a common prostitute or night-walker in order to make a primâ-facie case?—The constable's evidence. The constable states that he has seen her about several nights occasionally accosting men.

44816. You do not require proof that he has cautioned her?—Not at that moment. I thought you asked me about the evidence as to her being a common prostitute.

44817. It is an element in the offence that the defendant should belong to the class described as common prostitutes or night-walkers. Correct me if I am wrongly interpreting the statute. It seems to me there are three things to be proved in order to make a case, some evidence of three allegations must be given in order to make a primâ-facie case under Sub-section 11—first, that the defendant is a common prostitute or night-walker; secondly, loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place—that is on a specific occasion that she was on such and such a night loitering or being in some thoroughfare named for the purpose of solicitation?—For the purpose of prostitution or solicitation.

44818. There must be evidence of loitering or being in the thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation. That is the second allegation?—Yes.

44819. The third is the act of loitering or being must be to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. There are therefore three material allegations as I construe the sections. What do you take as some evidence that the defendant is a common prostitute or night-walker?—Some evidence of that would be the fact that the constable had seen her about night after night.

44820. And do you accept that as sufficient proof that she belongs to that class?—It is primâ-facie evidence, yes.

44821. Then with regard to loitering, I suppose there is no difficulty. What proof of annoyance to the inhabitants or passengers do you require?—I should expect at least that if the constable did not call a person (of course a passenger or inhabitant might be called) to say he was annoyed by this woman soliciting prostitution in the street (it may be that he could not call a person, probably in most cases he could not), in those cases I should expect some evidence that the constable saw her soliciting or catching hold of a man by the arm, and the man turning round and saying "Go along," and then he would caution the woman, and she, notwithstanding that, does the same thing again. I should consider that sufficient evidence of her soliciting prostitution to the annoyance of passengers.

44823. So that in practice if the constable gives evidence that he has known the defendant has been in the habit for, say, three or four weeks on most evenings loitering about the place talking to men, and sometimes going off with men, and sometimes having her overtures rejected, then on a particular night she solicits a man, the policeman cautions her, and then she repeats the offence, and she is arrested, you would then convict if you believed that story?—After hearing her defence, yes.

44824. So that she might be convicted on the evidence of one police constable?—She might, certainly. You must remember, of course, that the districts in my experience are very different to Piccadilly. West Ham is not Piccadilly, and Deptford and Lewisham and Woolwich, which are full of prostitutes, are quite different to those who frequent Piccadilly, even in their ways and dress, but they are well known to the police. The women there are convicted over and over again. A woman hardly ever down there comes before me simply as a prostitute soliciting until she has already been up two or three times for drunkenness or for sexual intercourse in the public street. Something of that sort has marked her down, and the Magistrate has no difficulty whatever in ascertaining the facts as to her character and what she was out in the street for. Then, if there is any evidence of annoyance, if the people do not like it, and he sees some people annoyed by her soliciting, he says so, and brings her up.

44826. I am speaking of the Vagrancy Act?—The words "indecent behaviour" might be proved by showing indecent solicitation.

44827. Do you remember Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act: "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words, or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned"?—The people we deal with under that are generally hobbledehoys and chaps who push people off the pavements, and make a great row in the streets at night.

44828. You do not deal with solicitation cases under that?—No.

44829. What do you say with regard to allegations of bribery against the police?—I have rarely come across it. I think bribery was rather more rife at West Ham than where I am now. I came across a case there once where a man, a publican, actually in his account book had put down how much he had paid to the police. That is some years ago. There is no doubt they used to pay the police on duty outside in those days. Still, I think West Ham is different to other places.

44830. Do you think the bribery of constables by prostitutes is common?—No, I have never seen that. I have never known it at all. I do not think the prostitutes in the locality that I speak of would ever dream of bribing a constable. The most she would ever say was that the constable had claimed rights of sexual intercourse. That is the greatest charge she would ever make against him.

44831. Do you think that kind of intimacy between constables and prostitutes is common at all in your neighbourhood in the hours of duty?—No, I should think not—certainly not.

44832. Have you any ground for believing that street bookmakers bribe or have been recently bribing the police?—No, not recently.

44833. Have you ever heard of its being done?—Oh, yes.

44835. (Chairman.) I suppose that the constables who prosecute in your court do so in a reasonably satisfactory manner?—Oh, yes, in an excellent way.

44836. Do you think that the police-constables ought more frequently to be represented by counsel or solicitors in their own interests?—No, I do not think so.

44837. Where a prisoner is defended by counsel or solicitor do you ever think that any harm is done to the constable by his not being represented by a legal gentleman?—No, I do not think so. The only question that does arise in my mind sometimes is as to whether the Inspector who is on duty (there is always an Inspector on duty in court) might not have a little further instruction as to how he might help a new constable in the conduct of his case. I, of course, have a very great objection to advising the police in court. I should be very glad if one could do it reasonably, but I think it is a great mistake for a Magistrate to be supposed to be part of the police, and any way in which you appear to be advising the police in open court does rather suggest that. It rather suggests that the Magistrate is a police Magistrate, and not as we really are, Magistrates of the police court.

Mr. E. Baggallay.

44838. Would you be inclined to give to a Superintendent or to an Inspector of police the right to take part to some extent in the proceedings in court?—Not to the extent of examining witnesses, but merely to the extent of asking the magistrate for a remand, or suggesting to the constable who is prosecuting that he had better ask for a remand in order that some witnesses who obviously ought to be called should be there.

44839. Instead of leaving it to the Magistrate?—Yes.

44840. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Cannot he do that now?—He does not do it. He has no instructions in the book to do it.

44841. (Chairman.) The Head Constable of Leeds made a similar suggestion to that which you have made, but he went further, and he thought it would be a good thing for the Superintendent of police to have a locus standi, and examine the police witnesses if need be?—I do not want that.

44842. But as far as I can see there is nothing to prevent the Superintendent going to the constable in the box and saying, "Constable, you had better ask for a remand"?—No, I think he ought to be authorised to do it in my opinion. I only suggest that. It is difficult to say exactly how far you would give the power to the Inspector, but I think there ought to be a little more independence for the Magistrate. I do not want to feel that I must always be looking out to see that the prosecution is being properly conducted. I am rather inclined to be on the look-out to see that the defence is properly put forward, because the prisoner is there in the box probably without any assistance at all.

44843. Then the last question I think I have to put to you is, How do you deal with complaints which are made to you either by prisoners or by persons who come to your court complaining of the police. Do you ever send the complaints on to the Chief Commissioner or to the Home Office?—If the person comes irrespective of any charge or case that is before me, I mean merely coming with a complaint with regard to the police, I request him to apply straight to the Commissioner. If the matter occurs in the course of a case, then if it is material to the issue before me, I inquire into it, but if it is not material to the issue before me I tell the person who makes the complaint that he must make his complaint afterwards. Of course, sometimes it is material to the issue.

44844. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As I understand your view relating to the taking of charges by the Inspector, do you think that is the best system according to your experience. Is it satisfactory?—It is satisfactory. I see no serious fault in it.

44845. You have found from your experience, I suppose, that the charges which the Inspector does take are charges usually fit for investigation?—Yes.

44846. I suppose now and again there must come before you a case which you think if you had been the Inspector you probably would not have taken?—Quite so.

44847. It is not always easy, of course, for an Inspector to see what is material in the matter?—He has no time to cross-examine.

44848. And in your view he ought not?—He ought not.

44849. That is to say, he ought not to be conducting the case?—No.

44850. The rule is expressed in these words, "The officer on duty, before receiving a charge, is to ascertain that there is reasonable ground for preferring the complaint against the accused, and unless the circumstances be such as to entitle the accuser to be believed, a charge is not to be taken"?—Yes.

44851. You think that is right?—I think so.

44851*. I suppose if there was any such practice as was suggested in one of the questions put to you of an Inspector adjourning the question as to whether or not he should accept the charge, and then he did accept the charge, and sent it to the court, there would be some danger of that affecting the determination at the police court?—I think so. I think it would very much weaken the position.

44852. The position of the Magistrate?—Yes.

44853. Because there would have been another inquiry?—Yes.

44854. In your view, it is not desirable that an Inspector of police should cross-examine any of the witnesses brought before him when he is asked to take the charge?—No, but merely to take sufficient evidence to find out what the nature of the case is.

44855. And to satisfy himself that there are legal grounds for preferring the charge?—Yes.

44856. And the rest of it should be for the Magistrate?—Yes.

44857. Speaking from your experience, have you ever known of a case of any person, whether in a public position or in a private position, being injured by a charge being preferred against him which was found to be a false charge?—No, I have never known of one.

44858. Of course, it might be, I suppose, that a charge which is preferred in respect of which you acquit a man might prejudice him if the Magistrate came to the conclusion that there was not sufficient evidence, and he said so, and dismissed the charge for that reason. That might leave a suspicion that the offence had been committed, but that it had not been legally proved?—That is on the merits of the case in a public court. It does not arise simply on the fact that he is sent up to be tried.

44859. I quite agree. I was dealing rather with the suggestion that was made, that the hearing of the charge against a man at the police court might affect his reputation?—I should have thought not.

44860. I suppose it might prejudice him under the circumstances I put to you just now?—Yes, it might.

44861. Supposing there was a charge preferred against a man, and you came to the conclusion on hearing it that there was not sufficient evidence to justify a conviction, and you expressed yourself in those words?—It is a very different thing to saying there is not the slightest foundation for the charge.

44862. I agree?—That depends on what takes place at the police court. It is not the fact that he is sent up to be tried, but what takes place when he is tried.

44863. He would not be affected by any such suggestion as had been made for charging him?—No. If it becomes doubtful before the Magistrate, he is only discharged because the evidence is not quite sufficient. It is obviously a case which should be sent to the Magistrate, and therefore it does not arise from the fact that the charge was sent before him.

44864. One other matter I want to ask you about. Suppose a complaint is made during the course of the case, whether it is relevant or irrelevant to the matter you are trying, which is whether the charge is true or not, against the police of something that had happened in the cells or on the way to the station, as I gather, you would not try that?—No.

44865. You would eliminate that from the investigation as something not relevant?—I should eliminate it, and should only deal with the question before me.

44866. If there was a complaint made, you would say that was either a matter with regard to which he must take out a summons if he had a complaint or apply to the Chief Commissioner?—To the Chief Commissioner.

44867. From what we hear, the practice rather differs as to that?—The practice of Magistrates?

44869. One other question with regard to drunkenness. You say you look at the doctor's certificate for the purpose of satisfying yourself upon the matter. In most cases, I suppose, if you accept the evidence it is against the accused?—In most cases.

44870. I suppose there is very seldom annexed to the charge-sheet anything which would indicate that the man was not drunk?—Yes, that is very rare. Whenever a man disputes it, I look at the certificate, because sometimes there is something in the certificate which suggests a defence.

44871. If a man was defending himself or was being defended, and you looked at the certificate and found the fact that the doctor certified the man was drunk, it would influence your mind?—I would say, "Would you like to have the doctor here, so that you can cross-examine him?" If the man adhered to his denial I should in all probability adjourn the case, either for the Inspector who took the charge or for the doctor to be called as a witness.

44872. Does that mean you would not take note of what was in the certificate if the man was defending himself or being defended, without giving him an opportunity of hearing the doctor's evidence?—Quite so. It is almost impossible at the police-court to keep out a great deal that is not evidence. You cannot help it sometimes. You must hear a great deal that is not strictly legal evidence, and it is for the Magistrate himself to so regulate his mind that he does not act upon it.

44873. I suppose, if you hear what is not evidence it is in favour of the accused, or is it against him?—It is both ways. Very often it is in his favour.

44874. I do not quite understand on what principle you allow anything to be said which is not evidence against him?—No; it would be in his favour generally.

44875. I was suggesting that, even although it is not strictly right to allow something to be elicited which is not strictly evidence, it is in favour of the accused?—Yes.

44876. Do you suggest that the same practice would apply to a statement that was made against him?—No. I say one cannot help it. Sometimes things are stated or given before you which you cannot help; I mean a statement is made or evidence is given by a constable who does not know the laws of evidence.

44877. Then it does not affect you?—One has to eliminate it as best one can from one's mind. In a police-court the Magistrate has everything to do; he has to conduct the prosecution and the defence, and to look after everything; he rarely has the assistance of either counsel or solicitor, but things are frequently said that are not evidence.

44879. I do not quite understand on what principle it is that the certificate is sent up with the charge-sheet and looked at by the Magistrate when the man is denying the charge. That seems to be a statement which in most cases is against the accused, but which is nevertheless seen by the Magistrate, and must affect his mind in determining the case. It seems rather a loose practice, does it not?—No; I think you are much more likely to get at the truth.

44880. You might just as well say there should be no laws of evidence, and get at it as best you can?—But one knows that it can be proved, although it is not legal evidence in itself. It is only a quotation from an entry made by the doctor.

44881. That would rather indicate, would it not, that you accept that statement made in the certificate as a true statement?—No; I merely take it as a statement, and then let the defendant have every opportunity of having it investigated if he wants to do so.

44882. What takes place in the ordinary course is that you have the charge-sheet put before you with the certificate attached?—Yes.

44883. I suppose you would look at the certificate with the charge-sheet?—Yes.

44884. Then you hear the case?—I do not look at the certificate until the case is going on.

44885. Whilst the case is going on?—Yes.

44886. Do you tell the defendant what the doctor says?—I always tell him. I say, "Here is what the doctor says," so that he may know exactly what is or what can be said against him.

44887. If he disputes it you give him an opportunity of having it further investigated, but you at the same time tell him what the doctor has said, and what he will say if he is called in court?—That is what he may expect he will say.

44888. Would that be the explanation of it?—Yes.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) The certificate is made evidence by the statute.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) In the one case it is made evidence by the statute, and in the other it is not.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It is evidence by the statute, subject to certain conditions.

44889. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Subject to legal provisions that legalise the course, which may be a convenient course, but certainly it is not, to my mind, the legal course pursued in the police court. I can understand how it is done, and how it works, as Mr. Baggallay tells us, quite satisfactorily to the accused, because he gets every opportunity of having it investigated. But if you have to determine, according to law, whether a man should be convicted on proper evidence, the effect would be that evidence was admitted which was not proper evidence. I am not expressing an opinion about it?—I do not venture to say what is done by other Magistrates. I only speak of what I do myself.

44890. I quite understand from what you have said that in your view it does not affect any accused person adversely, because although it may not be strictly legal evidence you would give him an opportunity, if there is a defence, of having it proved?—And, further, I give him an opportunity of cross-examining the doctor, and every now and then it does act in favour of the accused.

44891. All I venture to suggest is it may be convenient, but it is a little irregular, to look at the certificate before the evidence is given?—We do a lot of irregular things in the police courts. We should never get through our work if we were not irregular sometimes.

(Chairman.) With regard to county court summonses the certificate of a doctor in order to excuse a defendant's absence is not proved, and, strictly speaking, it is not evidence; but if it is proved the plaintiff has to acquiesce; and a statement as to wages earned by a defendant is often accepted; but those are in civil and not in criminal proceedings.

44892. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As you say, it is always in favour of the defendant?—Yes, in favour of the defendant. It saves him the expense of a doctor being called.

44894. At the same time, does it not strike you that it might frighten the defendant if he heard the Magistrate say, "Just listen: this is what the doctor said," and, you having that certificate before you, he might think, "It is not very much good my trying to dispute that; that certificate is already before the Magistrate." It might have that effect, might it not?—It is rather difficult to say when a Magistrate does frighten a prisoner. I do not think they are so much frightened of the Magistrate as the police are.

44895. Why should the police be frightened?—I do not know, but so they tell me.

44896. Who—the police?—No.

44897. I do not understand why the police should be frightened; they have only got their duty to perform?—It is nervousness, I suppose, on the constable's first appearance in the police court.

44898. That can only be once. I wanted to ask you about the bribery of which you have told us. In West Ham apparently it seems to have been rather rife?—No, I do not go so far as that. I said I had had instances of it—it did occur.

44899. Is that the only place in which you have heard it occurred?—Yes. I have not heard any direct suspicion either in Greenwich or Woolwich.

44900. When you speak of the bribery that had taken place in West Ham, that would be, I suppose, bribery by bookmakers?—Publicans.

44901. During the time when you were at West Ham was there any investigation at all into those charges?—No, none that I was aware of. There might have been by the police apart from me.

44902. But not that came before you?—No. There were suggestions of bribery in other directions, but not of bribing the police.

44903. How do you find, generally speaking, that the police give their evidence?—I think they give it very well.

44904. Do you find at all a tendency to stretch the evidence against a prisoner?—I have known cases where I thought they had done so, and where a mistake or a blunder has been made, and where the case has been gone on with, as I thought, improperly. There have been cases, but not recently.

44905. Suppose a police constable was, I do not mean to say inventing a series of facts, but making false statements for the purpose of bolstering up a charge for which he was responsible, in your view ought not that man to be very severely dealt with?—Certainly.

Mr. E. Baggallay.

44906. I do not know whether I have made quite plain to you the distinction I attempted to draw in the question I was putting to you. I am putting to you the case of a policeman who invents a charge as to which it is not necessary to ask any questions at all, or prefers a false charge, inventing facts in order to support it, and the case of a man who is preferring a charge in respect of which the evidence is going badly for him, and then he endeavours to bolster it up by making a false statement and exaggerating the defence?—Of course, it is a very serious matter.

44907. It is difficult to distinguish that from the first case?—Of course the first is the worst.

44908. Therefore I eliminate that from the discussion, but still the second approaches very closely?—Yes.

44909. It may mean all the difference between the conviction or the acquittal of the accused?—And, besides, the second may be more difficult for the defendant to contest.

44910. Speaking of human nature as we find it, a man, as a rule, does not invent a charge, but he wants to get out of a difficulty, and he might make a false charge?—In order to get out of a tight place.

44911. Supposing you found such a case, do you think it would be satisfactory for the Commissioner of Police merely to warn that man?—No.

44912. In such a case do you not think that that man ought to be dismissed the Force?—I should certainly think so.

44914. (Mr. Dickinson.) You were saying to Mr. Rufus Isaacs that you would not concern yourself with any action of a policeman which was not relevant to the issue before you?—No, I should advise him what to do, perhaps, but I would not go into the inquiry myself. I think it is much better that it should be inquired into by those persons who have an opportunity of investigating it by calling the proper persons before them. You see I have no power to call anybody I like.

44915. What would you actually do in a case such as that, if you had a case before you, and you dismissed it, and you were convinced in your mind that the policeman had either invented some statement or had gone beyond his proper duty in prosecuting the case?—In some cases I should mark the charge sheet.

44916. Have you ever done that?—I have done such a thing, but not lately.

44917. That is conveyed to the Commissioner of Police?—It goes straight to the Commissioner or Assistant Commissioner.

44918. When you say "in some cases" why do you not say in all cases?—It depends upon whether it is a matter which you can merely put on the charge sheet, or it may be desirable not to put it on the charge sheet where it can be seen by other people.

44919. But if you did not put it on the charge sheet what would you do?—I should either ask the Inspector in court to report it or else I should write direct. That is what I consider would be my duty.

44920. May I take it you would think it your duty in all such cases to take some action?—Yes; if I thought it was a case in which, unless I took action, no notice would be taken, I should consider it my duty to do so.

44921. That is rather a variation from what you said just now. You said you would limit your duty?—I would limit my inquiry. I say I should not inquire into it.

44922. You would not consider yourself discharged of all your functions?—No.

44923. You would communicate with the Commissioner of Police. Can you tell us how often you have had to take such action as that?—I am afraid I cannot tell you the number; they are rare.

44924. Then you would say in almost every case that has come before you, so far as you are aware, the police have acted properly?—Yes, or else their action has been clear on the face of it. The policeman in court knows exactly what has taken place, and he himself would make a report.

44925-6. In practically all those cases, especially in cases in which you discharge the prisoner, you have had sufficient information before you to enable you to say that there has been no possibility of doing what I have suggested?—No, I do not say that at all. It is quite possible that in those cases the policemen have not behaved rightly, but there has not been sufficient evidence to act upon. We can only act upon what is said in court, and a Magistrate is treading on rather dangerous ground if he begins dealing with a charge merely on suspicion unless he has something to go upon.

44927. Then there is no absolute security that under the present system of the police force the Police Magistrate has considered all the circumstances of the case?—It would be impossible to have a system of absolute security.

44928. It has more to do with the discipline of the force?—I think so.

44929. I am asking you these questions because certain evidence which has been put before us has rather tended to make me believe that the police wait for the defendant, or the Magistrate, to draw the Commissioner's attention to it. What I want to get at is how far you would consider it your duty to draw the attention of the Commissioner to it. Would you, at any rate, feel it your duty, so far as you know, to draw the attention of the Commissioner of Police to it?—I should do so if I thought his attention would not be called to it otherwise, but I do not consider it my duty to do it if the case is, on the face of it, one that must go before a Magistrate.

44930. You would not do it then?—I do not think I should.

44931. You would not even mark the charge sheet?—I might.

44932. Of course, it is all important in a police force like this that there should be very rapid means of detecting any malpractice at all?—I may say, as a rule, I should expect the Inspector on duty to make the communication.

44933. That is to say, the Inspector at the police court?—Yes.

44934. Do you think it altogether satisfactory that the whole process of prosecution, so far as it exists, should be in the hands of the police themselves. At the present moment the prosecutor is really the police constable who has taken the man up, is he not?—Yes.

44935. Do you think that that is entirely satisfactory, or would it not be an advantage to have somebody in the position of the Procurator Fiscal, which is a prosecutor independent of the police?—I must say I am rather in favour of having somebody who should be responsible in Court, but whether it is possible to do it in our Courts with the enormous amount of business carried through in the course of the day I cannot say.

44936. It would mean a certain amount of investigation into the case beforehand?—Yes. Take the work we have to get through on a Monday in the whole morning at Greenwich. On a Monday I may have anything from 30 to 40 charges, besides summonses, to deal with. Then I have to go over to Woolwich, and spend the whole afternoon there in taking all the Saturday, Sunday, and Monday morning charges. There is a lot of work got through in the course of the day.

44937. Would it not in some cases be an advantage before the case went before the Magistrate that you should have a certain amount of information from an impartial person?—Yes, I think that is so with regard to summonses.

44938. The only investigation is the investigation that is given by the Police Inspector?—I think the Superintendent considers all summonses before they are issued, and then they are authorised by the Commissioner before they are granted.

44939. You are speaking of summonses?—Yes.

44940. Then with regard to summonses there would be a certain amount of investigation, but with regard to charges not?—No, I suppose not. Then it is I want somebody. I should rather like to have somebody there, either an Inspector or somebody superior to an Inspector, who would look after the prosecutions. I do not know that I go so far as to say a Procurator Fiscal, but somebody. I think an Inspector could do it.

44941. Do you not think it ought to be somebody who is not directly connected with the police?—You could hardly get anybody, because when once he was in harness he would be one of the police.

(Chairman.) Thank you, Mr. Baggallay; we are much obliged to you.

Mr. E. Baggallay.

4 May 1907.

Mr. Albert Rowland Cluer, affirmed.

Mr. A. R. Cluer.

44942. (Chairman.) You are a Metropolitan Police Magistrate, are you not?—Yes.

44943. When were you first appointed?—1895.

44944. To which Court have you been attached?—To the South Western first, and then the next year to Worship Street, which is now Old Street.

44945. I think you have received from the Secretary of the Commission a memorandum of heads of evidence relative to this inquiry?—Yes.

44946. Have you prepared a statement?—No, I have prepared no statement at all. I have looked up old notes and cases.

44947. Will you kindly look at the questions on page 1 of the memorandum? Have you anything to say with regard to those?—As to (a), of course the duties of constables are laid down in the Statutes that deal with them as to drunkenness, solicitation, and disorder, with the exception that disorder is not anywhere properly defined, and, as a matter of practice, a person who is making a row, shouting, or something of that sort, is often arrested, there being no statutory provision really for arresting him, and he is dealt with as it were under our Commission, under the ancient Statute of 34 Edward III., chapter 1, which gives power to bind people over. Otherwise, the duties of the constables, of course, are to arrest according to the different Statutes, the Police Act, and the Vagrant Act. As to (b), I think, on the whole, as a rule, those duties are discharged by the police admirably, and with discretion, honesty, and efficiency, certainly. I also think there are a good many exceptions to that which certainly come before me.

44948. Can you give us any recent instances of misconduct on the part of constables which have come under your notice?—You have had two cases, I think, that happened at my Court since last October. Those I need not refer to. Those cases were the cases of Emms and Norreys, in which I certainly thought the police case was a very poor one. That was a case of an alleged assault on the police. The Commission is really limited, is it not, to the three matters upon which you ask for information? If you wish for cases with regard to general misconduct, of course, I am prepared to give them, but I do not know whether you do by these questions mean what I think is misconduct in other cases outside solicitation, drunkenness, and disorder.

44949. I think we meant to ask for instances of misconduct in arresting or misconduct in proceeding in those three classes of cases?—Then I ought to leave out the others.

44950. I think the general question of misconduct of the police is confined to those three classes of cases, but the other cases would be quite admissible, Mr. Cluer?—I from time to time have taken notes of such things, and I began to take them a good many years ago, but I do not produce those. I have such things. Now, only this week, last Monday, a lad was charged before me with gambling. The evidence was that at 40 yards distance the policeman had seen him with 20 others throwing up the coins in the air, and the police-constable swore that he walked round, met him two minutes afterwards at Hoxton Street, at the corner of Old Street, and arrested him. The lad said, "I was doing nothing of the sort; I had been in an ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes." He called an independent person, who did not know him, who satisfied me that he had been in the shop all the time, and I dismissed the case.

44951. Do you mean you not only dismissed the case because it was not adequately proved, but that there was, in your opinion, positive misconduct on the part of the constable?—I thought so.

44952. He invented the whole thing?—No, not the whole thing. He saw a lot of people gambling; he saw this lad, who stands outside our court selling newspapers; he knew him perfectly well by sight, he had met him, and there was no doubt about that, but he was not quite right.

44953. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) He met him two or three minutes after, at a little distance from the place? Yes.

44954. (Chairman.) Do you think, seeing some people gambling, and meeting this lad, he trumped up the charge against him, and invented it?—He may have thought it was so. How can you get to the bottom of his mind. He is sent out for the special purpose of catching these lads, and he has got to catch them, otherwise when he gets back somebody wants to know the reason why. That is a risk a man specially sent out always has to run; and I say that because in gambling cases I apply a test which I think is a fair one. I say, "What money had the defendant got in his pocket?"—i.e., when arrested. "None." How can he gamble if he has got no money? I dismiss it. But that is sure to happen when officers are specially sent out to stop what is a not uncommon nuisance in our district. It is really a crying difficulty, and it is very obnoxious to lots of the inhabitants, but I so often get the wrong person.

44955. Do you think it was an honest blunder on the part of the policeman?—I cannot say. I do not know the man, and so I have no experience of him to say whether it was or not.

44956. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) He swore he saw the boy there?—Yes, positively. I sent afterwards somebody whom I can trust, in ordinary clothes, to say to this boy, "You were jolly lucky yesterday," and the boy said, "I was not; I was not gambling." I thought I might satisfy myself that I was wrong, perhaps, by trying to catch him by a person who went up to him as a friend, but he did not admit it. There were two men on the same day who were charged under that section with insulting behaviour, and the evidence was that they were linked arm-in-arm, pushing people off the pavement. The pavement is 30 ft. wide, and the policeman knows I know that. He means pushing into people. It was in the Whitechapel Road. One of them was arrested; the other one waited about to take a tramcar to go away, and he was also arrested while he was waiting for his car. They both called a witness to say that they had been at a certain mission in the district the same night, that they had been practising athletics there, and they were carrying home a pair of boxing-gloves wrapped up in a handkerchief, and they were going along perfectly peacefully. I think they must have been mistaken for some rough people. There had been some roughness going on there, but they were certainly innocent persons, and one of them who was charged with disorderly conduct and insulting behaviour was a person a little smaller than myself.

44957. Was that the case of a Mr. Davies?—The case of Mr. Davies was rather a different case. He was a respectable man, the manager of a business, and he went into the London and Westminster Bank in Commercial Street, had a business conversation with the manager of the bank, drew £50 for wages for his employer, went out of the bank, and fell down in a fit. It happened that two friends of his were passing on an omnibus, and they got off the omnibus, and said to the policeman, "We know this man; we will take him away." The policeman declined to allow it. Probably the policeman was not sure what was the matter with him. The man was taken to the station, and he was brought before me in about an hour and a quarter, and charged with being drunk. The policeman then swore he was drunk, the doctor said he was drunk, and said he smelt of drink, and the Inspector swore he was drunk. There was the bank manager, there were half a dozen of his friends, and there was his own doctor to prove that he had epilepsy, and that for four days—as he assured me himself, and he was evidently speaking the truth—he had drunk absolutely nothing.

44958. When was that?—I can give you the date. It was about March of last year. I can find you the date. I have not put it down here. Mind, these are only isolated cases; they are not typical. I have already said that, on the whole, everything is done honestly and efficiently; I do wish to assure you of that, but it is not fair to keep back such cases as admit not of a possibility of a blunder, but of combined wilfulness.

44959. Did you discharge the man?—At once.

44960. (Chairman.) Your view is that there was a regular conspiracy on the part of the constable, the Inspector, and the doctor?—Having once taken the man into custody against the wish of his two friends who got off an omnibus to say so, then they foolishly prefer the charge against him, and, once the charge is preferred, then, unfortunately, the witness-box is used to give evidence which is not true.

44961. What was the medical evidence in that case on the side of the constable?—That the man was drunk. I forget whether actually the doctor said that he smelt strongly of drink or not.

44962. It seems that the man had drunk nothing for four days. If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor or he was telling a lie?—Or he had been having a drink himself.

44963. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you have a certificate?—No; I never look at certificates. I never have and never will.

44964. Why was he brought to the police-court?—Because he was charged with being drunk.

44965. Why did he come?—Because they brought him. He was charged about 11 o'clock in the morning, and he came to me about half-past 12 or so.

44966. And all the officers at the same time gave evidence of the same kind?—Yes.

44967. What was the name of the Inspector?—I cannot tell you.

44968. (Chairman.) The defendant pleaded Not Guilty?—Yes.

44969. And he called witnesses?—I think he called two of his friends. I forget how many witnesses he called. I did not go through all his witnesses. I saw them all there. I saw the manager of the bank, whom I knew by sight, waiting there to give the same evidence. I think the man having £50 in his pocket ought to have been sufficient to have discharged him at the station. Then, on June 5th, 1906, there was a carman selected by Mr. Fardell, a contractor—it was a Whit Monday—especially to take some apparatus to Paddington in connection with salving the "Montagu" from Lundy Island. The man had been specially selected by Mr. Fardell, a well-known contractor in our district. He had been looking after 10 or 12 other people from 10 o'clock, getting their tackle ready, and at 1.15 Mr. Fardell was with him in the Commercial Road. At 1.45 he was arrested for being drunk in charge of the horses. He said, "I slipped as I was walking by the side of my horses on some mud, and the constable got hold of me by the throat and very nearly choked me." The constable and the Inspector who came up both swore he was drunk while in charge of the horses. Here was this contractor, with valuable horses and valuable tackle which he was sending to Paddington, and he came and satisfied me that he had been with the man all the time, that they had not had a drink, and that he would not have sent a man on to Paddington to take valuable stuff like that on a Bank Holiday if he had been drinking, and of course I dismissed it. It may have been a mistake, although, as the man could walk to the station, it is difficult to see how one could think that such a condition of things was drunkenness.

44970. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Will you tell us what evidence there was of drunkenness in that case—how many witnesses?—Only the Inspector and the constable. The Inspector was in the street, and I think he came up.

44971. (Chairman.) What evidence of drunkenness did they tender; that is to say, what facts did they depose to?—They saw him walking along, and then suddenly fall down.

44972. No allegation as to the smell of his breath?—I do not know; I do not take down so many details.

44973. (Mr. Dickinson.) That was a summons?—No, that was an arrest.

44974. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) There was no doctor called?—No.

44975. And you do not know whether the doctor was called or not?—Not at all, probably.

44976. (Mr. Dickinson.) He would have a right to ask to see a doctor?—Yes.

44977. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That is, assuming that he knew that he had the right?—Yes, and assuming he knew he stood the risk of having to pay the fee. On the 28th July, 1906, a man was charged with being disorderly and with using obscene language.

44978. (Mr. Dickinson.) The name?—The name I do not know. He said the bailiff broke his door in to distrain for rent. A police-sergeant was outside, and he said to the sergeant, "Is that right?" The sergeant said, "You pay your rent." The sergeant went on to say that the man was using obscene language, that he went in and came out two or three times, and still continued to use obscene language; "I took him into custody; he was very violent, and struggled, and threw himself down." There is nothing much in that. The man said, "You threw me down, and you forced your knee in my stomach." I did look at the doctor's certificate in that case, but it was about the only time I did so, and there was no charge of being drunk; but the doctor said the man had prolapsus recti. I sent the man to the hospital at once, and what became of him afterwards I do not know. There was, however, evidence that the man who could not pay his rent had been treated very violently. You do not get prolapsus recti by throwing yourself down on the pavement. case of Andrews.

44979. What did the police-sergeant say to that?—He said the man threw himself down. The man was evidently in such frightful pain that it was charity to send him away at once. I took down at the time, not knowing that it would come here, just a note of the

44979*. (Mr Rufus Isaacs.) That is a case we have had?—In 1905 there was a case in which a man was summoned for betting. The reason why the policeman had not arrested the man was this, that as soon as the man saw him coming, knowing him, he went into a house on each of the three days, and remained there at least five minutes, so that the policeman could not see him. Being a little doubtful about it—the man was strenuously denying it, and he was not defended—I sent for the occupier of the house, who turned out to be a man out of work; the policeman had to fetch him to give evidence in his favour; and he told me that on two days, the Thursday and Friday, the door was open, but that it was almost impossible for the man to have come in at that time, because his children came home from work, and he was at home, and that on Saturday they did not come home then, and the door was absolutely shut, that he had never seen the man, and that he had never had the man in his house. I think that was a case of a betting man being summoned, because he was a betting man, on wrong evidence. That, I think, is bolstering up a possibly genuine case by untrue evidence to account for the fact that on those days two people had gone up to him at the same time and the man had not been arrested. Now only last Thursday there were two young Jews of our district, because, as you know, it abounds with them, who were charged with being drunk and disorderly. They said they were coming home from a party, and it was at a quarter to four in the morning, but they were neither of them drunk, and they were not arrested for being drunk. A police-sergeant heard a woman scream in a street round the corner; he saw these two men, they slipped hurriedly round to Brick Lane and he stopped them, and quite rightly, too, I think, until he could find the woman; but when they found no woman then he said they both began to shout, and said, "We will get £60 damages against you." As they would not be quiet, and disturbed the neighbourhood, he arrested them, and then he charged them with being drunk and disorderly. He could have found out whether they were drunk long before when he first met them, it seems to me, and he could not by himself have taken two young people like that drunk and disorderly to the station except with great difficulty. I think that was a foolish charge to bring. I think perhaps they were making a little too much noise. As to one of them who told me he made all this noise I said: "You ought to be bound over not to make a noise in the street," but as to the other I dismissed it altogether, and I did not ask in that case for the doctor, but I believe in that case there was a certificate of the doctor attached to the charge sheet. I know that because 7s. 6d., or 3s. 6d. is put in my register. I never see the certificate nor the charge sheet unless I ask to look at it. It may be that some of these people put their defence before me because they think I am more willing to listen to them, and it is only fair to put the other side. About six years ago I asked a police-constable, "Did the prisoner say anything in answer to the charge," and the constable seemed very nervous and unwilling to answer, so I pressed him, and at last he said that the prisoner said, "I hope old Cluer will be sitting, and then I shall get off." It may be therefore that I err the other way, and that that induces people to set up before me defences that they might not be willing to set up before other Magistrates.

44980. (Mr. Dickinson.) But in this particular case you saw that these two lads were not drunk?—They were not drunk at all.

44981. The only defence that was set up was that they were not drunk?—Yes, not drunk. I think mistakes such as one has are quite pardonable, because it is difficult very often to distinguish between a man who is in a fit and a man who is drunk, because he is lying quite helpless and cannot speak. I remember the case of a man who had attended a Band of Hope meeting until a quarter to 10 and he was arrested in Hoxton Street at 10. He had a fit in Hoxton Street. I think that is a mistake that is quite pardonable. I remember very well the constable in that case was exceedingly fair in the way in which he gave his evidence, and, on being asked about it, he said, "I cannot tell, but, on hearing the evidence, I should think he had a fit."

44982. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You say a constable sometimes makes a mistake, but how does the Inspector taking the charge make a mistake?—That I cannot say.

44983. It is not quite so easy to reconcile that as a mistake?—That was an undoubted case on March 11th, 1899. I see my note on that is, "This constable swearing that the man was drunk and smelling strongly of liquor," and so on, is deplorable. I do not know why it is, but I think it is because it is part of one's business, and so many people are drunk that sufficient attention is probably not paid to the hundredth person, after the ninety-nine, who happens to be ill instead.

44984. You mean they get into the habit of treating every case as a case of drunkenness?—Yes, and I think there is that risk also if we do not take care of ourselves.

44985. (Chairman.) Coming to the next question, have you any comments to make with regard to the organisation and work of the police force?—All I can say as to that is that I think the Commissioner of Police and his subordinates all through should act with the greatest strictness in all cases which come before them where there is any misconduct of any kind, and I am satisfied from what I have come across that the Commissioner does not do so. I have had instances of it, and instead of people being, as was suggested in the questions put to Mr. Baggallay, dismissed for serious misconduct they are merely transferred to other divisions and allowed to see if they can delude another magistrate instead of the one who found them out. I think that is the only thing I can suggest. Anything which can raise the standard of truth telling, accuracy, and a sense of their duty towards the public, from the Commissioner downwards. I think is the only comment I can suggest which would assist the organisation and working of the police force but that is a very important point.

44986. You are, of course, acquainted with the rules and regulations of the Instruction Book?—No, I am not. I have never seen it.

44987. I do not mean that you are acquainted with them in detail, but you know there is an Instruction Book?—Yes, but I have never really seen one.

44988. As you have not examined them in any way it is no use my asking you whether there should be any amendment?—I am afraid I am quite unable to assist you as to that.

44989. As to the method of effecting arrests, are any complaints made to you by prisoners that they have been improperly arrested in the sense of being brutally treated or too roughly treated?—Complaints, but not well-founded complaints. People say "Look at my arm," and they pull their sleeves up; but really I have not had, I think, in the matter of arrests any well-founded complaints that the constable used more than necessary force. Of course, if a man resists, and if he begins to kick, he cannot be expected to be handled with kid gloves; and I think those complaints as to the manner of arrest are only made up in the hope of extracting sympathy from us.

44990. A similar remark, I suppose, applies to the conduct of a constable in conveying a prisoner from the place where he is arrested to the station?—Yes, sometimes people arrested in our district are terribly rough, refuse to go, and fight, and then nine-tenths of the crowd that comes on is hostile to the police, and they have a very difficult work to do.

44991. Have you any ground for thinking that the police use the power of summary arrest unnecessarily, I mean to say that they arrest people when they might just as well proceed by summons?—No, I have no ground for believing that at all, only in cases of assault I always urge them to give a reason why it was necessary to arrest a person, and I think after one has done that it gets to be known in your district and they generally recommend a summons. I think that depends a good deal on the Magistrate. If the Magistrate deprecates or disparages the bringing of charges that could be dealt with by summons, I think the police get to know it and they cease to arrest; they say to people who complain, "Take his name and address."

44992. Apart from Andrews's case, has any case of arrest by constables come before you during the last few months?—Not any case that I can remember, unless perhaps a statement that no application for a summons was made.

44993. I will now come to the proceedings in the charge room. I do not think I need ask you the earlier question which is put under that heading, but I will ask you whether the Inspectors as a rule exercise a sound discretion in taking or refusing to take charges?—Yes, I think they are exceedingly careful in all charges of felony, and they constantly, quite properly, refuse to take groundless charges, of which many are made in our neighbourhood. With regard to drunkenness, disorder and solicitation, it is absolutely impossible for the Inspector to do more than take what the constable says; he has no means of examining into the matter; and with regard to drunkenness there are so many different degrees of that: a man who perhaps has resisted coming to the station looks so dilapidated and shaken about that if I was sitting there either in the day time or at night time I think I might be just as much inclined on the look of the person to say, "Yes, that looks a sufficient charge," and to take it.

44994. When a person looks shaken about when the arrest has been effected in the way prescribed by the regulations, but supposing the prisoner has not been resisting?—If he has not been resisting he probably will not look like that.

44996. I think you were present when your learned colleague Mr. Baggallay was under examination?—Yes.

44997. Did you hear the question which I put to him to a certain extent, and which Mr. Dickinson put to him, on the question of the proceedings in the charge room?—Yes.

44998. If you will look at the questions on page 4 of the paper you will see what they were, and perhaps you will kindly tell us what you think on the matter?—I have tried to think about the matter, and I should be quite willing to suggest the appointment of an independent person if that person could remain at the station as independent of the police as the Magistrate remains in his Court, but unless that were the case, and unless the individual who was appointed to investigate charges all day and all night did remain so independent (and it is difficult for a Magistrate always himself to remain altogether uninfluenced by the police), I should say it would make no difference whatever after a short time.

44999. With regard to the cells, do prisoners ever complain of ill-treatment in the cells? We have heard one complaint, at any rate, that the cell was very dirty, and that the w.c. had not been flushed, and so on, but I was not thinking so much of that as whether on the whole you think they are neglected?—I can only say I have heard such things said, and I am obliged to say to the people who make them, "You admit you were drunk." Even if it happens it would be impossible to prove it on the evidence of a drunken man. But of course we have no control over the cells at the station. We are responsible for the condition of the cells in our own Court, the Magistrates are responsible for that, and they look after that, and go every now and then to see how they are kept.

45000. With regard to the regulations about bail, are they satisfactory?—Yes, I think the police give bail as often as they possibly can. They always bail young people in charges of felony, but not in charges of murder. The only difficulty is the natural difficulty of London; it may be one's friends are two miles away, and then they have to communicate with another police constable, and wake people up often at midnight, and beg them to come, and they come to bail their friends out. I think the facilities are not only as great as they can be subject to having the telephone everywhere, but that the Inspectors of police, and those on duty at the station offer bail quite liberally and freely, and very rarely do people refuse to come.

45001. What do you say as to medical attendance on prisoners?—I must say that I think the charge of 7s. 6d. for a doctor is a very high fee; I think that the 7s. 6d. is charged after 8 o'clock, but 9 o'clock I know has been anticipated; I know the hour has been fixed earlier, and that the higher fee is charged at an earlier hour than it used to be. I think that is a very high price for a doctor to charge dealing with persons in that class of life; they simply come in and put a piece of plaster on the man if he is injured, or examine him if he is drunk.

45002. Do you think it would be expedient, whenever a charge of drunkenness or of disorderly conduct is made against a man, that a medical attendant should be provided in every case?—No, I think drunken people would resent it greatly. They say, "You would probably have let me go off if I had not done any harm, but now I have to pay for the doctor."

45003. But supposing the doctor's charges were to come out of the public funds, would not the examination by a qualified practitioner be of great assistance to the Inspector and to the court?—Yes, but I have not thought of that part of it at all.

45004. What is in my mind is this: A respectable working man may be arrested for being drunk and disorderly, and afterwards, as you have told us, there is a possibility of a mistake, and if there should be a conviction against him it might lose him his employment. It is a very serious thing?—It is.

45005. Seeing that I suppose the great majority of the people who are arrested in London belong to the class of men who live by working with their hands, would it not be a real safeguard to have a medical attendant at every police station attending the police?—Yes, if he was a person able to keep himself free from bias altogether; if he could keep himself free from the natural bias of not acquiring his living, because it would be practically his living, and if a person were there, say all night, he could not be doing much work in the daytime, and he would be, as it were, a member of the Police Force; and the great difficulty we have is to get one member to contradict another. That, I think, is the difficulty that we particularly suffer from.

45006. I rather gather from that that even at the present time the medical man who does in fact come to examine the prisoners when they want him, is very much in alliance with the police?—Quite so.

45007. And he might be sitting in the Inspector's private room, say for two or three hours?—And they might refuse to let him have his own doctor, which is what he demands constantly. Many people who have a doctor say, "Send for my own doctor, I want to see him."

45008. That consideration leads me to think that the court ought to look with care at the medical testimony under those circumstances, even under the present system?—I think they generally do. I know at our court we never look at the medical certificate, and we never admit it.

45009. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It is not evidence?—No, it is not evidence. I think one who has to administer the law cannot impose too strictly upon himself all the regulations which the law imposes upon anybody, whether he is trying a man for murder, or whether he is trying a man for being drunk and disorderly.

45010. (Mr. Dickinson.) Is there no certificate in all cases of drunkenness?—No, there is always a certificate when a man is found drunk on licensed premises, that is to strengthen the case in proceedings taken against the licensee; but in other cases there is no medical certificate unless the person is injured, or the person insists on having a doctor.

45011. (Chairman.) Under the statutory provisions?—Yes, and adding that Statute 34 Edward III., Chapter 1. That says: "Shall bind over those who be of good fame." Subsequent editors have said "not" must have been left out—be not of good fame—and it is under that, "be not of good fame" that we bind over people. I am sure it is a blunder on the part of the editors, because people who were of good fame were allowed to be bound over, and then it goes on and says, "and the others sent to prison."

45012. Do you find any special difficulty in the application of these particular statutory provisions owing to the language in which they are couched, or other circumstances?—As to disorder, I think there is, and I wish I could suggest some clear method of defining what is disorderly conduct. I should like to see those words defined, because our Statute says: "All loose, idle, and disorderly persons." I need not say to you if that is the Statute, then to be arrested I must be not only disorderly, but I must be loose, and I must be idle also. It is not "loose, idle, or disorderly persons."

45013. Disorderly conduct alone does not appear as a statutory offence?—No, it is treated by us under our Commission entirely. We have to keep the peace. If a person yells and shouts in the street he is not keeping the peace, he is breaking it, and we must bind him over not to do it in future. We do that entirely without the statute.

45015. Can you give us a reference to that case?—Yes. It is in 18 Times Law Reports, page 99.

45016. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The only inhabitants who were annoyed were policemen?—They were not annoyed, or they did not mind it.

45017. (Chairman.) The police were annoyed because they immediately set the law in motion?—The name of the case is Brabham v. Wookey. It is one of Lord Alverstone's decisions. The decisions had been the other way before. I find as to solicitation that the common practice is to drop those words "to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers," that is to say, from the point of view of the prosecution, just as it is in playing football, and other offences which must be to the annoyance of inhabitants and passengers. My own view is that if that evidence is not given any conviction given by us is absolutely illegal, and ought to be quashed, and would be quashed if it were taken up.

45018. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You ought to have evidence of inhabitants or passengers?—Yes, always. Of course, with regard to using obscene language, I am bound in another place to follow the decision of the courts, but in this matter of solicitation I take it the Legislature in 1839 deliberately said that if a woman goes out into the street for the purpose of prostitution and annoys nobody she shall be free from any penalty whatever; and I can see no penalty imposed upon a decently-conducted prostitute who is walking the streets for the purpose of prostitution unless an inhabitant, or a passenger, is annoyed by her being there, not by what she does to him, but because it might be offensive to the father of a family that his girls should have to come home and see these people about. I take it that would be annoyance; at any rate, I should be inclined to accept that as annoyance.

45019. (Chairman.) So that if a woman was habitually walking about a particular street, and the father of a family came forward and said, "I have seen this woman accosting men in the street, and that annoys me," that would be evidence which you would accept?—Yes.

45020. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Putting the construction that you do upon it, that it must be to the annoyance of inhabitants the only question is as to the nature of it. Let me put this to you. Supposing you were sitting as a Magistrate, and evidence was called before you, and the policeman said he had for some time known the woman who was charged as a prostitute, and that he had on a particular evening seen her go up to one person after another, who had shaken her off and walked on, and she repeatedly did that a number of times to a number of persons, would it not be some evidence of annoyance to the inhabitants?—I have always thought that that is insufficient evidence of it. It is not, of course, quite the same thing as having hearsay evidence—"A man came up and complained to me," as they often do tell me, or they try to say that a man came up and complained; but it seems to me that that is insufficient to justify one in saying that it was to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers unless they go a little further. I would convict willingly if the policeman said "the man knocked her down, or showed signs of disgust at her," or something of that sort.

45021. I put in the words "shaken her off"?—Yes. Perhaps I ought not to be too strict in a matter like that, and perhaps if there were evidence like that, that they appeared to refuse her angrily, it would be evidence of annoyance. I think it would be. One ought not to be so strict as to encourage people of this sort, but, on the other hand, I am quite sure one ought not to be so slip-shod as to strike those words out of the section altogether.

45022. You ought to be careful, at any rate, to see that the charge is proved?—Yes.

45023. (Chairman.) I suppose similar observations apply to charges under the Vagrancy Act?—Yes. It is almost impossible to prove. A woman put her arm round two men's necks and seized hold of them—that was held not to be riotous or indecent, it was so held by the Queen's Bench.

45024. (Mr. Dickinson. Have you had many of these cases?—No. You see mine is a very different sort of district; mine is a business district altogether, with a large number of poor inhabitants, and, so far as I can see, almost all the prostitutes who come before me at Old Street come for being drunk, or for having sexual intercourse, but not for annoying the public in any way. I do not think we have had those cases at Worship Street or at Old Street to any extent.

45026. Have any cases come before you in which women have complained of solicitation or molestation by men?—Never.

45027. What have you to say as to the alleged suggestion of bribery of constables, or blackmailing by constables?—I have had no cases of that sort, except I remember a costermonger, of whom we have hundreds in our district, complaining that the reason why he was arrested was because he had taken somebody's stand and had not paid 4d. to the police-constable as the other person had. Whether it was true or not, of course, I could not find out.

45028. I will put to you this question in general terms. Have you any ground for believing that bribery of constables by prostitutes or bookmakers is common or widespread?—No, I have none at all. I have never had it alleged by bookmakers or by prostitutes.

45029. As to constables being prosecutors, are their prosecutions usually conducted in a satisfactory manner in your Court?—Yes, I think so. I think quite fairly.

45030. Do you think constables ought to be more frequently represented by counsel or solicitor, or that they ought to have the advantage or assistance of a solicitor?—I do not think it is necessary as long as the Magistrate keeps awake.

45031. Do you think it is necessary that the Superintendent or Inspector should be given somewhat more formal powers than they have if a constable is in difficulty with the Court?—I should be quite content to welcome him as managing every prosecution.

45032. You would not object to his having a locus standi and acting as an advocate?—Not in the least. I think it would add to the efficiency of the work.

45033. I think you have given us your evidence as to the way in which you deal with complaints. Have you yourself forwarded any complaints to the Chief Commissioner or to the Home Office?—Yes, to the Chief Commissioner, but not to the Home Office.

45034. What is your practice about that?—My practice is not to do it, since no notice has been taken of it. That is my practice. I now have to rely upon myself, and I hope the police of my district get to know me, and I get to know something about them. All I have found is that when policemen have been guilty of serious offences they have been transferred to another division, and that, it seems to me, is by no means the proper way to deal with policemen.

45035. When you say you are not satisfied with the action of the Chief Commissioner, do you mean no notice at all was taken of your complaint, or that you were dissatisfied with the result?—I was dissatisfied with the result, and Mr. Corser, who is a far better Magistrate than myself, and most of us, had the same experience. The letters are at the North London Police Court now. Two police-constables deliberately perjured themselves, and two other constables prosecuted them successfully. All four were simply removed to another division. When Mr. Corser asked the Commissioner to let him know why he had done that, and whether the innocent ones and the guilty ones were treated alike, he only got the answer, "Mind your own business."

45036. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) May I ask the date of that?—Yes, I have the letters here. I have the Commissioner's letter making that reply. It is dated 1890. The letter says: "With all due deference he cannot recognise any right in a Magistrate to ask him to discuss the nature and extent of the proceedings which in connection with a request for inquiry have been taken."

45037. Has the letter a reference number upon it?—$\frac{11}{4}\frac{9}{8}\frac{7}{5}$.

45038. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) What is the date of the letter?—22nd May, 1890. I have also brought copies of Mr. Corser's letters with reference to those two cases, and it was he himself, my colleague, who pointed out to me how useless it was to apply.

45039. (Mr. Dickinson.) That was before the present Commissioner was appointed?—I daresay.

45040. Who signed the letter?—Mr. Bruce signed the first letter. He is still Assistant-Commissioner. On the other hand, I myself have made a mistake. I remember one mistake in which I wrongly dismissed a charge of assualt by the police against a man, and, on the application of the man, I granted him a summons against the constable. I then had, to make it as fair as possible, to ask a colleague from another Court if he would mind taking the case so that the man might not be prejudiced, as I had already formed my opinion, but only as to a detail, I admit, on the evidence. My colleague took the case, and entirely acquitted the constable. Mr. Mead was good enough to try the case for me. Upon hearing that I wrote to the Commissioner myself, and said I hoped nothing would happen to this constable. He had already been transferred to another division. I expressed my regret for my blunder in that matter. All I got back was a printed communication saying, "The Commissioner directs me to acknowledge the receipt of your letter." That is the relation between Magistrates and the Commissioner, and it is a very deplorable one. It is a great pity that if we have cases, as I do, of police who go wrong, the Commissioner does not attend to them otherwise than by sending the men over to other divisions.

45041. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You have had a number of cases in which you have complained to the Commissioner of Police?—No, not a number. I have had a number of cases in which I ought to have complained, but I gave it up. I do not go on writing letters to an official who merely takes no notice of them.

Mr. A. R. Cluer.

45042. There were some complaints which you made, but in consequence of the way in which they were dealt with you have given up complaining as useless?—Yes.

45043. Which means, does it not, that you think in your view the inquiry is not satisfactory, and that policemen are not properly dealt with by the Chief Commissioner or those who inquire for him?—If a constable is found guilty of such misconduct as taking a false oath deliberately, then I do think it is improper treatment by the Commissioner, or anybody else, to retain him in the Force for a single hour.

45044. And you have found such cases?—I have.

45045. The one case that you referred to was at the North London Police Court?—Yes.

45046. There were two police-constables who did, in your view, commit perjury?—Yes.

45047. Was it before Mr. Corser or before you?—Before Mr. Corser.

45048. Was that in preferring a false charge against a person?—I believe the facts of the case were these: Some copings on pillars at the entrance to some little houses along a road were constantly being knocked off, and it was ultimately found out, I think, that one of the constables was the person who had been knocking them off. It was discovered by the assistance of the two others, who were put on specially to watch. I believe those were the facts of the case. The clerk there offered to look up the note for me if I wanted it, but I did not trouble him to send me the facts.

45049. Do you mind giving us some name, so that we can identify that case?—Yes, the two names were Gamblings and Patman.

45050. What happened was that two constables gave evidence against these two other constables. Is that it?—Yes. Mr. Corser said: "I do not quite understand whether the two constables whose evidence I did believe have been removed, or whether the two constables, Hyams and Pattison, whose evidence I did not believe, have been removed, or whether all four constables have been removed."

45051. The answer was that all four had been removed?—Yes.

45052. Is that all that took place with regard to those two men who, in your view, had perjured themselves?—At the time. Afterwards one of them was dismissed from the force for something else, so I have been told. I think he was charged with assaulting one of the constables who had given evidence against him.

45053. That was when he was in the other Division?—Yes.

45054. Is the other one still in the force, so far as you know?—I do not know.

45055. You have heard nothing to the contrary?—That was in 1890.

45056. I did not follow that. Those facts which you have been giving us information upon occurred as far back as 1890?—Yes. I gave them only because I gave a reason why I do not report to the Commissioner many cases that I ought to.

45057. Do you mind telling me when you were appointed?—1895.

45058. At first you sent in reports?—No. At first I did not know my duties sufficiently to that extent.

45059. But after you had been there a little time?—After a time I complained of more than one policeman, and I also got Inspectors to send in reports. An Inspector would come to me and say, "Do you wish your remarks to be reported?" and I said, "Yes," and they were reported, and when I found nothing came of it I gave it up.

45060. Have you ever made any report since Sir Edward Henry has been Commissioner?—I do not know how long he has been Commissioner.

45061. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) 1903?—No.

45062. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You have never made any complaint to the present Commissioner?—No. I gave it up; I did not expect any good to come of it. I am not allowed to write to the papers about it, and it is much better not, and therefore I leave it alone.

45063. Is that a thing which is common among Magistrates at all?—No; I do not think so. Mr. Corser had warned me about it; I was his colleague for 11 years.

45064. You think it is not the view of your brother Magistrates?—No, I should think not at all. I never heard them say anything about it, but I am quite sure that if they knew that such a case as two persons convicted of false evidence being merely transferred to another Division were possible they would agree with me that it is undesirable.

45065. You have no reason to think that the system is any different now to what it was then?—The Assistant-Commissioner who wrote this letter is the same. I have no reason to think it is different.

45066. Do you know what the system is of inquiring into charges made against a policeman?—No. You mean by the Commissioner?

45067. Yes, if a charge is made against a policeman, and then there is an inquiry into it at the instance of the Commissioner?—No, I do not know at all.

45068. We have been told if an inquiry is held it is held by, generally speaking, the Divisional Inspector, then reported upon to the Assistant-Commissioner or to the Commissioner, and then it is dealt with by the Commissioner upon that report. Do you think it would be an advantage to have some official, say an Assistant-Commissioner, who was a person trained in taking evidence and in investigating cases when the holding of such inquiries might be necessary?—I hardly feel competent to advise upon a matter like that. I really have not thought about it.

45069. I will tell you what I mean. I mean as distinguished from the present Court of Inquiry, which apparently is conducted by the Divisional Inspector. If a charge is made against a policeman to the Commissioner, and there is an inquiry held, do you think it would be an advantage to have that inquiry conducted by a person who is not a policeman, and who has nothing to do with the Police Force, and who simply has to inquire into these charges. Do you think it would lead to more independent inquiry?—It would lead to more independence; that is probable.

45070. It would depend, I suppose, a great deal upon the person who was administering this duty?—Yes; the personal element, the personal equation must come in.

45071. Assuming he is a person who has had experience of evidence, of inquiries, and of investigations, and that he did his duty properly, it might make a satisfactory tribunal, might it not?—Yes, of course it might. I should always be willing to give my reasons for having doubted in a particular case, purely in the interest of the police. It must be to their interest that those whom they themselves know to be unsafe persons should be removed from the Force. I should be always willing myself to do so if I were sure of not being treated as these letters treated my colleague. I should have gone myself with my complaints, and I should have endeavoured in the public interest to get such police-constables removed; but if I wrote to the Home Office I should only be told, "This must come through the Chief Magistrate." That is what the Home Office say. If I write to the Commissioner, I get nothing.

45072. You said something about some regulation by which the Police Inspector should have the right of appearing against the accused, but would not that result in this, that you would still have a very large number of cases in which the accused would not be defended?—I think you would have all the points elicited. I do not think I would urge that he should be allowed to argue the case, but if he might question his own witnesses that he had there in a proper manner it would assist us considerably. That is all I meant. Of course, the position of an accused person, if he is innocent, and if he is poor and ignorant, is one of the most pitiful sights that can come before anybody. I remember very well Mr. Justice Stephen pointing that out long ago, and I was greatly impressed by his remarks upon it. He said: "The wretched man has really got a case that he can put forward, but he is unable to put it forward unless you can assist him." It is one of the saddest sights one can have, and it is one of the most difficult things to help. I did not mean that there should be an advocate. I was thinking of the excellent way in which the Superintendents (some of them admirable men), after they have laid the information (if a solicitor does not come to prosecute), put the questions themselves to their subordinates in the witness box. They have the right to do so if they lay the information for a summons. That is the experience we get. The Superintendent or Inspector then has the right to ask questions—not as a concession, but as of right, and it is done so admirably that if it were done more in other cases it would conduce to the work being better carried out.

45073. You mean you have to keep watch over the case?—Yes, we have to keep watch really between the two.

45074. Do you see any reason why, assuming of course, that it can be managed, if any person who is charged desires to be defended, he should not be assisted to be defended, and would it not be very much better that that should be done?—It would very often. Of course, if it happened that a defence was raised by counsel or solicitor in every case that came before us that would double our duties, but for my part I should not object to that, provided it helped us to arrive at more just decisions. I do not think anybody ought to object to that, because we do not, after all, have too much hard work. I see no objection to it; I should be glad to have it, but it is a matter of detail, and the expense would be tremendous.

45075. What I was thinking was this: In a great number of cases there is no defence?—No.

45076. And persons do not desire to be defended?—No, they do not.

45077. In a great number of cases it is a question of a fine or of being dealt with at once, whichever the person prefers?—Yes.

45078. It is in comparatively few cases, is it not, that there are defences raised before you?—Yes, comparatively few.

45080. I am thinking of the case of a man such as you described when you referred to the language of Mr. Justice Stephen, who does not know what to do, and is awed by being in a Police Court, and does not appreciate that the Magistrate is desirous of assisting him, and, even if he did appreciate it, he would not have the power of expressing what the facts are or what his defence should be. Supposing in a case a man has a right to be defended, it might no doubt mean adjourning for a day or two, if he desired it, but it would seem better that he should have the advantage of a defence?—If any scheme can be devised which is practicable, I for one should certainly welcome it, because I have had the good fortune not to have them myself, but I have seen more than one or two letters from persons to my colleagues, persons who have been convicted, that have convinced me and them that the conviction was a mistake; they have been for trivial matters, such as gambling and things like that, but they have been letters of a sort which, I think, could hardly be invented. Certainly, anything which would tend to save us from what is really the most dangerous thing in the administration of justice—that is, the convicting of an innocent person—ought to be welcomed by everybody who has to deal with the administration of justice.

45083. Do you get much complaint before you of illusage in the charge room?—No. I do get it said, but as I said before, I say to the people, "You were half-drunk, it is useless for you to make that allegation," because, even if it is true, it cannot be proved. I do have it said, and I have myself said very often, that I regret to hear the allegation made. I have said that before now when I have heard it perhaps three or four times in a week. Whether there is any truth in it, of course, I cannot tell.

45084. Complaint has been made on the occasions you have referred to, but do you recollect whether it was made by persons who came there for the first time?—Generally by persons who have been often there, because they say there is spite against them. This is the sort of thing: Joseph Nagle, an ex-convict (a man I know perfectly well and he knows me), was charged with being drunk and disorderly. He said to the constable, "I passed you at the corner. Why did you follow me 200 yards and pounce on me when two other constables were also there? I went quite quietly." The constable admitted he went quite quietly. He said, "You know I would not have gone quietly if I had been drunk. Then you said to me, 'I will give you telling tales about us to that old Cluer.' I wish, Mr. Cluer, you would come yourself and see how the constables treat us after 12 in the streets; it is cruel." You must discount a remark like that made by an ex-convict; it is no use swallowing it as absolute truth; and yet it always strikes me that there is a grain of truth in it. There was a man walking home, he was half-drunk, or nearly drunk, or quite drunk; he had evidently been left to pass knowing he was rather a troublesome fellow, and then they thought it worth while to catch him with three constables instead of two—a very prudent thing to do if he was to be caught at all. These things when you hear them necessarily impress you; there is a substratum of truth, and, of course, an enormous amount of exaggeration.

45085. (Mr. Dickinson.) Only one question with regard to these cases that you have given us. You have given us, I think, two cases as recently as last year?—Yes, and some this week.

45086. Those were cases in which you convinced yourself that the police had not told the truth or had not behaved quite properly, and you took no action about it for the reason you have told us?—Yes.

45087. Why do you not mark the charge sheet, because that would have been a protest?—I have been twelve years at it, and I must say marking the charge sheet I always thought was solely for the purpose of praise and not of blame. I have never made a mark of blame on a charge sheet at all, and I did not know until I heard it stated by my colleague that it was used for that purpose at all.

45088. We have had it from other witnesses, I think?—It is one of the details that has escaped me. It has never been mentioned to me, and I have never treated it as a proper method of procedure.

45089. When you heard these cases did you dismiss them with any observation?—Often I do.

45090. But these cases that you have given us of Davis's and Fardell's carmen?—In Davis's case particularly.

45091. You dismissed the case with an observation which would have shown that you were not satisfied with the conduct of the police?—Yes. I never hesitate to do that.

45092. There is always an Inspector in Court, is there not?—Yes.

45093. You do not know whether or not that observation is conveyed to the police?—No, I do not think it is at all.

45094. We are told that it is so in every case.

45095. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Davis's case was considered by the Commissioner. When Magistrates make observations they are reported by the Inspector, and the matter is investigated by the Commissioner?—For that purpose I should like Mr. Cluer to give us the date, if he can?—I have not got it, I have thrown the letter away. You can find the date. The case in which I expressed my regret to the Commissioner for the mistake that I had made was a case in Playhouse Yard. I am sure I can find it for you, and I will find you the date.

45096. Will you also supply us with particulars of those cases that you have mentioned, so that we can consult the Commissioner with regard to them?—Yes, I will supply you with what I can. I have left out several, but I have plenty more. I do not think, however, I ought to trouble about those.

45097. (Chairman.) Mr. Cluer, we are deeply indebted to you for coming here, and we thank you for your evidence.

Sir RALPH D. M. LITTLER, C.B., K.C., sworn.

Sir R. D. M. Littler, C.B., K.C.

45098. (Chairman.) You are one of His Majesty's Counsel and Chairman of Quarter Sessions of the County of Middlesex?—I am.

45099. I need not ask you anything further about your qualifications or about your experience in our Courts of Justice, but I understand that you practised for a great many years in criminal courts at the Sessions and at the Assizes on your Circuit?—Yes, on the Northern Circuit, especially in Lancashire, and more especially in Liverpool.

45100. And, of course, in the course of your practice you became intimately acquainted with the method in which proceedings are taken in the three classes of cases (indictable offences) that we have to inquire into?—Yes, I did. Of course, my practice, except very exceptionally in the police court, was mainly with regard to indictable offences tried by a jury.

45101. Apart from your experience of the police that you gained as counsel in those courts you have been now for a good many years Chairman of Quarter Sessions?—Yes.

45102. And, of course, you have come in contact with the Metropolitan Police a good deal in that way?—Very largely.

45103. From that the Commission thought that you might perhaps be willing and able to give us a little assistance with regard to the matters upon which we have to inquire?—I shall be very pleased to do so. I regard it as a public duty at your request.

45104. We have sent you a kind of memorandum of the heads of evidence, and there we have stated on the first page the exact terms of reference. You will see that they are somewhat limited. The first question I should like to ask you is one of quite a general character, and that is whether in your opinion the Metropolitan Police discharge their duties as a rule with discretion, honesty, and efficiency?—That is clearly my opinion, and with a very high degree of all three.

45105. In any of the capacities in which you have come in contact with the police have you noticed any misconduct on the part of any constable in the Force?—Except on two occasions, when I had the misfortune to try a policeman for felony, when I told him he was much more blameworthy than ordinary persons, I have known of no instance of misconduct, and that, of course, was not in the discharge of his duty; it was absolutely in default of duty.

45106. Have you any comment to make on the organisation of the Metropolitan Police Force?—What I have found has been this. When I first had the honour of being elected by my brother Magistrates to preside in this court there was a certain degree of keenness for securing convictions, and sometimes the volunteering of evidence which ought not to have been given, but that has absolutely disappeared, and the training of successive Police Commissioners and of the other high officials of the Force has been directly in the opposite way; that is to say, as far as I can learn, the police are warned and taught to be perfectly fair and perfectly impartial as between the Crown and the prisoner; and I am sure that that training has had very great effect. I do not think that any constable who comes here thinks that he is likely to get a reward by going out of his way, but I think, on the contrary, he feels he very likely will be blamed not only by the court, but by what he cares a good deal more about—namely, his superiors.

45107. Have you observed any improvement in the general character of the Force?—My experience as to the general character of the Force is this. Of course, we know that they are taken from a class which has not had the opportunity of high education, but I think for their class they are very intelligent, and, what is more important, I think they are exceedingly fair. I have found constables over and over again, when they have been standing in the witness-box here, volunteer statements in favour of the prisoner. For example, a man is called to prove several convictions, and he volunteers the statement, "But since his last conviction I find he has been doing his best to get an honest livelihood," or things of that kind.

45108. You have been over the questions that are contained in our memorandum?—Yes, I have.

45109. I gather that you are not able to answer in detail as to most of the questions?—As to most of them they are really matters which come more within the purview of Metropolitan police Magistrates than within my notice, but I should like, although perhaps I am volunteering it, to say that having seen how the police are acting, and knowing the area over which they have to work with a comparatively limited force, I can only say I think it would be a great misfortune if public confidence in the Metropolican Police Force were shaken. They have to perform their difficult duties, they have to be responsible for the lives and property of some seven millions of people, and either they ought to be very good, or, if they are not very good, it ought to be found out. My view is that it would be a very great misfortune, having regard to the experience I have had of them, if public confidence were shaken with regard to the way in which they at present discharge their duties.

45110. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I suppose that means assuming they discharge their duties at present properly?—Certainly. All I am able to afford the Commissioners information about is that they do discharge their duties marvellously well. Certainly, it is of the highest importance that they should be efficient, and being, as I believe, efficient, it would be a great misfortune if, by reason of the misconduct of one or two, public confidence were shaken in a body of men, who, in my view, perform their duty better than any police force I have ever been in contact with.

45111. That would mean it would be a very undesirable thing that the public should judge of the whole Force by one or two instances?—You have put to me precisely what I desire to convey to the Commission. As far as I can see, but you have a great deal more experience than I have, I can say that the police have discharged their duties exceedingly well. I might perhaps say this which has just occurred to me. I did not mention it when I sent in my memorandum to the Commission; I have for six years lived in Kensington, having previously lived in the County of Middlesex, and I must say that I think there is a marked diminution in the number of offences with which you are dealing, and I cannot help thinking that that is owing to the vigilance of the police in that district.

45112. And particularly as we have heard in some of the evidence with reference to solicitation in the streets?—Quite.

45113. It has improved remarkably, according to the evidence before us?—I very often have to go home about the time when I suppose you would be most likely to see the people who commit that class of offence, and I have been very much struck with the more orderly appearance of the streets, both with regard to drunkenness and the other offences to which you refer from year to year.

45114. Your experience is that you see fewer drunken persons about the streets than there used to be?—Quite.

45116. Of course, in your experience you dismiss cases or cases have not been proved?—Certainly, but I do not remember any case in which there has been any such suggestion as that a police-constable has in any way got up a case, or has done anything more than discharge his duties as any ordinary witness would do. I have also had one experience which has pleased me very much, and that is on more than occasion, the prisoner in the dock being undefended, evidence has been given as to his previous career, and I have said to him, "Have you anything to say?" One case especially impresses itself on my mind. The man, previously thrice convicted, said, "I cannot call anybody except the fixed point man where I have been working." I said to him that was possibly a dangerous thing unless he was quite safe. He said he was quite safe. I telephoned to Scotland Yard and ordered that constable to come. He came and he gave evidence so strongly in the prisoner's favour that I released him on recognisances, and I asked questions of him, as I have of other constables, as to his knowledge of those convictions. Wherever there has been any suggestion of a man being hunted down, I have been very careful to examine him myself, so that I might, if possible, call the attention of the Commissioner to the matter. I know no instance in the whole 18 years I have been here of any prisoner being able to establish that, having got decent employment after conviction, the police had either given information or had so acted in discharge of their watching under either the ticket-of-leave part of the sentence or where he has been subjected to police supervision as to prejudice him. I have not been able in any instance to trace a man having been discharged from his employment by reason of improper interference by the police.

45117. Have you had any cases in which a prisoner has been acquitted by a jury, and in which you yourself had any doubt about the behaviour of the police?—No, I do not think I can remember one in which the acquittal has been due to anything more than the ordinary question of doubt. I always strongly warn juries of the right of a man to be acquitted if there is the least doubt. I remember one case in which it was supposed the police had either committed perjury or made a strongly coloured statement for the purpose of securing a conviction.

45118. You do not know of one case?—I do not know of one case in the whole time.

45119. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Do you find any tendency in the police to support one another?—I think I remember one case, and one case only, because generally speaking the police now are very careful in taking down notes, and I am very careful in seeing those notes if I think there is any reason for finding any discrepancy. I do remember one case of quite a young constable who had taken a note himself, and I think he said rather more than the circumstances warranted him in saying for the purpose of supporting his superior officer; but that was about ten years ago.

Sir R. D. M. Littler, C.B., K.C. 4 May 1907.

45120. In the Occurrence Book do you mean?—We hardly ever hear of the Occurrence Book here. What we have so constantly is that constables take down a note of what a prisoner has said when they have taken him into custody; perhaps he has talked on the way to the constable, and what I find is that they take that down immediately after, and whenever those notes have been taken down it has struck me that they had a genuine ring. I may be mistaken like anybody else, but my view has always been that the police have stated that which was favourable to him as well as that which was unfavourable, so far as one can judge. They always have a little memorandum book, and I have more than once examined those books for the purpose of seeing whether the man in the witness box has made the whole of his statement, and so on, and I have always found they have been perfectly fair.

45121. It does not often happen, does it, that a prisoner disputes the account which the constable gives of what the prisoner said when he was arrested?—Very seldom. Every now and then of course I have a prisoner who comes into the box and says everything which has been stated is a lie; but, as a rule, I do not remember that prisoners often ask a question about it.

45122. It strikes me that very often a statement is made which is strongly in favour of the police, but sometimes you do hear a dispute as to that which is a very important statement?—I think it is very seldom they dispute it unless they go, to use a common expression, the whole hog, and say it is a lie, but I do not know of any jury case in which the jury have not believed the statement of the constable in preference to that of the prisoner on such a question as that.

(Chairman.) We are greatly indebted to you, Sir Ralph, for your evidence.

FORTY-NINTH DAY.

Tuesday, 7th May 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esq., K.C., M.P.
Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. St. Lawrance Leslie, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
J. F. Waley, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Mr. Edmund Charles D'Eyncourt, sworn.

45123. (Chairman.) Are you one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates?—Yes.

45124. When were you appointed?—I was appointed at Christmas, 1896.

45125. To what courts have you been appointed?—North London, Greenwich, Woolwich, and Clerkenwell.

45126. I think you have received from us a communication, in response to which you said you would be good enough to come and give evidence before us?—That is so.

45127. I need not read you the terms of reference. Would you like me to ask you some questions, or would you prefer to make a statement?—I think I should prefer your putting questions, and I will try and answer them.

45128. With regard to the first general question, what, in your opinion, are the duties of constables in the metropolis with regard to the three classes of cases into which we have to inquire?—To put a stop to them—to stop open drunkenness in the streets, solicitation, and disorder.

45129. You have had a good many years' experience as a Magistrate, and of course a great many constables have been called before you, and a great many cases have been heard by you. What opinion have you formed on the question whether the police discharge their duties, as a rule, with discretion and efficiency?—As far as I can say, I think they discharge their duties with all three—honesty, efficiency, and discretion, and I may add perhaps, in spite of what a learned colleague of much greater experience has said, with very great intelligence.

Mr. E. C. D'Eyncourt.

45130. Have any recent instances of misconduct, or possible misconduct, come under your notice in the discharge of your duties?—I have only had in the last few years one at all serious charge of misconduct in the way of assault against a constable, and that occurred not very long ago at Clerkenwell. It touches really on another point, as it arose through a man being charged with disorder and using obscene language, and the Inspector at the station did not think there was sufficient to justify him in taking the charge. The man whom the constable sought to charge made no complaint at all at the station of any ill-usage or assault, but he afterwards applied to me for a summons against the constable, and I think brought a witness on the application. I granted him a summons. I heard it at considerable length. His case was very ably put by Earl Russell, but I dismissed the summons against the constable. It was one of those cases in which the man was a notoriously bad character, and the constable had seen him outside a public-house where he had no doubt committed an assault on the previous day, and he asked him to move on. The man, according to the constable, used bad language, whereupon the constable arrested him, and it was in the course of this arrest that this man who brought the summons said that he had been assaulted, but on the hearing of the case I came to the conclusion that there was no assault of a definite character. Of course, these were two very powerful men, and the prisoner resisted, but that was all.

45131. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Was it suggested that the truncheon was used?—No, it was not suggested for a moment.

45132. Then I do not quite understand what the assault was?—The man who took the summons out said that he was moving away when the constable kicked him and then struck him. No doubt the constable followed him.

45133. (Chairman.) You found that the constable had not assaulted and beaten him?—I came to the conclusion that there was not enough evidence.

45134. (Mr. Whitmore.) That is not a case of misconduct?—That was alleged misconduct.

45135. (Chairman.) Have you any comment or criticisms to make upon the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force in regard to the three classes of cases which I have mentioned?—No, I really have not. It seems to me to be excellent. I ought perhaps to mention that there was one case, which some question arose about in the House of Commons, as to a constable arresting a woman, whom I discharged. I came to the conclusion that he made an error of judgment, but nothing more. I have the notes of that case here, if you would like to have them.

45136. You might perhaps give them to us. You need not mention names?—It was a case that Mr. Gladstone had to speak about in the House. These are my notes of the evidence in the case:—"William Roberts: Just before 1 a.m. to-day I saw the prisoner Ellen ——loitering outside Highbury Station. She put herself in the way on two occasions of men crossing the road, and entered into conversation with them. I asked her to go. She became abusive, and told me to do——" something. "She went along Upper Street, and entered into conversation with another man. I again asked her to go. She refused, and said, 'I am a respectable married woman. Lock me up.' I arrested her, and took her to the station." She was remanded till July 4th on her own bail. On that occasion she was represented by a solicitor, and gave evidence. Her evidence was this: "I was in Upper Street. A male friend spoke to me, named So-and-so. The constable told me to move on; he took me into custody. I spoke to no other man." Then another man, a gentleman—I need not give his name—gave his evidence, and said, "I saw the constable arrest the prisoner. He struck her, and used unnecessary violence. I heard the constable say he would arrest her for accosting men. She at once denied the charge in a civil and quiet way, and went quietly." Then that evidence was corroborated by two other independent witnesses. The woman was charged with disorder and bad language. I discharged her.

45138. We have put down in the memorandum for your guidance some questions upon which we invite your evidence in case you should be able to assist upon any of the points mentioned. Do you know the Instruction Book?—Yes, to a certain extent.

45139. Have you any amendments to suggest or any criticisms to offer upon the Instruction Book?—The only omissions I can see in it are, and I may be wrong—these gentlemen perhaps will correct me if I am wrong—that there are no directions when a man is charged with being drunk, and denies it, as to sending for a doctor in that case. It is invariably done, but there are no instructions to that effect. And I think there are no instructions as to the exact specific method to be observed in the charge-room—that is to say, whether the prisoner should be put into the dock or not. I understand that usually the prisoner is put into the dock, but the dock is not quite the same as in a criminal court; there is a sliding rail.

45140. Is it your impression that the prisoner is put into the dock in the charge room before the charge is accepted by the Inspector?—That I do not really know, but I understand it is the practice, certainly where there is any charge of violence at all or disorder, to put him in the dock.

45141. Do you think that there ought to be an instruction to the Inspector or the Acting Inspector in the charge room that the prisoner ought not to be put into the dock until he has decided to take the charge?—No, I would not say that because I think that is a case in which the Inspector must really judge. It is so very difficult. One gets a great number of cases where violent prisoners have assaulted constables and people in the charge room—a great number. I see there is a special direction that prisoners are not to be put in the cells unless it is necessary.

45142. Have you any remarks to make upon the arrangement of the Instruction Book?—That is a mere question of editing. I notice that it is slightly diffused. You get instructions on the various points in different parts of the book, but I am not sure that is not necessary.

45143. It is rather difficult to find what you want at the moment in it?—Occasionally. That is only a question of re-editing. I think the matter is excellent.

45144. The matter is substantially in accordance with what you think it ought to be?—I think so. I think it is excellent so far as I can say.

45145. Then passing from the Instruction Book to the question of arrest, are the directions as to the method of effecting arrests satisfactory?—I think so. As far as I remember they are, that it should be done as quietly as possible, and with as little disturbance as possible, the prisoner taken by the arm and nothing more.

45146. Do prisoners ever complain before you that they have been treated by constables irregularly or with undue violence on the way to the police station?—Occasionally.

45147. What have you observed as to that kind of complaint?—As a rule there is very little in it. A half-drunken man cannot be handled very gently, and he does not remember his kicks and struggles, but he remembers somewhat a feeling of stiffness the next morning perhaps.

45148. Do you remember any case in which you thought from what the prisoner said or from marks of violence shown by the prisoner that the complaint was well justified?—Not for some years. I have once or twice some years ago thought the truncheon was used perhaps with a little more violence than was necessary, but it is extremely difficult in those cases to say without seeing the actual fight or struggle. I have known it very seldom and never sufficiently for me to have called the attention of the Commissioner to it or taken any step of that sort.

45149. Have you any reason to believe that constables ever use their power of arresting unnecessarily? What I mean is this, that the statutes dealing with these three offences give power of summary arrest to the Metropolitan police-constables. Do you think they use those powers unnecessarily owing to bad temper or any other cause?—No, I do not think so. In these cases it is not a question of taking the name and address and summoning afterwards. They have to stop the thing going on then and there. They have to stop a drunken man being riotous or a woman soliciting or behaving disorderly, and by simply taking the name and address that cannot be done. They must arrest.

45150. Then you are really answering the question I was next going to put to you, which is, do constables ever arrest people when they might just as well proceed by summons?—Of course in some cases it might be done, but not in those classes of cases. I see Mr. Plowden mentioned the case of cruelty to horses. The reason for that is that it is most important that the horse should be brought immediately to be seen, and what happens is that the horse going along with a sore shoulder or very lame has got to be taken to the station, and the man goes with it. He is brought before the court as soon as possible, or if it cannot be till the next morning he is always let out on bail.

45151. You say that in the case of drunkenness and disorder in the streets and solicitation in the streets the method of proceeding by summons is not as a rule applicable at all?—No.

45152. Now coming to the charge room, do you find that prisoners before you or defendants before you ever complain that they have been improperly treated in the charge room, that they have not been heard by the Inspector or that he has been guilty of any irregularity?—No, I have never heard of such a complaint. In fact, they occasionally appeal from the constable to the Inspector who took the charge.

45153. Do you think from your experience that Inspectors as a rule exercise a sound discretion in taking or refusing charges?—I think so.

45154. Of course, in some cases, though I suppose by no means the majority, you do acquit the prisoner and dismiss the charge?—Oh! yes, certainly.

45155. Do you recollect any case in which you have dismissed the charge in which you formed the judgment that the charge ought not to have been taken by the Inspector?—Not in this class of case. It occasionally occurs in those difficult cases of obtaining lodgings, or money, or something of that sort, by false pretences.

45156. Cases in which the charge amounts to an indictable offence?—Yes, or might amount to it.

45157. Does your experience lead you to believe that Inspectors are from professional bias or other causes unduly prone to take charges that a Magistrate or other competent unbiassed person not connected with the police force would, if he was in command of the charge room, refuse?—No, I do not think they do. To illustrate that, I have occasionally come across a statement made as to something that has been done not in the particular case before one, and I have asked how it was that there was no charge made in that case, and the Inspector has said that "the evidence was so and so before me, and I did not think it amounted to sufficient to justify a charge." That has frequently happened, and I have always found their discretion very wisely used.

45158. What in your view is the character of the proceedings in the charge room? You know what is stated in the Instruction Book as to the duty of the Inspector. What is the character of the duty cast upon him? Is it a merely executive duty, or does it partake of a judicial character as well?—It seems to partake of all three of those that you have put down in this question, a disciplinary hold on the constable, a means of securing the attendance of the person arrested at the police court, and a preliminary investigation into the guilt of the prisoner. It seems to me to amount to all of those, and in addition of course when a person is arrested in the street a constable has to do something with him, and he has to take him somewhere. He cannot stand with him the whole of the rest of the time he is on duty, and therefore something has to be done with him. I do not see what else could be done when prisoners are taken to the police station but what is done.

45159. Then his duty, as I understand you, is to consider whether there is a prima-facie case, to consider, first of all, what is the charge, whether it is a charge in respect of which the constable has the power to arrest summarily?—Yes.

45160. And then to consider what the constable says in support of his charge?—Yes.

45161. And if he comes to the conclusion there is a prima-facie case then he ought to take the charge. That is what I understand is the effect of your evidence?—Yes, certainly. It is really the province almost of a grand jury to see if there is a prima-facie case.

45162. Take the case of drunkenness. Supposing a constable says to the Inspector "I charge this man"—that is the prisoner—"with having been drunk and disorderly in Piccadilly, and I arrested him," and the Inspector on looking at the man comes to the conclusion that the man is not drunk. What is the Inspector's duty then?—I should think he would probably in that case if he had no doubt about it at all let the man go.

45163. In other words, he would refuse the charge?—Yes.

45164. With the consequence that the refusal of the charge would be entered in the refused charge book?—Certainly.

45165. Then supposing he is not quite sure. Supposing he has got a doubt about the matter, what is the Inspector's duty?—I suppose he would be entitled then to summon a doctor to his assistance, and I should think that would probably be his duty. I should think he would do so probably if the man denied being drunk, and the constable persisted in the charge.

45166. You think he ought to summon a doctor, even though the prisoner does not ask that he should be examined by a doctor?—I think that if the constable persists in the charge that the man was drunk at the time, and the Inspector is in doubt about it as to whether there is sufficient to make a prima-facie case, then I should think, aside from police regulations, that he ought to summon a doctor in that case to decide. I do not quite know whether that is done. That case very seldom occurs, I think.

45168. The suggestion that you are referring to is simply this: under the present system the Inspector must either refuse the charge or accept the charge. If he refuses the charge the prisoner goes at once without bail. If the Inspector accepts the charge it is his duty to detain the prisoner in the cells until he is released on proper bail?—Or at the station—not necessarily in the cells.

45169. Quite so. In that case if the charge is taken it must come before the Magistrate the following day?—Yes.

45170. The suggestion is this, that the Inspector might have the power of releasing the prisoner upon giving bail to attend, say, the next day at the police station for the further consideration of the question whether the charge ought to be accepted. Do you see any objection to the adoption of that suggestion?—Yes, I do. I think it would lead to an inquiry, as I say, behind the back of the person charged, and if he is charged he is entitled to have his accusers then and there at the station before him, and then and there to have the charge taken, and to go before a Magistrate. I do not think I would at all say anything in favour of any private inquiry out of his presence.

45171. Take a case of this kind: a woman is brought in in custody charged with solicitation. She says, "I am not a prostitute at all, I am a respectable married woman, and my husband is X. Y." Supposing her husband is away from home she may not be able to get bail there and then. If the Inspector takes the charge she is kept in the cells all night, and then brought up in public to be tried on this charge. That is a very grievous trial, is it not, to a respectable woman?—Yes, very.

45172. And in a case like that, for instance, she hardly likes to go to her friends if her husband is away from home. She would then think, "I will send for my people," if she has a brother, or some friend, but whatever friend she may have in mind it is a very painful thing for her to have to do, is it not?—It is, I quite agree.

Mr. E. C. D'Eyncourt.

45173. Then the suggestion is that in all cases where the Inspector looking at the woman has any doubt in his own mind as to whether she does belong to this class of woman or not, where he thinks there may be truth in her allegation that she is a respectable married woman, and it has been an accident that she should have been caught in suspicious circumstances and surrounding, that he should have the right of saying, "Well, madam, I will let you go if you will give your name and address, and you must attend here to-morrow, and then you may bring your husband or bring any friends you like, and then I will consider whether I will take the charge." What objection is there to his taking that course? Please do not think I am expressing my opinion: I am only seeking to ascertain yours?—As I said before, I think it would make it an inquiry behind the accused person's back to begin with, and I think there is very great objection to all that sort of thing going on, and trying the case. As to the hardship, my experience is that it is very, very seldom that such a case occurs.

45174. Very likely. It is of course the one-hundredth case, the hard case, that always gives rise to difficulty and to attacks upon a system. I know it is a very rare case, but I do not quite follow what you say about an inquiry behind the back of the accused. Take the case I have put. The charging constable tells his story, I assume quite honestly, that he saw this lady speaking to no fewer than three men, one after another, at midnight, in such and such a street, and he arrested her. She says: "It is all a mistake. I am a respectable married woman, and I can explain everything," but she wants time. The suggestion is that the question of taking the charge might be adjourned for twenty-four hours. The constable may do nothing more. Why should the constable do anything more? The accused goes away, knowing that if she does not come the next day with her husband or supported by her friends, the charge will be taken. If the husband comes and the whole matter is then and there explained, and the Inspector says, "I am satisfied," the charging constable ought to say, "Very well, I am content"?—Of course, the Inspector, or whoever takes the charge when this woman is dismissed pro tem. on bail, or under some sureties, would then proceed to make inquiries, and he would make all the inquiries he could through the police.

45175. Would the Inspector make inquiries?—I suppose he would.

45176. Why should the Inspector make inquiries?—I understood that was the proposition, that taking the charge should be put off for twenty-four hours, or longer, if necessary, while inquiry was made.

45177. No. I see no objection to inquiries being made, but that was not part of my hypothesis. The Inspector simply turns to the constable and says, "I cannot take the charge now, but I will take the accused's bail that she will appear here at 3 p.m. to-morrow"?—You mean to give a little longer time for her to prepare her defence.

45178. Yes. I would suggest to you that the Inspector is discharging his duties, as you said he discharges duties of a quasi judicial character, and he would probably make no inquiry at all. It would be no part of his duty to do it. The constable might perchance, but I do not see what interest he would have to do it?—I do not think I quite understood your question. As I followed it it was this, that when there was any doubt about a charge it should be competent for the person in charge of the station to postpone taking that charge at all for a definite time, so that the person might have an opportunity of clearing himself, or rather, establishing the utter improbability of the charge. Am I to understand that during that time either the Inspector or the police-constable charging should make no further inquiries into the matter?

45179. I do not suggest that the police-constable should not. He himself is the prosecutor. I do suggest the Inspector need do nothing?—It seems to me that it would lead to a more prolonged inquiry, which is the proper province of a properly-constituted court, and not the province of the initial inquiry before an Inspector. That is the difficulty, it seems to me.

45181. But if it turns out that the constable has entirely blundered, and that the accused in the case supposed is really wholly innocent, and a perfectly respectable person, the public proceedings would have been avoided?—Yes, no doubt in certain cases that might be so; but, as a matter of fact, what happens is somebody, we will say, of unblemished character and position, is charged with some offence of a kind which it is difficult to rebut at the moment, and he can then send for friends. He can always send and give his references, and, as I understand, it is always taken into consideration at the station at this preliminary investigation. The officer has ample time to do that. I think the words of the directions to Station Inspectors and sergeants are very ample on that point.

45182. You think that considerable latitude is now allowed to an Inspector, if he likes, as to the time that he may take in saying, "I refuse or accept the charge"?—Yes. Of course, as a rule, a charge taken at night would not come on till the next day, and he has 10 or 12 hours to consider the matter.

45183. You think that an adjournment at the station itself for two or three hours would meet most cases?—I think so.

45184. I have, to the best of my ability, put to you the sort of case that may involve very great grievance in certain cases, and I think you have caught the point of my suggestion?—I think so.

45185. Then I understand, on the whole, you come to the conclusion that the existing system is much better than any other system that can be suggested?—I think it is better than any other that has been suggested.

45186. (Mr. Whitmore.) Have you yourself no other suggestion?—No, I have no suggestions. It is impossible to get a perfect system.

45187. (Chairman.) Would you think that any gain would result from substituting, in place of the Inspector or station-sergeant, a public officer appointed not by the Commissioner, but appointed, say, by the Home Office, whose sole duty it should be to consider charges?—No; I think that would be a mistake, and for this reason: The Police Inspector or the station-sergeant has had the experience of a constable, and gone up all through the ranks, and he knows the working of these things in the street, and how they go on, and how these things really do go from that point of view. You get before the Magistrate, and he looks at it from a perfectly different point of view, and not the point of view of the police or the public, but he tries to do what is right. I think it is very essential you should have both those points of view, but if you get a man from outside he would only be a sort of subsidiary Magistrate. I think it is very important to have a man at the station who has had the experience of the police and the way in which the duties have to be carried out and worked—most important.

45188. Leaving the charge-room and coming to the cells, do prisoners ever complain that they have not been properly treated in the cells, or that the cells are dirty and not fit places for them?—I have had occasionally prisoners complain of having been thrown into the cells violently, and that sort of thing, particularly with violent or drunken prisoners, but I have never found any very great substance in any of these matters.

45189. No case has come before you in which anything of the sort has been proved to your satisfaction?—No.

45190. Then, with regard to bail, are the regulations satisfactory, in your opinion?—I think so; they are very simple now.

45191. Do prisoners ever complain that their sureties have been kept waiting too long?—No, I have never heard that. They sometimes say, "I could not get bail before so-and-so," but the police invariably send, and I am often surprised at the quickness with which they find a friend.

45192. What have you to say about the regulations as to medical attendance?—Those in the book seem to me to be very simple—that whenever a person is ill the doctor should invariably be sent for. As I have said, there does not seem to be any regulation as to sending for a doctor when a person disputes drunkenness, although I understand it is done always.

45193. Have any cases recently come under your notice where you think a doctor ought to have been sent for when, in fact, he was not sent for?—No, none.

45194. What is your practice as to the receipt of medical certificates in cases of drunkenness?—Of course, they are not medical certificates that are put before us at all. They are merely statements given to the Inspector or station-sergeant, stating that a doctor was called and said—and they then quote him, as a rule, verbatim—"The prisoner is drunk," or "The prisoner has been drinking," or something of that sort.

45195. That is a copy of the entry in the Occurrence Book, is it not?—Yes, I suppose it is.

45196. Do you look at that at any stage of the proceedings?—In 19 cases out of 20 prisoners charged with drunkenness plead guilty, but your question would naturally apply to the cases where they plead not guilty. In that case one hears the evidence, and if the matter is strenuously disputed I then ask whether they would like to have the sergeant who took the charge, and if it is still disputed I ask them if they would like to have the doctor's evidence. Then I look at it, and see what it is, if they say they would like to have the doctor. As a rule, if a prisoner can afford it, and the doctor is called, he has to pay the extra expense of his attendance, so before saying, "Perhaps you would like to hear what the doctor says," I look to see what he has said, and I read it to them. They usually then say, "No," but very occasionally they say they would like to see the doctor still. Of course, where the quotation from the doctor throws open any doubt I would send for him.

45197. That copy of the doctor's opinion is clearly not evidence?—Clearly not.

45198. And it is not treated as evidence in the case?—No.

45200. It seems to me that it must affect your mind to a certain extent if you look and see the entry in the Occurrence Book. As I understand it, you look at it, and then you say to the defendant, "Do you wish to have the doctor called?"—Yes.

45201. And you do that whether the doctor has certified that the prisoner was drunk or whether he has certified he was sober, or given him a kind of certificate, saying, "He is not drunk now"?—If the doctor says the prisoner is not drunk, of course you would discharge the prisoner. He would get the benefit of that.

45202. But supposing the certificate was something like this form, which we have had more than once proved, "Not drunk now, but suffering from the effect of excessive drinking, or has been drinking—now sober"?—As a rule in a case of drunkenness and disorder a man is not incapably drunk. He is probably capable of walking about, and fighting, but he is acting under the influence of drink, and that is where as a rule you would have that sort of statement made.

45203. But I take it in a drunk and disorderly case—I take it from what was said by Mr. Denman in a case before us—that the elements of the offence are first that the accused was drunk; secondly, that he, being drunk, was disorderly. Is not that so?—Yes, they are bound up together.

45204. So that on a charge of that kind if a Magistrate comes to the conclusion that the prisoner was not drunk he discharges him?—Unless his conduct comes within the terms of the Police Acts, "such as likely to lead to a breach of the peace," which it very frequently does.

45205. Not when the charge is under the Licensing Act. As I understand it, and we have been told, the common charge that we have over and over again in the charge sheets is "Drunk and disorderly," and so-and-so, and that is under the Licensing Act, 1872?—Yes, or under Section 58 of the Police Act, 1839, in London.

45206. As I understood from Mr. Denman—in fact, I think one must see it from looking at the Act—two material allegations on the part of the prosecution are, first that the prisoner was drunk, and secondly that he was disorderly while being drunk?—Yes.

45207. So that the issue of drunkenness is material where the prosecution is under that section, and if the magistrate comes to the conclusion that the accused was not drunk he must acquit him?—Oh, no—not if he is disorderly within the Police Act.

45208. But supposing in the charge sheet the offence is entered under the Licensing Act?—Every court of petty sessions has certain evidence brought before it, and that evidence may reveal a perfectly different offence to what the man has originally been charged with, and it is perfectly open to every court of petty sessions to take the charge which the evidence reveals, and it is frequently altered. I say to prisoners, "You are charged with disorderly conduct." The Act and section under which prisoner is charged is not usually entered on the charge sheet.

45209. That is rather new to us. Of course, I accept what is your view of the law, but we have had, for instance, this kind of case, a solicitation case, and what I should have thought was an ordinary solicitation case prosecuted under Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act, which is the insulting behaviour clause, "likely to lead to a breach of the peace"?—Yes.

45210. Then there is also Sub-section 11, which probably deals with solicitation cases. Am I to understand from you that if a woman was charged under Sub-section 13 with insulting behaviour likely to cause a breach of the peace, and you thought it was a case of solicitation that you would convict for solicitation, although the entry in the charge sheet was clearly under Sub-section 13?—Yes, I think it would be open to you to do so if the evidence clearly disclosed it. You can have the person recharged on that charge, if necessary, but it is not usual to do so, the Magistrate as a rule merely convicting of the offence which the evidence discloses. The charge sheet is not a formal document like an indictment, but only a statement of what the prosecution intend to charge.

45211. Then I understand from you that if the charge sheet charge is entered as a drunk and disorderly charge under the Licensing Act, 1872, and you discharge the accused, that the accused may say that he has been acquitted both of drunkenness and of disorderly conduct?—Yes, I think you may say so.

45212. How would you enter up your conviction supposing you thought that the defendant had been disorderly, but had not been drunk?—I should enter it as disorderly conduct.

45213. Under what section?—It would be under Sub-section 13.

45214. That hardly helps if it is ordinary disorder. Supposing two men are going arm in arm along the pavement and pushing other persons off the pavement. That hardly comes under Sub-section 13. It might—I do not say that there might not be some evidence of it?—It would come under that if any. That is the section under which the police attempt to keep the streets decent.

45215. The reason I am asking that question is that one of your learned colleagues, I think it was Mr. Cluer, complained as to the state of the law about disorderly conduct. He complained that there was no proper definition in any statute of disorder as such, or disorder likely to lead to a breach of the peace as such?—No.

45216. Take Sub-section 13. "Every person who shall use threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." Do you mean that mere senseless noise, booing, and such like, would come under that section?—That is a very difficult point, because there are the words "may be occasioned," and one has to bear that in mind. One has to consider whether the facts really do amount to that. There are a good many things which are really questions of degree. When men go along a quiet street singing songs at the top of their voices at 2 o'clock in the morning, or something of that sort, and knocking at everybody's door, you may say there are quiet old ladies living in the street and they are not likely to come and attack these men. But the section says, "Whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." One must judge by the facts put before one in each case I think with regard to that. I would not advocate a more specific definition of "disorder." It is a dangerous thing.

Mr. E. C. D'Eyncourt.

45217. What we have been told, I think, and I knew it otherwise, is that the only thing before the Magistrate is the charge sheet which is sent from the police station, and there are the various columns and the offences are stated in the second column?—That is so, and if a further charge is gone into or received, involving fresh evidence, the man would be formally charged with that—taken out and charged by the police and brought in and re-charged. It is frequently done Further charges are often found out while the hearing is going on. I ought to say that the Magistrate seldom sees the charge sheet, unless for some special reason, and in some courts I believe the chief clerk does not do so. The charge sheet is, strictly speaking, a police document only.

45218. In the column recording the order of the court all it says is "10s., or seven days"?—And then the further charge would be entered.

45219. In what column?—That would be in the same column as the original charge.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It would be in the same column. Just underneath the existing charge the further charge would be added.

(Witness.) If I may point out, that is necessary because it might turn out that a man who is charged with some small thing has actually in doing that been guilty of a very serious matter, and if he was discharged there would be a miscarriage of justice.

45220. (Chairman.) At what point in the proceedings is the charge altered? I see that the heading is "Charge taken at —— police station, between the —— day of ——," and so on. Then in the second column the charge is entered by the Inspector. Supposing that is a charge of drunk and disorderly conduct, that would be under the Licensing Act?—Yes, or the Police Act.

45221. Then I understand if a case came before you and the evidence justified it, you might after the charge. Is that so?—That is so.

45222. That is entered upon the charge sheet?—No, not if it involved no fresh evidence. It would be entered if it was a material matter of a different nature and involving different evidence, such as a felony or misdemeanour which they required to consider, and the prisoner would be taken out to the station and recharged and brought in at a subsequent period.

45223. Who makes the alteration in the charge sheet?—That would be done by the Inspector in charge at the police court, if a further charge was necessary, and the chief clerk would enter the adjudication.

45224. Do you mean the clerk in your court?—He would write down what the Magistrate convicted the prisoner of on the evidence already given, or after the prisoner had been taken and recharged.

45225. At the police station?—At the police station.

45226. And the prisoner is then in custody?—He is then in custody.

45227. That is to say, he has surrendered—I do not know whether that is the technical term you use when a case is called?—Yes, he would be in custody.

45228. And then he goes into custody again if he has been out on bail?—Yes.

45229. And do I understand that you permit the prosecuting constable to alter the charge?—Oh, no. If prisoner has a further charge made that is done by the Inspector at the station. If the Magistrate hearing the evidence said, "This does not amount to a charge of drunk and disorderly, but it amounts to disorderly conduct likely to create a breach of the peace, and I shall take it as coming under that," the prisoner would not be recharged, but would then be convicted of disorderly conduct simply under that Sub-section 13.

45230. After you have heard evidence on the original charge, and you come to the conclusion that you cannot convict under that charge?—Yes. He would then be convicted of whatever the evidence revealed was the proper charge to be made.

45231. But ought not the prisoner then to be allowed to leave the dock. No; but if he is charged with a further and different offence he goes to the police station, where he is formally charged by the Inspector.

45232. And then he is rearrested?—He does not go away; he is there.

45233. Take that case, which I can quite follow. You say, "I do not think it is a case of drunk and disorderly conduct, as at present advised, but he was disorderly, and he ought to have been charged under Sub-section 13 of the Police Act"; but when you have heard the evidence, you either have to discharge him or to find him guilty, have you not?—Yes, if you deal only with the original charge.

45234. Then, according to the directions in the statute as we have extracted them in the course of this inquiry, the Magistrate then enters, or the clerk enters for him, under the heading "How Disposed of by Magistrate," the word "Discharged"?—Yes.

45235. And when the man is discharged he ought to go out of custody, ought he not?—No, no more than this: Supposing he is brought to the police station, and the Inspector investigates it, and says to the constable, "No, you cannot charge him with this; the evidence does not show this. He must be charged with so-and-so." He is then and there charged with so-and-so at the police station.

45236. Do you think it comes within the province of the Inspector to advise the constable what charge he should make against the prisoner?—What happens, as I understand it, is this—that the constable arrests a man for being drunk and disorderly in the case you have taken. The evidence, in the Inspector's opinion, does not amount to sufficient evidence to charge him with being drunk and disorderly, but, in the Inspector's opinion, there is evidence to charge him with disorderly conduct under Section 13; and the Inspector rejects the evidence as to drunkenness, and he is charged with disorderly conduct. But he is not dismissed from the police station and rearrested outside during the hesitation of the Inspector.

45237. There is all the difference in the world between the two cases. I have been asking you some questions, which you have been good enough to answer, about the proceedings in the charge-room. All that I understand. In the case I suggested the Inspector says to the constable who has arrested a prisoner, "I will not take a charge of drunk and disorderly on your statement; the charge ought to be so-and-so—insulting behavious, or something of that kind, under Sub-section 13. If you make that charge I will take it." Then the constable, using his own discretion, says, "I make the charge." That is what I understand to be the course of procedure?—That is what would be done.

45238. But when once the charge is made, it is then that your jurisdiction comes in?—Yes.

45239. Then if you, having heard the evidence brought forward by the prosecutor in support of the charge entered on the charge-sheet, come to the conclusion it is not proved, I suppose you enter on the charge-sheet "Discharged"?—As a matter of fact, what one really enters is "Discharged" if you discharge him, but if he is charged with another offence, and convicted on that, you enter what he is charged with and convicted upon on the register. That is what I do. I do not know whether my colleagues do the same.

45240. That becomes somewhat material with regard to one or two of the questions we have been examining into. I quite understand that when the constable is proving the case that the Court might say to him, "Well, you are not making a case of drunk and disorderly," and there may be power in the Court to amend the charge there?—I follow that.

45241. But if the Court heard the case to the end, I do not understand then how the charge comes to be altered so as to fit the facts of the case. It may be that there is something in one of the statutes that makes it permissible, but I should point out this to you—that in the charge-sheet under the heading "Charge" there are the words, "How disposed of by Magistrate" and "What offence proved." That seems to indicate that the Magistrate is not wholly bound by the charge as entered in the charge-sheet?—That is so, I think.

45242. Can you refer me to any statute which deals with that?—No, I cannot for the moment.

45243. The Secretary is good enough to point out that this very matter arose in one of the cases that came before us—the case of George Mullins. The charge was taken by an Inspector, and entered by him on the charge-sheet like this: "Drunk, disorderly, and making use of obscene language at Oakley Street, Parish of Lambeth." In the result the prisoner was discharged by the Magistrate. The evidence went to show that at the police court this charge that was entered in the charge-sheet was abandoned, and some other charge was made. In the result the prisoner was let off altogether. One of the things that I could not quite understand was how the charge came to be altered. It is not shown on the charge-sheet in that case. I can understand the Magistrate might have power to amend the charge-sheet?—I think that is so. I think he has power to amend it, and, if the evidence before me points to such a thing, then I amend the charge-sheet. But perhaps I ought to have said that where there is a separate charge of a perfectly different nature altogether—if the man is charged with disorder, and there is a charge of theft brought against him—then he would be taken out and recharged. When it is quite a different matter altogether, he would be recharged, but where there is no further or different charge I think the words you have used would correctly describe it—that it is for the Magistrate, on hearing the evidence, to say, "I shall amend this charge; the evidence before me does not seem to me to justify the charge originally before me." I think the words you have used would quite correctly describe the process.

45244. Then I may take it your practice is so to amend the charge on the charge-sheet, and you take the precaution of directing the clerk to make the alteration in the charge-sheet?—No, the charge on the charge-sheet would not be amended in that case, but the adjudication would show in the proper column of what offence the prisoner was convicted.

45245. The next question we ask in our memorandum is: Under what statutory provisions are cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets dealt with? I think you will find a list of the statutes which we took from the evidence of Sir Edward Henry. I assume that list is correct?—That is correct, except that it should be the Licensing Act of 1872, and not of 1882.

45246. That is a mere clerical error. In your experience do you find any special difficulty in the application of those provisions to particular cases arising from the language of the statutes, or it may be the inherent character of the offence?—No, I do not think so. Of course, the words under the Vagrancy Act and under the Police Act are different as to solicitation.

45247. That leads me to ask you this question. Take the Police Act, Sub-section 11, of Section 54. The words at the end of the sub-section are "to the annoyance of inhabitants or passengers"?—Yes.

45248. Am I right in saying that there are three material allegations to be proved by the prosecutor in order to make a case under that sub-section: first, that the prisoner is a common prostitute or night walker; secondly, that on the date and at the place mentioned by the prosecutor she was loitering and accosting, etc.; and, thirdly, the allegation that her loitering, etc., was done to the annoyance of inhabitants or passengers?—Yes.

45249. Those are the three material allegations?—Those are the three material allegations.

45250. Would you kindly tell us what evidence you as a rule take as amounting to prima-facie evidence that the accused person is a prostitute or night walker?—The usual evidence would be that a constable would say, "I saw this woman speaking to three or four different men who pushed her aside, or she followed one two or three times, and he told her to go away." "Do you know this woman?" "Yes; I have seen her in that road for the last three weeks accosting people." That is the usual sort of evidence that is given.

45251. You would not accept the mere loitering about and accosting men on one particular evening as sufficient?—That would not be sufficient evidence of her being a prostitute unless there was evidence aliunde of that.

45252. Do you inquire whether any caution has been given to the woman?—No, I do not think that is necessary. As a rule or very often it is said, "I cautioned her two or three times," or something of that sort.

45253. My reason for asking the question is that we have been informed that constables usually take the precaution of not relying simply on the fact that they have seen a woman habitually in the street at night, and so on, talking to men, as being sufficient evidence, but they generally before they actually arrest her caution her once, if not twice, that she must not accost men?—That no doubt is so. I think there are instructions in the police regulations to that effect, and it would be open to you to say to a constable, "Have you ever seen her there before?" "No, I never have." Then probably that would be taken into consideration and you would discharge her. As a rule in solicitation cases they never plead guilty in the first instance. In most cases of drunkenness they do plead guilty.

45254. Take a case under the Vagrancy Act where the words are "riotous and indecent behaviour." Do you treat mere accosting as riotous and indecent behaviour?—No, I do not. I only treat it under the Police Act as solicitation.

45255. And then you require some evidence of annoyance, I suppose?—When the evidence amounts to, as I have given an instance, people saying "Go away," and that sort of thing, I take that as annoyance. It is very difficult to get people to come forward.

45256. Then I take it you convict on the evidence of one constable alone?—Yes, frequently. It is extremely difficulty to get people to come forward who have been annoyed.

45257. Can you remember any case in which the person accosted has come forward to complain?—Yes. I have had two or three within the last two or three years, but not more.

45258. It is very rare, I gather?—Very rare. It is partly from pity and partly not wishing to come to the court.

45259. We have been told it has been the custom at Marlborough Street for some time to take the solicitation cases under Sub-section 13 of the Act of 1854, where the words are "insulting words and behaviour"?—Yes.

45260. Would you accept the mere annoyance shown by a man who is accosted, or it may be the turning round of two or three people to look at a woman as amounting to evidence of insulting behaviour likely to provoke a breach of the peace or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned?—No. I should deal with that under the section of the Police Act as to solicitation. I daresay your attention has been drawn to the case of Bonner v. Lushington (57 Justice of the Peace, page 168). As far as I recollect that decision it was a question of fact whether it did amount to riotous behaviour within the words of the Vagrant Act.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That case was referred to by Sir Albert de Rutzen, although he did not mention the name, as the case of an appeal from Quarter Sessions.

(Witness.) I should deal with those cases under that Act if they seized hold of a man or made any indecent gestures or anything of that sort—then I would treat it under the Vagrancy Act. Of course there you can imprison without the option of a fine.

45261. (Chairman.) As I gathered from the evidence given before us which I need not trouble you with in detail, it was this, that difficulty is found in proving under the Vagrancy Act or under the Police Act that the woman is a common prostitute. It is clear that she must belong to the class before she can commit the offence?—That is so.

45262. That is not so under Sub-section 13, and, of course, generally in cases where the woman is arrested I should think she is guilty of something, she may insult a man or pull at his sleeve or something of that kind, and for that reason it appears to have become the practice at Marlborough Street to proceed under Sub-section 13 to avoid the difficulty of proving that the accused is a common prostitute. Do you approve of that practice?—I forget for the moment the words of the Vagrant Act, but I thought she had to be proved a common prostitute under that.

45263. Yes, it is in the Vagrancy Act. The sub-section that I am thinking of is Sub-section 13 of the Police Act. I have forgotten how many arrests, but quite a large number of arrests of women were made in the Marlborough Street district, and the women were charged under Sub-section 13, and in the one case in which we investigated it certainly appeared to me that it was either a case of solicitation or nothing?—I should not have thought ordinary solicitation came under that section at all, but I only speak with deference.

45264. That is what one or two of your learned colleagues have told us. Then leaving that I should like to ask you whether any cases of solicitation of women by men have come under your notice. Have women in any case come to the court to charge men?—I have had cases where a man has been charged with being drunk and disorderly going up and speaking to various women and putting his arm round them and that kind of thing, but I have never had a case where the principal part of the offence was solicitation.

45265. You have had cases of assault or what amounted to assault?—Yes, as a rule when a man is charged with drunk and disorderly conduct the constable mentions that as part of it. You say, "What was the disorderly conduct?" and he says so and so. Of course, one regards that as a very serious aggravation of the offence, but I have never had a case of male solicitation.

45266. Have you any reason to think that there is much solicitation by men of women—I mean solicitation in a quiet way, but which may not be the less insulting because of that. Such a case, for instance, as a man going up to a woman in Piccadilly or in Regent Street and saying, "Will you come and have tea with me?" or something of that kind, he being a stranger?—I fancy if it occurs it would not occur in Piccadilly or Regent Street, but it would be in quieter neighbourhoods. I really cannot answer that question. I have never had the case come before me at all. Of course one knows that that sort of thing does occur.

45267. Supposing complaint were made to that effect before you, is there any statute under which you could deal with the matter?—I think the nearest thing to it would be under Sub-section 13.

45268. There the words are "Likely to produce a breach of the peace"?—Yes.

45269. That has been suggested before?—I do not know of any other.

45270. The sort of offence I am speaking of, although it may not be a legal offence, may certainly be a moral offence?—A man speaking to a woman or a woman to a man is not of itself an offence, unless, of course, under special circumstances, such as a woman being a prostitute or amounting to solicitation.

45271. Communications have reached us, naturally of a somewhat confidential nature, that ladies are frequently molested by well-dressed men, who do not, of course, assault them, and do nothing to attract anybody's attention, but still they do it in a way that naturally annoys a pure-minded and properly-conducted woman?—Yes; and it is a very disagreeable thing no doubt.

45272. Do you know of any statute under which that can be dealt with now?—No, I do not.

45273. The next topic is the alleged bribery or blackmailing by constables. Have you any reason to suppose that bribery of a police-constable by prostitutes is common or widespread in the metropolis?—I have had no instance of it at all.

45274. You mean no instance of it proved at all before you?—I have had no instance in which the allegation was made, except to this extent: Occasionally a constable will say, "He offered me half-a-crown to let him go," or "She offered me 10s. to let her go." I always ask them whether they accepted it, and they always say, "No." I have never heard more than that, and that not very frequently.

45275. Do you remember any case in which any woman accused under one of these sections for solicitation or analogous misconduct has said, "I bribed that man over and over again," or words to that effect?—No, I never remember one.

45277. We should like to have those, if you will read them out?—In the year 1900 the charges of drunkenness were 4,177, and solicitation 10. In the year 1903 (that was, of course, after the Licensing Act, 1902, which gave constables power to arrest for simple drunkenness) the drunken charges amounted to 4,406, and I ought to add that they would probably have been more than that, because the parish of St. Luke's was taken away then, so that there would have been probably at least 5,000 for that year. The solicitation cases had increased from 10 to 134 between 1900 and 1903.

45278. In which district is that?—In Clerkenwell. Then in the year 1906 the cases of drunkenness had diminished from 4,406 to 4,055, and the cases of solicitation had diminished from 134 in 1903 to 61. I do not know whether you would like to look at this paper.

45279. Thank you. (The paper was handed in.) I think the only other topic on which I need trouble you is as to the way in which constables discharge their duty in your court as prosecutors. It is the duty of a constable, having made a charge, to attend in your court and prosecute. How do the constables discharge that duty?—I think they do it fairly well. These charges, as a rule, are not complicated, but if it is a complicated matter, and it is a case for remand, and I think that it is a case where the constable should be represented, I intimate to the authorities, and usually the constables are represented. I think, on the whole, the way in which they conduct them is sufficient.

45280. Do you think constables ought to have the aid of a solicitor or counsel more frequently than they do?—Occasionally there is a case where the matter has grown, as some of these cases do, and in those cases it would be desirable, and I think in those cases they nearly always are represented, but in these ordinary small cases of drunkenness and solicitation I do not think there is a necessity. You see, until a case has been really gone into it is difficult to say what sort of proportion it may assume.

45281. There is generally a remand, I take it?—Yes, and then there is an opportunity for the police to be represented.

45282. You do not think, I gather, that the administration of justice suffers from the fact that there is no public prosecutor such as the Procurator Fiscal?—No, I do not think so. Of course, a very large number of constables in London have been soldiers in the Army, and that certainly is an excellent training for the purpose; it gives them certainly training not only for dealing with cases in the streets but in court, too.

45283. I do not know why, if they have been soldiers, they should necessarily be good advocates?—No, but they have been accustomed to going before courts-martial and that sort of thing. I think it is a great aid to them.

45284. Do you think that the defendants suffer from not being more often represented by advocates, counsel, and solicitor?—In this class of cases?

45286. It has been suggested that in these kind of cases legal aid should be afforded to poor people. Do not understand that I am adopting these views; I am simply endeavouring to ascertain your opinion on these matters?—Of course, in a good many cases solicitors and occasionally counsel do appear in such cases as these, but I do not think their advocacy is so frequently attended with success as to think that if all were defended it would make a very large percentage of difference.

45287. Do you feel what one of your learned colleagues told us that the defendant has probably a very good defence but is totally unable to make it because he does not know how to cross-examine and so on, and yet he, the Magistrate, feels that he cannot intervene with sufficient energy without impropriety. Does that kind of case often come before you?—No, I do not think so. As a rule, if a person has a defence, although he is not able to put questions, he makes a statement, and upon that the Magistrate puts questions to the witnesses.

45288. You, as Magistrate, are looking after the interests of both parties?—You have to.

45289. You cross-examine on the one side, or, at any rate, if you do not technically cross-examine you searchingly examine the police-constable and his witnesses, and you take care that all the defences are examined into?—Yes, of course one has to do that.

45290. At any rate, you take care that the interest of the defendant does not suffer?—So far as you can, of course. Mr. E. C. D'Eyncourt. 7 May 1907.

45291. Then with regard to complaints. Have you ever had occasion to complain either to the Home Office or to the Chief Commissioner of misconduct or of acts which you deemed to be misconduct on the part of a constable?—No, I have never had to do so. I have occasionally spoken to an Inspector as to some small matter before mentioning it in public, but I have never had to go beyond that.

45292. Is there anything in these topics that you wish to refer to?—No, I think you have covered the ground.

45293. With regard to bail, I confess I omitted to ask you one question which I ought to have put to you. We have had here statements made that there has been delay on the part of constables in carrying a message or in sending a message to the friends of the accused person or the prisoner. Have you heard any complaints of that kind made?—No, I have not.

(Chairman.) The Commissioners are greatly indebted to you, Mr. D'Eyncourt, for your valuable evidence.

Mr. Henry Curtis Bennett, sworn.

45294. (Chairman.) You are one of the London Police Magistrates?—I have been a Metropolitan Magistrate since the month of January, 1886. Mr. H. C. Bennett.

45295. To which court have you been attached?—I was attached when I was first appointed to Hammersmith, as it was called at that time, in conjunction with what is now called the South-Western Court, which was then called Wandsworth, for three years; and then, at the request of Sir James Ingham, I went to Clerkenwell for a period of six months. Then I returned to West London, as Hammersmith had then become, and I remained at West London until the year 1895. From 1895 to 1905 I was senior Magistrate (as I had been at West London for seven or eight years) of Marylebone; and from 1905 till now I have been senior Magistrate of Westminster, and during that period I have had before me something like 230,000 cases.

45296. You have had a copy of the memorandum of the heads of evidence sent to you?—I have.

45297. Would you prefer to read a statement?—No, I have no written statement. I am prepared to answer any questions.

45298. I will not read you the terms of reference. You see what they are?—Yes.

45299. Our inquiry is strictly limited to three classes of cases?—Yes.

45300. I should like to have your view, first, on this general question. How would you define generally the duties of police constables with regard to these cases?—The duties of police constables with regard to solicitation would be, on their beat, to watch and take notice of persons who frequent those streets, to watch the object for which those persons frequent those streets, and if they find the same person coming backwards and forwards day by day, then they should caution those women, or men, if there are men of that description, as to their conduct. Upon that being done, then they should wait until they have before them such state of facts and circumstances as would enable them to make a charge.

45301. I think from that answer I may take it that their general duty is to keep the peace and to prevent disorder?—Yes, no doubt. The object of the police is to prevent crime and not to make it.

45302. It certainly is not the duty of police constables to be too eager to charge people?—Certainly not.

45303. Their general duty is to keep the peace and to see that the law is obeyed?—Yes.

45304. Taking that as a reasonable definition of a police constable's duty, you having had a great many years' experience, I should like to put this question to you: Do you think that the Metropolitan Police, as a whole, discharge their duties with honesty, with discretion, and with efficiency?—Speaking as a Magistrate, from my long experience, I have no hesitation in answering that question in the affirmative in each individual case. The police constables are drawn from an intelligent set of men of the class to which they belong, they have multifarious duties to perform in the streets of London, requiring an enormous amount of discretion and an enormous amount of thought, and I can only say that in my experience, they do perform their duties with discretion. With regard to that, I know the difficulties that the constables have to cope with in the district which I had under my jurisdiction for a period of nearly 20 years, in what was called the Avernus of London (the Notting Dale district—probably the three worst streets in London). I know the class of characters that were resident entirely in those streets, and given up to them, and I know the terrible assaults that were committed upon the constables in those districts when they were serving, very often singly, and how they were kicked and battered about, and many and many a time a man has gone home wounded and injured, and has had to leave the force because of injuries received in that district to which I have referred. I am bound to say that I have never known a constable use his baton without occasion, but it is very difficult, and it must be enormously difficult, when a man is surrounded by rogues and evil doers, who are ready to take advantage of him, to know the psychological moment when he must use his baton to protect himself against the assaults of these people. Personally, I have never yet known a constable who has used his baton before the time came when it was absolutely necessary for his own protection that he should use it. I know full well, being a Magistrate, and hearing the evidence, that if I had been in the position of the constable, I should not, I fear, have waited so long as that man did in order to take steps in order to protect himself, and on almost all occasions when he has used the baton he has used it on a part of the body of the man whom he was arresting where it would be least dangerous to use it. It may have happened that in the struggle a man may have had a blow on the head which has cut the head open, but the usual course has been to use it about the arms or legs of the man whom he has had to take into custody. I should like to say just one thing here with reference to that. It is only just about three years ago I was down at Eastbourne, and when I was going into the hotel in the evening I was accosted by a man who came up to me (it was dusk), and said, "I wish to thank you, Mr. Curtis Bennett, for what you have done for me." I looked at the man and said, "I do not recognise you." He said, "No, possibly not, Sir, but I am one of those you have had before you on many occasions. I came from the Notting Dale district. The last time I was before you you gave me a sentence of 9 to 12 months"—I forget now which it was—"and," he said, "you told me 'Do you not think there is something better to live for than to go on assaulting the police and getting drunk, and behaving as you are behaving in this way?' I thought it over while I was doing that time.

Mr. H. C. Bennett.

7 May 1907.

I went to America. I got on, and I am now foreman of those large buildings on the West Cliff, and I owe it entirely to that long sentence that you gave me. I felt that my life would have been absolutely thrown away, and," he said, "the damage I did to the police I shall never regret too much."

45305. I suppose some instance of misconduct on the part of the police must have come under your notice during your experience of over 20 years?—Undoubtedly. There cannot be a body of 17,000 men all Simon Pures, but I believe if a man is not upright and is not straightforward, it is soon discovered by his superiors, and that man is very soon sent out of the force.

45306. Has any recent instance of misconduct come under your notice?—By the police?

45307. Yes?—No, none. What I have done, and do, is this. If in the course of a case I think there should be an inquiry made about any matter, I should either mark the sheet or I should speak to the Inspector and request him to lay the matter before the Police Authorities, leaving the Police Authorities to do what they consider right, as we, the Metropolitan Magistrates, have nothing whatever to do with the conduct of the police except as witnesses.

45308. Have you any comments or criticisms or representations to make as to the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force in regard to these three classes of cases that are within our terms of reference?—No, I have read the instructions issued by the Commissioner, and I think they contain everything which could possibly be put into black and white for the guidance of those who have to carry them out. I read them through most carefully, and I do not think I can suggest any improvement whatever in them.

45309. (Chairman.) Are you acquainted with the Instruction Book?—Yes, I have looked at it, especially with regard to that portion of it which refers to the apprehension of persons.

45310. What do you say generally as to the regulations contained in that book?—Personally, I cannot see that the regulations in that book could be altered with advantage either to the police or to the public.

45311. What do you say with regard to the arrangement of the book?—That I did not go into; I kept myself to this particular question.

45312. With regard to arrests, do you find that any of the prisoners brought before you complained of ill-treatment by constables at the time of arrest, or during the time when they are being conveyed or taken to the police station?—In a very small number of cases, yes, but on the inquiry into those cases that I have made during the conduct of the cases, I have come to the conclusion that in most cases the complaint is not well founded. If I find that the complaint is well founded, I should immediately ask the Inspector in court to report the matter to the Chief Commissioner, who is the only person who has to do with the conduct of the police.

45313. Then it would be reported to the Chief Commissioner later on?—Yes.

45314. I understand, if a prisoner complains as to ill-treatment during arrest and conveyance to the police station. The cases are very rare, and you cannot remember any that were well founded?—I cannot quite go so far as that. I cannot recollect any one that I can specify, but I think there have been cases during my twenty-two years' experience in which I have asked the Inspector to report the facts to the Commissioner that he might hold further inquiry.

45315. Those were cases in which, I presume, you thought possibly more force had been used than was necessary?—Possibly; but, as I say, there comes the question of the psychological moment when such force becomes necessary, and it is very difficult for a man who is being attacked to know the exact moment when it arrives.

45316. Have you any reason for believing that constables unnecessarily make use of their powers of summary arrest?—Personally I know of no case where a constable, mero motu, has arrested a person; there has generally been certain ground, if not good ground, for the arrest which has been made.

45317. Have cases ever came before you in which the prisoner has been arrested when he might have been proceeded against by summons with equal efficacy?—I would not say that such cases may not have arisen. At present I cannot specify absolutely any case which has arisen, but it is possible that in my long experience such a thing may have occurred.

45318. With regard to the charge room, have you had occasion to look at the regulations as to the duty of the Inspector in charge?—I have, and not only have I done that, but since this Commission has been sitting I have myself been present in the charge room when a charge has been taken, as I did not wish to come to this Commission without knowing what I was talking about.

45319. Have you come to the conclusion that the regulations as to the charge room require amendment in any particular?—Personally, I saw nothing which I could complain of or with regard to which I could offer any suggestion.

45320. Do you recollect any cases in which prisoners have complained of ill-treatment in the charge room, or of the Inspector not listening to them?—No, I have no knowledge of that. I have heard complaints made that after the prisoner has been charged he has been ill-treated in the cells. If such a complaint has been made I have invariably had the Inspector or the station sergeant who was acting as Inspector before me to go into the matter, and to consider it, and I have not yet had to make any report upon the matter.

45321. Then I may take it you think there is not any ground for the suggestion that prisoners are ill-treated either in the charge room or when they are being taken to the cells, or in the cells themselves?—In my experience, no.

45322. Looking at the matter not from the point of view of an observer in the charge room, but from the point of view of a Magistrate, has anything come under your notice which leads you to think that the Inspectors show bias in taking charges which they ought not to take?—I should say not. On my inspection of the charge book at the station the other day I came across a number of entries where it was said, "Discharged." One case I mentioned. It saw there was a woman who had been brought in charged with stealing a purse containing a considerable amount of money. The Inspector had marked the sheet "Discharged." I made inquiries, and I found that the Inspector was satisfied that the prosecutor who had given the woman into custody was drunk, and was absolutely incapable of making any coherent statement, and he discharged the woman from custody. Within a few hours from that time the prosecutor returned to the station and said that he had found in the lining of his trousers or his coat, wherever his purse was, the purse and the money. The Inspector was proved to be absolutely right, and there was no foundation whatever for the charge.

45323. That was a case, of course, of an indictable offence?—That was a case of an indictable offence.

45324. Can you recollect any case in which you have discharged the prisoner—in other words, found against the prosecuting police-constable—in which you thought that the charge ought never to have been taken. I am talking of a case where a person charged with an offence coming within the scope of our inquiry?—I could not say offhand absolutely yes or no; probably yes; but if such a charge were made and taken, I came to the conclusion that it was a bonâ-fide mistake on the part of the constable who made the charge, and that it was not made arrière pensée.

45325. If you will look at page 4 of the notes we sent you, at the top of the page you will see the question is raised as to what is the character of the proceedings in the charge room. Are they of a merely executive character, or do they partake of a judicial character as well?—They are purely, I should say, executive. My observation was that the man stood in one place and that the constable stood in another, and gave his statement as to what the charge was, and then the Inspector admitted the charge. The case came afterwards before me, and I adjudicated upon it. In another case it was simply to see if there was any ground whatever it was not judicial, but it was simply to give the Magistrate an idea what the charge was.

45326. (Mr. Whitmore.) To see if there was a primâ-facie case?—I would not go so far as to say a primâ-facie case, but any case of any sort or kind.

45327. (Chairman.) I suppose the Inspector has to see whether what the constable alleges amounts to a charge which can be made under some Statute?—Quite so. The Inspector, you see, is a man who has gone through various grades of the Force; he has been in court; on every occasion that we sit we always have an Inspector present; and they must get to know a very considerable amount, and the knowledge they acquire from constantly being present in court during the trial enables them to form a general opinion as to whether or no there is any ground which would make the charge sustainable.

45328. Is that merely an executive function?—I think purely executive.

45329. It involves judgment as to whether, if the facts stated by the constable be true, they come within a particular section or sub-section?—I think not. I think it is pretty generally to see whether the case can be proceeded with or not. I should have a great objection, personally, I think, to any tribunal sitting and sifting what they call the evidence before the case came before the Magistrate, especially when such investigation would not be in public, and would be in private; there would be no report of it; and I consider it is of great benefit with regard to all the courts in this country that they are open to the public, and that their proceedings are published.

45331. If you look at the Instruction Book, you will see that the Inspector has to see the witnesses either for a police constable or the witnesses for the prisoner?—It might be that the witnesses would say: "This man," or "this woman is charged with being in Regent Street at a specified time." It might be that there were three or four reputable witnesses who would say, "This is an entire mistake; this person, I assure you, was not there at all; we were with this person at a certain time."

45332. That would mean that the police constable was lying?—No, I would not go so far as that; he may have made a mistake.

45333. But he cannot have made a mistake as to the place of arrest?—No, but as to whether they had been there before for a lengthened time. One does see people so very similar in appearance to one another that unless you have absolute knowledge of them, I personally should be very, very diffident in saying that I had seen the same person in the same place.

45334. Take the case of a woman arrested for solicitation. If three or four apparently respectable persons come to the station and say to the Inspector, "This is a complete mistake, this is my sister," or "This is my wife," or "This is my friend, I know her well; she only came up from the country yesterday," and the constable says, "I have seen her habitually in Regent Street during the past three or four weeks," which was absolutely unfounded, is the Inspector to ignore that statement?—To a certain extent I think you must take into consideration the position of the witnesses, and I think he would say this, "You can go to the Magistrate and you can ask for process."

45335. I see what your view is of the regulations as they exist. It really comes to this, that the Inspector ought to see that the charge is one which can be made legally, because it is a simple matter, they all fall under a very simple category, and then he ought to see whether there is a primâ facie case, and whether is is worth while charging?—Yes, whether it is worth while sending the case to the Magistrate at all.

45336. You say that is executive rather than judicial?—I think so.

45338. I suppose there are cases in which it is a great hardship for a person to be placed upon his trial publicly, even although he is quite innocent, and the Magistrate finds him innocent and dismisses the case, observing that there is no reflection at all upon the defendant's character?—I should doubt that, because I believe (perhaps I ought not to say it, being one of the body) the public have such respect for the decisions of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates that if a Metropolitan Police Magistrate said that, they would believe it to be true, and the person would not suffer in consequence.

45339. At any rate, if there be any grievance, it is of such rare occurrence, and of such slight magnitude, that you do not think it justifies any alteration?—I do not think there is anything to justify any alteration.

45340. Have you considered the question with regard to an officer not connected with the Police Force being put in charge of these stations for the purpose of taking or refusing charges?—You might put other officers there, but, if you did, it appears to me that you would have to have three persons per diem, that is to say, eight hours each, and I know of no class of persons who would be better qualified to fill that post than the Inspector, than persons who have been connected with police court work, and who are either Chief Clerk or are about to be appointed Chief Clerk to the various police courts. I do not think anybody else would have sufficient knowledge of the working of our courts and of the various Acts which we have to deal with excepting persons who have been trained in that way.

45341. So much for the charge room. You have spoken about the cells. Now, coming to the question of bail, do any prisoners complain that their friends are not sent for with sufficient promptitude by the Inspector?—I have never yet had one single complaint on that score.

45342. Do you think the facilities for bail are ample and that the rules about it are properly carried out?—Yes, I think so, for the very reason that no complaint has ever reached me from any single soul.

45343. With regard to medical attendance on a prisoner, I daresay you have looked at the regulations about that?—Yes, I have.

45344. Do you think they require improvement in any particular?—I do not know how they could well be improved upon. Each station has its Divisional Surgeon; that Divisional Surgeon always attends if required, and I have never known a case in which a Divisional Surgeon has not done his duty most thoroughly.

45345. Do you think it would be an advantage if in every case in which drunkenness was alleged the Divisional Surgeon attended?—I think it would add enormously to the cost with really no benefit to the public.

45346. We have been told that an extract from the Occurrence Book is attached to the charge sheet when the case comes on?—Yes.

45347. Is that the practice in your court?—One practically never sees the charge sheet except that you see it in the hands of the Clerk.

45348. You quite agree that the extract or certificate, or call it what you like, is not, per se, evidence?—No it is not per se evidence.

45349. But sometimes the medical man comes there?—Of course, in a very large number of cases, and by far the larger number, the prisoner admits the fact, but if he denies it, I say, "Well, prisoner, look here, the doctor, I see, has been called, and he has given a certificate, and he says" so and so; "if he comes here and says so, and I believe him after cross-examination by you and by me, and I am still of opinion that he is right, there will be an extra fee to pay. Do you wish to go on with this case, or do you not? Do not be biassed about that. If I disbelieve the evidence of the doctor, you will benefit by it, but if I still believe the evidence of the doctor which he has given on the certificate, you will have to pay an extra sum."

45350. With regard to the statutory powers under which these cases are brought into your court, have you any remarks to make?—No, I think they are all correct, excepting the date of the Licensing Act, which should be 1872 instead of 1882.

Mr. H. C. Bennett.

45351. That being so, I should like to ask whether, in your experience, there is any special difficulty in the application of those statutory provisions to the individual cases that come before you either owing to the ambiguity of the language, or it may be to something in the inherent character of the offence?—My colleague to-day alluded to a case. That was a case which was sent up to the Quarter Sessions, and the Quarter Sessions held that there was not sufficient evidence under the Vagrant Act, although there was considerable evidence in that case. The evidence was that in the Haymarket, at 12 p.m. on the morning of the 6th of November, the police-constable saw the woman accost three gentlemen in succession. She was a prostitute, and it was admitted that she had accosted them for the purpose of prostitution. In each case she had put her arm into the arm of the gentleman, and had walked at the side until he threw her off. A fourth gentleman who was similarly treated complained to a police-constable. The woman repeated the same conduct, and was taken into custody. She was charged with being a prostitute and behaving in a disorderly manner. The Magistrate convicted under the Vagrant Act. A case of a similar character went up to the Court of Queen's Bench (Castro v. Lushington), and the Queen's Bench refused to consider the case. Lord Coleridge said he was of opinion that the appeal must be dismissed; the Magistrate had convicted, but the Quarter Sessions were of opinion that the woman had not been guilty of behaving in a riotous or indecent manner according to the Act, and Lord Coleridge said that the decision of the Court below must stand. The Magistrate convicted, but the Quarter Sessions said "No." That case is reported in 57 Justice of the Peace, 1893, at page 168.

45352. In solicitation cases what evidence do you require under the Vagrant Act or under the Police Act, Section 54, Sub-section 11?—First, I should require to know that the police-constable had watched the person complained against for a considerable while on the day named; I should also require evidence that he had previously seen that person in the same neighbourhood on other days; I should also require evidence that he had seen some overt act on the part of that woman to some man, and that she had therefore rendered herself objectionable to people passing along the street; and I should also require in almost all cases evidence that the constables had warned her.

45353. Do you recollect ever having had a case in which an inhabitant has come forward and complained of annoyance from seeing prostitutes accosting men?—I have never had one yet.

45354. Have you ever had a case in which the person accosted has come forward and given evidence that he was annoyed?—Never. I am afraid that if they were asked their name they would give a false one, and if they were asked for their address they would also give a false one.

45355. We have been told—in fact, we know from the evidence in one case—that a woman who was guilty, if guilty at all, of solicitation was prosecuted under the 13th Sub-section of Section 54—that is, with insulting behaviour—and that it became the practice to take cases of solicitation under that sub-section because of the difficulty under the other sub-section of proving that the woman belonged to a particular class?—Not only that, but there is also the difficulty with regard to the verbiage of the two sections; one says "riotous and indecent manner," and the other puts it in a more general way.

45356. At any rate, we were told that that is the practice. Do you approve that practice?—I sit at Marlborough Street from time to time, assisting there as Magistrate, and also at Marylebone. I have sat at both courts.

45357. What do you say as to that practice. Do you think solicitation cases ought to be brought under Sub-section 13?—It is probably the easier to prove, and I do not think the defendant harms by it.

45358. You think no harm is done by it?—I think no harm is done by it.

45359. Supposing the evidence which is given that the conduct is likely to create a breach of the peace is very slender indeed?—If it is very slender indeed one takes another course. Every Magistrate has power from the fact of being a Magistrate to bind over any person whom he finds guilty of conduct which is contrary to the well-being of the community. That is a common law power and not a statutory power.

45360. You bind over?—We bind over.

45361. You have had a very long experience, so that your opinion is of very great value. What opinion have you formed as to the conduct of constables in dealing with cases of drunkenness and solicitation in the streets. Do you think it is prudent?—I think so certainly in most cases. There may be cases in which it is not prudent.

45362. Have there been any cases in which you have thought the constable had made a mistake. I am speaking of solicitation cases more particularly?—I cannot say I personally have. It is possible such a thing has occurred, but in the multitude of cases, unless one's mind is put to it, and you made a note of it at the time, it is impossible to recall the facts. With regard to solicitation, I would like to say that in a case which was tried at Westminster, and which came before my colleague not so very long since, for the defence a man was called into the box to give evidence that he was the husband, and that the woman was a most respectable woman. It so happened that within two or three weeks from that time the husband, or the so-called husband, had taken out a summons against a tradesman for having been bitten by a dog. The case come before me, and the man was cross-examined to the fact that he was drunk on the occasion, and that instead of the dog attacking him he attacked the dog and kicked it. I came to the conclusion that undoubtedly the facts were with the defendant and not with the complainant. Then, in corroboration of his story, he called the woman for whom he had previously been called as her husband. She got into the box and she alleged that she was the wife of the complainant. I was not at all satisfied with her demeanour, and I asked her: "When were you married"? She said on such and such a date. I said, "Where"? She said, "I do not remember." I said, "Was it in a church"? "Yes." "Are you sure?" "Yes." "Are you quite sure"? "It may have been elsewhere." "Was it at a registry office?" She said, "Well, yes," I said, "Where"? She said, "I cannot recollect." It was getting too much for the complainant, and he said, "The fact is, sir, we are not married at all; it is not true." I said to the woman, "You heard what that man said; is it true"? She said, "It is true; I am not his wife." Then my Chief Clerk said to me, "That is the man who was called to prove this woman was a respectable married woman." I said to the woman, "Is not that the man you called to prove that he was your husband"? She said, "Yes." I represented the facts to the authorities, and that case was afterwards prosecuted, and they were both convicted of perjury.

45363. Mr. Horace Smith told us of a very similar case?—That is the case, and that is how it came about.

45364. The prosecution came about on the subsequent proceedings before you?—Entirely.

45365. Do you think drunkenness in the streets has been diminishing in recent years as far as you can form an opinion?—Drunkenness, on the whole, has been diminishing, especially amongst men, but, unfortunately, I think it has been increasing amongst women.

45366. What is the case with regard to solicitation. Do you think that the number of prostitutes in the streets has been increasing of late years?—I think certainly Piccadilly and Regent Street have improved. The last time I sat at Marlborough Street it appeared to me that it was certainly on the increase again. I have been sitting there during my colleague's (Mr. Kennedy's) absence on leave for sickness. I was sitting there one day a week, and I came to the conclusion that it was increasing.

45368. (Chairman.) Can you give us the number of cases you get within any particular week or month. Can you give us some idea of the amount of work the police have to do?—Yes, I took out this list on Saturday of six days' work, beginning on June 13th, 1904, at Marylebone.

45369. Are all those cases coming within the three classes?—No, they are not. They are cases altogether. I cannot give you the three classes. On the 13th the charges were 99, remands 4, making 103, and the summonses that day were 47. On the 14th the charges were 35, remands 5, and the summonses (it was an abnormally small number for Marylebone) were only 4. On the 17th the charges were 27, remands 20, and summonses 63. On the 18th the charges were 31, remands 11, and summonses 26. On the 20th the charges were 70, remands 6, and summonses 27. On the 21st (the sixth day) the charges were 17, remands 3 (I have no doubt that was a Monday), and the summonses were 60. That makes for the six days 545, or an average of 91 per day. I think you may take it that really and truly when I sat at Marylebone Court somewhere between 70 and 80 cases were the average daily work.

45372. If the lady in question knows the man proceedings can be taken by summons?—Yes.

45373. But supposing this is a common case—that she does not know the man at all, and that she even speaks to a constable, what can the constable do?—The constable could ask the man his name and address, and I think, if he did not give it, the constable might go so far as to ask him to accompany him to the station to have it verified, and then he would get the identification of the man, and it would probably not be very difficult to ferret him out.

45374. At any rate, a plain clothes man would be able to follow and find out any person?—That is what I intended to convey. There are always plain clothes men at the station.

45375. Passing from that, I will come now to the topic of the alleged blackmailing of prostitutes by the police, or, to put it in another way, of bribery by prostitutes of the police. Is there any foundation for that?—I have never had a complaint of that kind made to me. I have had numerous cases where the police have said in evidence that women have offered them various sum of money from 2s. 6d. and 5s. to a sovereign, and where in every case the police have refused to take it. I have never known one constable who has taken it.

45376. In those cases you have believed the constable?—The woman has never denied the assertion before me.

45377. You, of course, have the opportunity of observing a great many constables, and I suppose, as far as demeanour can tell you anything, you have an opportunity of forming an opinion as to their veracity?—Clearly.

45378. Taking that into account, do you think from what you can see that they are men who are likely to enter into relations with women in the sense of being habitually bribed by them in order that they may be permitted to carry on their avocation?—I have no reason whatever to think so—none.

45379. It is suggested to us that it is a common practice. So far as you can form any opinion, would you attach any force to those suggestions, or think that they are well-founded?—Unless proof were given to me to prove it I should attach very little importance to it 45380. Unless proof were given to you in a case to that particular effect you would think there is nothing in it?—Yes; it is rumour.

45381. How does the matter stand in your mind with regard to bribery by street bookmakers?—I have no knowledge of any case where a street bookmaker has bribed, and I have never heard it said to me personally by any person whom I have fined for betting, and there have been thousands, that they have paid the police to do so. I have heard rumours, but if one is to go on rumour I am afraid one would attach too much importance to what very often is not a fact.

45382. As to the performance of their duties by the police in court I have a question or two to ask you. When a constable has made a charge it is his duty to appear in court and to give evidence before you?—Yes.

45383. How do you think they do that part of their duty, upon the whole?—Upon the whole, well.

45385. I suppose most of the constables who come before you are men who have often given evidence?—Yes.

45386. Therefore they have a certain advantage from their experience in the witness-box?—I do not know. I watch every witness who enters the box from the time he is sworn until he leaves it, and I very rarely take my eyes from him, whether he is a constable or not, because we have this advantage over the High Court judges—we do not take notes; they are taken by the clerk.

45388. Do you think that the police prosecutor ought to have more frequently than he has the benefit of counsel?—If you go to perfection of systems no doubt you might have solicitors and counsel in every case, but if you did that you would multiply your costs and the Courts not two-fold but four-fold at least, and I doubt whether the results would be more beneficial to the public than under the present system.

45389. How do you deal with complaints against the conduct of the police. Do any people come to your court not concerned in any particular case and complain of the conduct of, say, a man on fixed point or of a man on beat, giving his number?—I can recall no case to memory. I have been consulted on rare occasions as to whether a constable has done this or that right. Then I have said, "Excuse me, but I have nothing more to do with the police than you have excepting to hear them as witnesses. If you have any complaint to make against the police your duty is to write to the Chief Commissioner, giving him the facts of the case."

45390. A police court is no more a police court than a county court is a police court?—Now you are getting to what has been my wish all through. I object to the term "police court." I wish to have the court called "a summary jurisdiction court," or "Westminster Summary Court." I think it gives a wrong impression to the public at large, and it gives the idea that we are part and parcel of the police force, and that somehow or another there is a sort of connection between the Magistrates and the police. I say I am absolutely independent of the police, and the more one is independent, and the more that can be put before the public, so much the better, I think, both for the Magistrates and for the police.

45391. (Mr. Whitmore.) Under the Act of Parliament the Magistrates are called "Metropolitan Police Magistrates"?—I very much object to the term, and I should very much prefer that "Metropolitan Police Magistrate" should be dropped. I think as the Judges of the county court are called Judges of the County Court, it would be a good think if a short Act of Parliament were brought in, and that in future the name of "Metropolitan Police Magistrate" should be altered to that of "Judges of the Summary Jurisdiction Court," or of the "Summary Courts."

45392. Magistrates are not under the same Act of Parliament?—No, they are under a different Act of Parliament entirely. I do think it is a misnomer. I am not cavilling with the word, because people in a good position have said to me, "But you are part and parcel of the police force; you are a Metropolitan Police Magistrate, you are one of the same body." I endeavour to point out that it is the unfortunate word "police," and that we have no more to do with the police force than they have. I should be very glad to see the whole name altered, and for our position to be "Judges of the Summary Jurisdiction Court," or of the "Summary Courts."

Mr. H. C. Bennett.

45393. (Chairman.) Speaking broadly, I suppose, quite apart from making allowance for any special duties attached to the London courts, your court is a petty sessional court?—It is a petty sessional court with considerable additional power. You see, we have power in detinue up to £15; we have all these great cases under the Building Acts with regard to which I have made orders for thousands of pounds in an afternoon against several builders or owners for making up streets, pavements, and so forth; and we have loan societies cases, and other cases of a similar description, which have nothing to do with criminal matters.

45394. You have made a suggestion as to the name. Would not the name "Petty Sessions" do as well?—I think not quite, because we are different to the petty sessional court. There is that distinction. We are petty sessional plus something else.

45395. Supposing a prisoner in any case which you are trying complains of the conduct of the police in that particular case, or of some other constable who has been indirectly mixed up in the case, do you ever find it a proper course to complain to the Home Office or to the Commissioner?—I should put the case back first and have that constable sent for.

45396. Then what takes place?—Then I should put the constable in the box and let the prisoner cross-examine him.

45397. Supposing your view was adverse to the constable, what course would you take then?—I should then request that a report be made to the Chief Commissioner.

45398. And that has been done in more cases than one?—Yes, and I should leave it entirely to him.

45399. You do not report to the Chief Commissioner yourself?—Certainly not.

45400. That is, of course, following out your view that you have no more to do with the police than anybody not a member of the Police Force has to do with them?—Yes. I am bound to say I have always received the greatest courtesy from Scotland Yard personally.

45401. There is one matter I find I have omitted and that is the question of altering the charge sheet. I think you heard the questions I put to, and the answers given by Mr. D'Eyncourt?—Yes.

45402. What have you to say about that?—I do not quite acquiesce in his view. I look upon the charge sheet as merely what the Inspector who has taken the charge considers the case to be, and that really and truly it is only for the guidance of the court as to what the person is coming before the court for. Supposing, for instance, the man was charged before me with being drunk and disorderly, and I, having heard the evidence, come to the conclusion that the man was not drunk, but that he had been disorderly, I should strike out the word "drunk" in my book, or "drunk and," and I should say, "I am simply going to deal with the question of disorder. What do you say as to that?" Supposing I convict, he would stand convicted of the disorder only, and if I dismissed, the whole thing would be dismissed. I look upon the charge sheet not as a formal document, it is not an indictment, it is only there really to give an idea to the court what the man is brought before you for, and you are not bound by it either within the four corners of the charge at all. If the man was charged with, for instance, a misdemeanour, and you find it is a felony, you deal with it. To my mind, what the Inspector says in the charge sheet does not affect one in the least. What we want to know is what the answer is to the case which is absolutely made by the evidence given before the Magistrate.

45403. It becomes rather difficult, then, to show from documentary proof what a man has been tried for?—My register is kept open, and the Chief Clerk, who is with me in court, would immediately strike out the words as I do, and the charge sheet would stand for the charge proved.

45404. In one of the cases which we have investigated—I think I mentioned it to Mr. D'Eyncourt—we have it in the evidence that the charge sheet contained the words "drunk, disorderly, and making use of obscene language in Oakley Street." When the case came before the Magistrate another charge was substituted for that, and there has been no alteration in the charge sheet whatever. The charge against Mr. Mullins was, in fact, dismissed?—There is nothing perfect in this world, but it ought to have been amended.

45405. Supposing he said what is a perfectly true statement on his part now, "I was never charged at the police court with being drunk, disorderly and making use of obscene language," it would appear that he was accurate?—As regards that document, but if you had gone further and had the register No. 1, as we call it, brought before you, it is very possible, and more than probable, you will find the thing had been altered. I look upon it that that document is not the document that I should go by personally as a Magistrate. I should go by the decision that is entered in either No. 1 or No. 2, and the entry made by the Magistrate as to the termination of that case.

(Chairman.) The Commission are obliged to you for kindly coming here and giving your valuable evidence.

(Chairman.) Yes. This is one of the cases in which I propose to examine the witness myself, because, under our rules, we only allow Counsel to examine in cases where there is a conflict. There seems to be no conflict of evidence in this case.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) No, Sir, not at all.

Miss Ethel Corbett Knight, sworn.

Miss E. C. Knight.

45406. (Chairman.) Are you the secretary of the Continental Department of the Young Women's Christian Association?—Yes.

45407. The address of that department is 26, George Street, Hanover Square?—Yes.

45408. You are also secretary of the International Union of Friends of Young Women?—Yes.

45409. What is the purpose for which these associations exist?—The purpose of our society is really to protect young women of other nationalities than English who come to England to earn their living in various capacities.

45410. You do not exist necessarily for the assistance of abandoned women?—Oh, no. It is rather for the protection of other women.

45411. How many years have you been now working in this department of your association?—Rather more than eleven years now.

45412. How many foreign girls come to be dealt with by you in one way and another in the course of the year on the average?—We have an average of between 3,000 and 4,000 arrivals from the Continent every year. Some years there are more and some years less.

45413. You, I suppose, make their acquaintance not simply upon their arrival in England but after they have been living in England for some time?—Yes, and also a large number come to us on their immediate arrival. They are sent to us from the Continent.

45414. You know where they are, and I suppose some of them drift into evil courses?—Yes, many do.

45415. Then you do your best to get them back to a proper course of life?—Yes, or we pass them on to rescue societies or we help them to go home again to their own country.

45416. For our purposes to-day the point of your evidence seems to be this, that you come in contact every year with a large number of foreign women who have been on the streets in London?—No, they have not been on the streets in London, if you mean by that being there in a bad way.

45417. Yes, I mean in a bad way?—No, they have not. Our purpose in coming here to-day is to say that these girls and women come over here and they know very little of the dangers existing in London. Very often they know very little of the language, and in the majority of cases they apply to the police for help and advice and for addresses, and we have never known a case in which a girl has been misdirected by the police or sent to a house of bad repute.

45418. I thought you were going to help us by telling us that you had quite properly and most charitably had conversations with girls of bad character?—Yes, some, but not a large number.

45419. You have met some?—Oh, yes, most decidedly.

45420. I suppose they have told you their stories and the difficulty of their lives?—Yes, they have.

45421. Has any one of them ever complained of ill-treatment by the policemen in the streets?—No, not one has complained to me. On the contrary, they have always spoken very highly of the police.

45422. They have said the police have been helpful to them?—Yes.

45423. Has any one of them ever suggested that the police have asked for money?—No, never.

45424. Or made improper advances to them?—No, never.

45425. Is there any particular case in which police-constables were helpful that you would like to mention as an illustration?—Yes, some years ago a girl was directed by a private person to a house of ill repute, and she was helped out of it by a police-constable, but that is some six or seven years ago. I cannot remember the date exactly.

45426. When you say she was directed to a house of ill fame did she actually go there and reside there?—No, she was only there a very short time, perhaps an hour or two, and she was helped out by a police-constable.

45427. Did she have difficulty in getting out of the house. Did they try to make her a prisoner?—Yes.

45428. How was she able to get the aid of the police?—I really forget the details. If my memory serves me rightly she got out of the door, and I think she was directed to a proper place by a police-constable, who helped her very considerably.

45429. Having escaped, she came into contact with a police-constable?—Yes, when she got out of the house.

45430. And he gave her efficient help?—Yes, very efficient help. I still know that girl.

45431. Is that an isolated case?—That is an isolated case. Miss E. C. Knight.

45432. You do not remember anything quite like it?—No. 7 May 1907.

45434. (Chairman.) I think Mr. Coote and his society have organised the work at the railway stations?—Yes.

45435. You have nothing to say about railway stations?—No, nothing at all. We used to undertake that, but we do not now.

45436. (Mr. Whitmore.) Do you think that the temptations to these strangers have diminished of recent years?—I do not think so. I should say they have increased.

45437. How?—Girls tell me (of course, in many cases they may have deceived me) of the many overtures made to them in the streets.

45438. We have heard that up to quite lately the condition of central London, Regent Street and Piccadilly, is improved?—It may have within the last two or three months or five or six months, but certainly in my experience it has not improved very much.

45439. Not materially?—No.

45440. Not to affect the dangers which come to these girls?—No.

(Chairman.) Is there any question, Mr. Bankes, that you would like me to put to the witness?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) With reference to the lady's last answer, she would rather speak, I think, of the danger to foreign girls in the streets from men accosting them rather than the state of the streets as evidenced by the number of women in them.

45441. (Chairman.) Do you follow what Mr. Bankes suggests?—Yes.

45442. That is what you would like to say, that you find from these girls that they are molested a good deal in the streets by men?—Yes.

45443. And that police-constables are very helpful to them in protecting them?—Yes.

45444. (Mr. Whitmore.) That is before these girls have become prostitutes?—Yes, certainly.

(Chairman.) We are very much obliged to you, Miss Knight, for coming here and giving evidence.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) The next witness is Staff Captain Hillyar, from the Salvation Army.

Staff-Captain Harriett Hillyar, sworn.

45445. (Chairman.) You belong to the Salvation Army, and are a staff captain?—Yes.

45446. Your branch is at 259, Mare Street, Hackney?—Yes.

45447. Those are the headquarters of the Women's Social work?—Yes.

45448. Do you do some midnight work?—Yes, I have been working under the direction of Miss Bramwell Booth for the last eleven years on Piccadilly midnight work.

45449. What does you work consist of?—We go out at night times. I do not go out every night now, but I used to do so. For about eight years I went out every night, and I interviewed the girls at Mare Street, Hackney. As they come to us in the daytime I interviewed them there, and occasionally I go out into Piccadilly.

45450. I suppose you go out two or three together?—About two together generally, or more.

45151. How do you proceed to try and get into communication with these unfortunate women?—We offer them a card. We have no difficulty with regard to their taking it. This is the card we offer them. (Producing card.) "Mrs. Booth will gladly help any girl or woman in need of a friend. Apply at 79, Great Titchfield Street, or 259, Mare Street, Hackney, N.E."

45452. Do they take the card readily?—Yes, very readily. Staff-Captain H. Hillyar.

45453. What happens in many instances?—They either apply to us at 259, Mare Street, Hackney, or at 79, Great Titchfield Street, or we prefer taking them home with us.

45454. Your cards are printed in English, German and French?—Yes.

45455. What happens after a girl has taken a card. Does she come to your home and see you?—She comes either to 72, Great Titchfield Street, or 259 Mare Street, Hackney, or sometimes they come home with us. Of course, we prefer taking them home.

45456. How do you treat those who come?—They go to Mare Street, and sometimes we pass them on to one of our homes. We have a good number of homes round London.

45457. I suppose they are taught various crafts?—Yes, different work, mostly domestic work. Some girls are sent home to their parents. We have sent a great number home to their parents off Piccadilly and elsewhere.

45458. You have been 17 years in the Salvation Army?—Yes, and for the last 11 years I have worked on Piccadilly and the neighbourhood.

45459. You have every week, I suppose, a good many conversations with these unfortunate women?—Oh, yes, a good number.

Staff-Captain H. Hillyar.

7 May 1907.

45460. Do you hear them complain of their lot, their difficulties, and ill-treatment on the part of anybody?—No, I do not thing so, not at all.

45461. Do they ever complain that the police order them to move on roughly or anything of that kind?—No, we have never had any complaints about the police. I interview a great number of women at Mare Street, and I have never had any complaints against the police. The police, as a rule, have treated us very kindly in Piccadilly, and try to help us. In fact, policemen have come to us and asked us for our little tickets, and they have helped the girls to come along.

45462. Constables have come to you and asked you for your cards?—Yes, several of them round Piccadilly have had our cards.

45463. And they have given them to girls?—Yes, I think so.

45464. Have you ever known a case of a girl coming to you in consequence of having received one of the cards from a policeman?—Yes.

45465. Many instances?—I do not know about many instances.

45466. In the majority of the cases they have come because you and your fellow workers have handed them cards?—Yes.

45467. But sometimes a woman has come in consequence of having received a card from the police?—Yes. Of course, we have a great number in Mare Street who come to the address given by the police. A tremendous number of girls we have.

45468. In consequence of cards distributed by constables?—They know our address at Mare Street, and we have a great number from the police. They direct the girls to us at Mare Street.

45469. Have you ever heard any of them suggest that they have had to pay money to the police in order to be allowed to go about and accost men?—Never anything of the kind.

45470. Have you ever seen anything yourself?—I once saw a coin put down in Regent Street, but that is over seven years ago. I remember the officer who was working with me at the time. But I never saw the policeman take it up.

45471. What was that transaction that you saw?—It was a foreign woman who laid down half a crown, or a 2s. piece on the ledge of a shop. I knew that it was there, but I never saw the policeman take it up.

45472. (Mr. Whitmore.) Was there a policeman near there at the time?—There was one at the corner, by Tiffany's.

45473. The woman put half a crown or a 2s. piece on the shop ledge?—Either half a crown or a 2s. piece, but I never saw the policeman take it up. We passed on and never took any notice of it.

45474. (Chairman.) Do you think he saw the woman put the money there?—I do not know. We passed the policeman and saw this woman put it down there. We went on with our work. That is the only time I have ever seen money put down.

45475. Did it not strike you as rather an odd thing to put 2s. on a window sill?—I do not know that I thought much about it.

45476. It did not strike you as odd?—It did strike me as odd to do that.

45477. Had you ever seen it done before?—I had never seen it done before.

45478. (Mr. Whitmore.) Had you heard of it being done?—No, I had never heard of it being done before.

45479. (Chairman.) Have you heard any suggestion that anybody has said that constables were in the habit of taking money from women?—No, but that is what I thought it was put there for.

45480. You had heard rumours?—I had never heard any rumours at all about it.

45481. You do not know what became of the money in this instance?—No, I do not know what became of it.

45482. (Mr. Whitmore.) Could you see whether there was any sort of communication going on between the constable and the woman?—No, I did not see that at all.

45483. Had the woman spoken to the constable before?—I did not speak to her.

45484. Did you see him speak to her afterwards?—No, I saw no conversation between the two of them.

45485. (Chairman.) Then we may take it that apart from that incident nothing at all has occurred during your eleven years that leads you to think there is a common practice of bribing the police?—I never saw anything of it in Piccadilly.

45486. What opinion have you formed on the matter?—I do not think there is any of it done in Piccadilly. Piccadilly is greatly altered to what it used to be. When I first went there there was a greater number there than what there are to-day. There are a great many more foreigners there than what there used to be. English girls are much easier to get hold of than foreigners.

45487. (Mr. Whitmore.) How do you mean?—Easier for the Salvation Army. There are a tremendous number of foreigners there now, and a very few English girls considering. I was down there last night, and I was quite surprised at the number of foreigners—a tremendous number.

45488. (Chairman.) When you said that it was so different a few years ago, did you mean that it was different so far as bribery was concerned?—No, I have never seen any bribery there at all. I have never seen a coin given by a woman to a policeman. We have come in contact with the policemen a great deal, and they have always helped us—in fact, one policeman asked me if I would try and get hold of two young girls, and we did get hold of them, and sent them to their friends. They had not been on Piccadilly any length of time.

45489. Is there any case that you recollect in which you could say the police were not helpful, or behaved badly?—We reported them once, that was about eleven years ago. We got hold of a girl in Piccadilly, and there was a man who would keep talking to her. We spoke to a policeman, and we thought he did not do his duty to us in helping us to get this girl away from this man. That was the only case. We reported that to Vine Street.

45490. What did the police constable say to you in that case?—I do not think he said anything, only we asked him if he would try to help us to get this girl away from this man. The girl did not want the man.

45491. Was the man assaulting the girl?—No, he was trying to get her away from us.

45492. By physical force?—I do not know. It is eleven years ago, and I cannot recollect all the details.

45493. What could the police-constable do if a man is asking a woman to go with him on one side and you are standing on the other?—The girl did not want the man, and we thought the constable ought to have spoken to the man and tried to get him away from this girl. That is the only time, and that is eleven years ago.

45494. I only wanted to know what the police-constable could do under those circumstances?—I thought he ought to have helped us in trying to get this man away.

45495. It would have been rather dangerous for the constable to have gone up and admonished the man. The man might have blamed the constable then, might he not?—He might have done.

45496. (Mr. Whitmore.) What was the result of your complaint to Vine Street?—We saw the Inspector, and he told us he would ask his men to help us all they possibly could, and they have done so ever since. They have helped us in every possible way.

45497. (Chairman.) That is the only complaint you have made against the police in eleven years?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Is there any question you would like to suggest, Mr. Bankes?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Would you ask this lady with reference to the case when the coin was put down, whether it was put down by a foreign woman, and whether she had seen the foreign woman before, or whether she had only recently come over. (Witness.) She was a Frenchwoman.

45498. (Chairman.) Had she recently come over?—I do not know. I had never seen her before. I did not know what the coin was put there for, but we guessed.

45499. (Mr. Eldon Bankes.) You had never seen the woman in the streets before?—No.

45500. (Mr. Whitmore.) Should you say the state of Piccadilly is better with regard to this matter than it used to be?—Yes, it is much better, but the girls have gone elsewhere—Tottenham Court Road and Marble Arch.

45501. But as far as Regent Street and Piccadilly are concerned, it has improved?—Yes.

45502. Do you attribute that to the action of he police?—Yes.

45503. (Chairman.) The action of the police as such has only made them shift their quarters?—I suppose so.

45504. (Mr. Whitmore.) But similar action in the other places would have produced the same results?—They would shift them off somewhere else.

45505. (Chairman.) The best means of improving the condition of things is your kind of work, I suppose?—I do not know, but I am sure the only thing is to rescue the women, and I think some of the men ought to be rescued too.

45506. Do you hear any complaints from girls in the case of, say, milliners employed in shops or employed in other work in and about Regent Street that well-dressed men come and solicit them, and try to enter into conversation with them?—Yes; we have had cases of girls who have been led astray by men outside these milliners' shops. One girl died two years ago who we knew was led astray by a man in that way. He kept her for three years and then threw her off, and she went on Piccadilly. She is dead now.

45507. According to her sad story the girl yielded; but what I mean is, do you think a great many men go up and speak to young women they do not know at all?—Yes, I think so.

45508. Do the young women complain, and does it amount to a nuisance?—I do not know. The girls need not speak to them, but, of course, many of these men promise them all manner of things. I think a good many of the girls are led wrong in that way in the first beginning.

45509. But I suppose a girl is very reluctant to go and talk to a policeman and say, "That man came and spoke to me"?—Yes, I think they are.

45510. Do you know any case in which a girl, an honest young girl, who has been spoken to by a man has gone to a policeman and said, "I want to be protected from that man"?—I do not know of any case.

45511. Has any girl ever asked for your protection?—Yes; we have been asked many a time, but not at midnight.

45512. But say in the afternoon, or tea time, or at the time of their leaving business, and so on?—Yes. Sometimes they come and ask us to look after them.

45513. Do you give them your protection?—Yes, we would protect them.

45514. Would you walk with a girl towards her home?—Oh, yes, we have seen girls home before now.

45515. So as to keep any man off?—Yes; if we were asked to do that.

45516. You know of no case in which police aid has been asked?—I do not think so. I do not know of any particularly. I do not think I know of any case really that has come up directly. There may be, but I do not remember.

(Chairman.) We thank you very much, Miss Hillyar, for coming and giving us your evidence.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Then Miss MacDougall is the next witness, Sir.

Miss Eilidh MacDougall, sworn.

45517. (Chairman.) Do you reside at 6, Palace Mansions, Lambeth Road?—Yes.

45518. I think your work is outdoor rescue work in connection with the Southwark Diocesan Association for the Care of Friendless Girls?—Yes.

45519. How long have you worked for that association?—About twelve years.

45520. I think that your work chiefly consists of visiting the girls in the workhouses?—Yes, I visit the girls in the Lambeth workhouses and the infirmary, and I also visit the girls in their own homes and in lodging houses, and I do a certain amount of street work.

45521. You sometimes, I suppose, speak to them in the street?—Yes.

45522. Do you get to know a good many of them?—Yes.

45523. Are the girls that you are referring to girls who are leading an abandoned life in the streets?—Yes.

45524. How many do you come across, do you think, in the course of a month, as a rule?—I see eighty and ninety new girls every year, and I am in constant touch with the old girls.

45525. The girls who have been rescued?—Yes.

45526. What do you mean by rescuing a girl. When she consents to accept your help what do you do with her, and where do you take her?—Generally to a refuge.

45527. And there, I suppose, she is taught some business if she requires to be taught?—She is either passed on to a longer home or she may be placed in service. It depends upon the girl entirely. She is started afresh.

45528. Then, again, I suppose there is a lady missioner, is there not, with whom you work to a certain extent, who is attached to the police court at Lambeth?—Yes.

45529. Do you work with her at all?—Not to any great extent.

45530. I suppose that you have been brought a good deal in contact with actress girls who live on the south side of the water?—Yes.

45531. And many of them, I suppose, frequent Piccadilly?—I believe so.

45532. Have they told you so?—Yes.

45533. You have had many conversations, I suppose, with these girls, whether they have been rescued or whether they have not been rescued by you?—Yes.

45534. Have you ever heard any complaints on their part as to ill-treatment by the police?—No, never.

45535. Not a single complaint?—Not a single complaint.

45536. And that extends over eleven years?—Yes.

45537. Do you think they are very friendly with the police?—I could hardly say. I think that if they ask protection the police are very ready to give it.

45538. Have you ever heard of a policeman making any improper advances to any one of them?—No.

45539. Have you ever heard anything about bribery of the police?—No. In the last few months I have asked every girl who seemed likely to know anything about it, and I can get no suggestion that bribes have ever been asked by the police.

45540. Have they all denied anything of the kind?—Yes.

45541. (Mr. Whitmore.) What made you ask?—The Commission.

45542. (Chairman.) I do not know that the evidence is less valuable for that, although it was prompted by the probability of your becoming a witness; but, at any rate, you are telling us that you honestly think girls have not been bribing the police?—I honestly do not think so.

45543. And nothing in the conversations you have had with these numerous young women lead you to think that there is any system of bribery?—No, I do not think so.

Miss E. MacDougall. 7 May 1907.

(Chairman.) Have you any question to suggest, Mr. Bankes?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) No, except that the lady would say the police have rendered her great assistance frequently in getting at girls and assisting her in her work.

45544. (Chairman.) What do you say to that?—They have rendered very great assistance. A number of girls have been sent or been brought to me by the police, and my address has been constantly given by different constables.

45545. (Mr. Whitmore.) Do you think that the action of the police in stopping solicitation in the streets does anything permanently to diminish the evil?—It is very difficult to say.

45546. Do you find from your conversation with these girls that they are deterred from practising their trade because of the zeal of the police?—Yes, I should think so. They are not allowed to remain about; they are told to move on.

45547. I do not suppose it has any sort of moral effect?—I am afraid it has not. I have had many complaints of men speaking to the girls.

45548. (Chairman.) From workers?—The girls are constantly complaining of being spoken to by men in the streets.

45549. (Mr. Whitmore.) Girls who are not prostitutes?—Yes. I speak mostly of the girls who are now living respectable lives; those who were formerly living immoral lives.

45550. (Chairman.) They complain that men do speak to them a great deal?—Yes.

45551. Do you think that the police constables endeavour to stop that at all?—Girls very rarely ask the help of a constable.

45552. Have you known instances in which they have asked help?—Yes, one occurred last year. A girl was spoken to by a man, and she spoke to a constable, and he walked some considerable distance with her and saw her quite out of reach of the man, but I understand that if a girl does speak to a constable the constable really has no power to do anything.

45553. That is what we have been putting to Mr. D'Eyncourt this morning, and to other Magistrates. They seem to think that the constable has a good deal of power if he likes to exercise it. But, however, it is very difficult in the case you are putting of simply speaking. You are of opinion that the police would help a girl as much as they could under those circumstances?—Oh, yes, I think so.

(Chairman.) We are very much obliged to you, Miss MacDougall, for coming here and giving your evidence.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Those are all the witnesses who are here to-day, Sir. May I ask your direction with regard to calling any more of these witnesses. You have the whole of the statements before you, and I think the only one the Commissioner is very anxious you should have is the Rev. Mr. Meyer.

(Chairman.) Then we will have him.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) He can be here to-morrow. Then, Sir, with regard to the other witnesses I should ask your direction as to whether you would wish them called. You have now had a considerable number, and the other witnesses would speak to the same effect as you see by their statements. Of course, it is entirely for you to say whether you desire that we should call them.

(Chairman.) As at present advised I do not think we need multiply this kind of testimony.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) That is my own feeling, and if it is your feeling also we will not call them.

FIFTIETH DAY.

Wednesday, 8th May 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).	J. W. St. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
WILLOUGHBY HYETT DICKINSON, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).	J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Mr. GEORGE PAUL TAYLOR, sworn.

Mr. G. P. Taylor.

45554. (Chairman.) You are one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrate?—I am attached to the Marylebone Police Court.

45555. When were you first appointed?—In May, 1895.

45556. To what courts have you been attached?—I was first of all attached to the North London Court for a period of eighteen months or two years, I was then attached to the Greenwich Court for about the same period, and I was then transferred to the Southwark Court where I remained for over six years. I was attached to my present court in January, 1905.

45557. I think that the Secretary has sent you a memorandum of the heads of evidence upon which we invite your assistance?—That is so. That memorandum is before me at the present time.

45558. Have you prepared any written statement?—No, I have not prepared a written statement. I have not had time to prepare a written statement.

45559. Then perhaps you would like me to ask you questions?—I should prefer that course, Sir.

45560. The terms of our reference you are acquainted with?—I am.

45561. How would you define generally the duties of police constables in regard to the three classes of cases mentioned in our terms of reference?—I do not think it would be possible with regard to that matter to improve upon the instructions contained in the Instruction Book. I have had the opportunity of reading those instructions very carefully indeed, and they seem to me to be admirably clear.

45562. You have had a good many years experience of work in the Police Force, and I suppose the great majority of the cases that come before you are cases in which the police constables are the prosecutors?—In the case of charges certainly.

45563. It is the constable who is generally the prosecutor?—Yes, invariably one may say, in cases of drunkenness, disorder, or solicitation.

45564. You have had some opportunity of observing the way in which the constables do their work?—I have.

45565. What opinion have you formed as to the way in which the constables of the Metropolitan Police Force discharge their duty. Do they do it with honesty, discretion and efficiency?—In my opinion they certainly do possess those qualities in quite a remarkable degree. I consider they are extremely intelligent also, and in my opinion too the stupid constable is very much the exception. I should like to add that in my opinion the general bearing and discipline of the police reflect great credit upon the system under which they are trained, and upon the officers at Scotland Yard who are responsible for it.

45566. I suppose that occasionally a case comes before you in which you may suspect some misconduct or error on the part of a police constable?—Do you refer to cases such as you have just now alluded to.

45567. Yes. Let me put the question in this way: has any recent case come into your Court in which the evidence indicated the possibility that the constable had been guilty of some misconduct or error of judgment?—Speaking for myself only in my own experience I can recollect no such case.

45568. Have you any comments or criticisms to make as to the organisation and work of the force with regard to dealing with the three classes of cases mentioned in our terms of reference?—I have not. As I say, having carefully read the Instruction Book, and guided by my experience as to the way in which these cases are actually treated by the police I can only express my entire satisfaction.

45569. Have you any recommendation to make with regard to altering the Instruction Book?—None whatever.

45570. Or any recommendation to make for fresh legislation in regard to the powers and duties of the police in regard to these three classes of cases?—I have not. In my judgment the legislation at present existing is amply sufficient to deal with the matter, and I question very much whether it would be possible to improve it.

45571. I gather from what you have said that you are well acquanted with the regulations and rules contained in the Instruction Book which we have called the White Book?—I have had the opportunity of reading it carefully.

45572. Perhaps, I had better ask you a question although you have practically answered it: Have you any alterations to suggest in the language of the various sections of the book; is it possible to make the duties of the constables more clear or more specific with any advantage?—In my opinion no. The instructions appear to me to be extremely clear, and to have been drawn, I may say, with almost meticulous care.

45573. As to the arrangement of the book, have you anything to say?—The arrangement of the book strikes me as being all that it should be.

45574. Do you find it easy to find any particular regulation with the book in your hands?—With regard to that point I must say that my attention was principally directed to the portion of the book dealing with the subject of "Apprehension" that is Section 17 of the Instruction Book, because that, of course, is the section dealing with the matters more immediately before the Commission.

45575. You as an experienced lawyer will follow what is in my mind. We know that sometimes a book is easy for reference, and sometimes it is more difficult for reference. Do you find that an easy book of reference supposing you wanted to find a particular point as to what are the duties of the inspector in the charge room with regard to calling a doctor, for instance?—That also seems to be provided for under Section 17, "Apprehension," but with regard to that matter it is possible there might be some improvement. I do not know that it is so, but I rather fancy the book contains no index.

45576. That is my point.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It does contain an index. It is at the beginning.

(Witness.) I looked for it at the end as a matter of fact.

45576. (Chairman.) I am asking your opinion. I have got my own opinion about it, and I will not indicate it at the present moment?—You mean with regard to the mode in which the book is indexed?

45577. Yes?—I should think if what you allude to is the only index, it would be possible to improve it from the point of view of the index. (Instruction Book handed to the witness.) Now I have the index before me.

45578. My present duty is confined to asking you whether you find any fault with the arrangement?—Now that the index has been brought to my notice, and I have looked through it, it seems to me to be tolerably complete—that is to say, the index on page 23 in the Roman numerals, the one that Mr. Muir has brought to my attention, seems to me to be tolerably complete. As a matter of fact I looked at the end of the book for the index, and I expected to find it there rather than at the beginning.

45579. Supposing I asked you what is the duty of the inspector in the charge room as to calling a doctor. How long would it take you to find it out in that book?—I am afraid I could not say. I happen to know what his duties are—that is to say, I have read Section 17, and therefore I should find it for myself at once, but whether I should be able to find it for myself at once in the absence of knowing that it is dealt with under that section is a question I could not answer.

45580. On the whole your impression is, I gather, that the book is sufficiently well arranged?—I think it is sufficiently well arranged. I am far from saying that it might not be better arranged.

45581. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do you think with the knowledge you possess you could find that section?—I think so.

45582. (Chairman.) I have found the same difficulty myself, but that may be my ineptness?—I should know it was comprised in Section 17, and I should proceed to read through Section 17. No doubt it could be improved with regard to that.

45583. (Mr. Dickinson.) Could you find Section 17?—I know Section 17.

45584. (Chairman.) Is not the answer this: if a man knows the book very well he could easily find what he wants, but if he comes quite fresh to the study of the question it is not an easy book to find without that knowledge?—I should not like to express the view that it is not possible to better the arrangement of the index.

45585. From that topic I come to the general head of "Arrest or Apprehension." Are you of opinion that the regulations as to the method of effecting the arrest or taking the prisoners to the police court are satisfactory?—I am. I have been struck, as I say, by the almost over-careful attention that seems to be given in these Instructions to constables for the purpose of guiding them in the execution of their duty, for instance, great stress is laid on the fact that nothing in the nature of unnecessary violence should be used, and that the truncheon is only to be used in the last resort, and so on.

45586. Take the question of the truncheon. Have you during your experience on the Bench ever felt that a constable might have avoided the use of the truncheon in a case where the truncheon was actually used?—I never have. That I say without any hesitation whatever. I have never in the course of my experience known a case in which, in my opinion, the truncheon was unnecessarily used. May I say in connection with that that on the contrary, if I may say so, I have frequently been struck by the astonishing forebearance the constables have displayed.

45587. Has any prisoner recently complained to you that he has been harshly treated or cruelly treated by the police constable on the way to the station, or anything of that kind?—The complaint very frequently made in police courts, generally by women charged with being drunk and disorderly, is that their arms are bruised by the constable on their being taken to the station. I may say with regard to that matter that I pay no attention whatever to that complaint, and for this reason that I know from my experience, and from what I have seen in the courts in my twelve years' experience, that it is extremely easy to bruise the thick part of the arm, which is the portion of the arm generally taken by the constable, and especially when the arm is the arm of a woman, and the bruising in my opinion represents a minute amount of force, and would not represent substantial ill-treatment, but may very easily be caused so far as the external appearance is concerned by comparatively slight pressure. That is my belief.

45588. So that in the cases which have come under your notice the bruise or mark on the arm has been almost incidental to the use of a proper amount of force?—That is my view, that it is inevitable from the amount of force that it is absolutely necessary for the constables to use in order to get their prisoners to the station.

45589. Do you remember any case in which you came to the conclusion that the constable had used more force than was reasonably necessary for the purpose of conveying a prisoner to the station?—I can only say that my experience in that respect appears to have been a very happy one. So far as I can remember, I know of no such case.

45590. Have you any reason to think that constables use their power of summary arrest unnecessarily—I mean in cases in which they might just as efficaciously proceed by summons?—You mean by taking the name and address of the party?

45591. Yes?—I have certainly no complaint whatever to make on that head. On the contrary, I find that they observe the regulations laid down with regard to that matter with very great care and attention.

45592. Passing from that topic to the proceedings in the charge room, what view have you formed about the proceedings in the charge room? First of all, as laid down in the White Book, do you consider that the proceedings in the charge room contemplated by the White Book are proceedings of a purely executive character, or do they involve a kind of judicial investigation?—They unquestionably involve something in the nature of a judicial investigation, because the inspector or station sergeant, or other officer taking the charge, has to exercise his discretion on the question as to whether or not he must take or refuse the charge.

45593. And in doing that duty, I suppose the first thing he has to consider is whether upon the constable's statement there is any charge of an offence under any statute or against the common law?—Undoubtedly that would be his first duty.

45594. If the charge is, so to speak, right in form, I suppose he has got to inquire whether it is right to take or refuse the charge in the sense that he has to ask himself whether there is or is not a primâ facie case against the prisoner?—Unquestionably so. He has to consider whether the statement made by the constable in laying the charge constitutes an offence.

45595. Has anything occurred in your Court that has ever led you to think that in a particular case, or it may be in more than one case, an inspector has taken a charge that he ought to have refused with a view to shielding the officer or taken a charge while acting under the influence of a kind of professional bias?—I can only say in my own experience I have never known such a case at all. During the last few days, since Monday morning when I knew that you had invited me to give evidence before this Commission, I have been endeavouring to recollect with regard to that particular point whether I have ever had occasion to consider that a charge had been improperly taken. I have no such recollection whatever. I have been searching the records of my memory but I cannot find any.

45596. You have been good enough to tell us what your view is of the character of the work to be done by the inspector in deciding whether to refuse or take the charge. Suggestions have reached us that sometimes a great deal of damage is done to the reputations of perfectly innocent persons in consequence of a charge being taken that upon investigation the next day before the Magistrate is found to be wholly baseless. Have you any suggestion to make as to amending the proceedings in the charge room so as to avoid a possible grievance to completely innocent people?—I have not, and for these reasons. First of all, within my own experience I know of no such cases as those upon which the question is based. Within my own experience I know of no case where perfectly innocent people have had their reputations damaged in consequence of a charge being taken at the police station which was afterwards dismissed at the police court, and I may say this, I have a very strong opinion indeed that if such cases occur they occur so exceedingly rarely that they could not be taken into consideration as constituting any ground for changing an otherwise satisfactory system of taking the charge. That is the view I have formed with regard to it. In my own experience I recollect not a single case tried before me, certainly, where I could honestly say that any such damage had resulted or would be likely to result to any person.

45597. I suppose there is a percentage of cases in which you have to dismiss the charge—say charges of drunkenness and disorderly conduct and charges of solicitation against women?—There is a certain percentage of cases in which those charges are dismissed undoubtedly.

45598. Is it a large percentage?—I should say an extremely small one. Cases are dismissed very often on grounds which have no relation whatever to one's belief in the evidence of the constable.

45599. Then I may take it that the mere dismissal of a charge by you as Magistrate does not necessarily involve any censure whatsoever on the Inspector who took the charge?—Certainly not. I think it is desirable that there should be a clear understanding on that point. Speaking from my own experience only, but speaking I am sure for several of the other Magistrates as well, because I have discussed the matter with them, it would be quite an error to suppose because a charge is dismissed by the Magistrate that that constitutes the slightest imputation on any police officer in connection with it at any stage of the case either in the charge room or in the witness-box. All sorts of reasons may exist in the mind of the Magistrate for dismissing the charge. It may be that the person against whom the charge is made is a person of years, a comparatively old person. In those cases, if the charge is made for the first time, a simple charge of drunkenness or being drunk and disorderly, over and over again I dismiss the charge and tell the prisoner that I hope this will be a warning to him to be more careful in the future, expressing at the same time my reason for dismissing the charge being the fact that the prisoner has reached quite a considerable age without ever finding himself in trouble before.

45600. Supposing when the constable has made the charge against his prisoner in the charge room the Inspector is in doubt as to whether a prima-facie case is or is not made out, what is his duty? Supposing it is one of those doubtful cases that sometimes occur and must occur?—In my opinion in that case it would be his duty to allow a Magistrate to decide his doubt.

45601. Then in that case his duty is to take the charge rather than refuse it, and allow the Magistrate to do justice between the constable and the accused?—That would be my view.

45602. Do not you think it would be of some advantage to the Inspector and to the parties concerned if, instead of having to decide the matter practically within a few minutes in the charge room on the day on which the person has been arrested, the Inspector had the right to say, "Well, I will postpone the question whether I will take or refuse this charge until to-morrow"—of course having the power to take bail from the accused that he would appear at some given time the next day at the station?—That would not commend itself to me. It seems to me that there are grave objections to allowing a charge to remain hanging over a person while the Inspector is exercising his discretion as to whether or not the charge should ultimately be taken.

45603. We have had this case before us. I will put it in general terms. A person against whom a charge of drunk and disorderly conduct is made said at once to the Inspector, "I am not drunk and disorderly"—I will put it hypothetically, because I cannot recollect all the details. The prisoner entirely denies the charge and says, "I have a friend outside who has been with me for a couple of hours who is afraid to come in; he came with me as far as the station door, and then he was afraid to come in for some reason or other; I should like before you take this charge, Mr. Inspector, to send for that man." Would there be any objection to the Inspector having the power to say, especially when he looked at the man and must have felt there was some doubt as to the disorderly conduct, "Very well, I will adjourn it to to-morrow," and then bind the man over and ask for the name and address of the friend?—If there was not the fact that he already possessed the power which enables him to decide the question there might be something in that suggestion, but as a matter of fact it becomes his duty immediately the man says "I am not drunk" to satisfy himself that he is drunk, and if the man asks for a doctor the doctor must be at once sent for.

45604. But on the charge sheet disorderly conduct is added. The different issues may be inextricably mixed up, especially late at night?—I was assuming the case only with reference to that in which the man said he was not drunk. With reference to a case of that kind, if the Inspector taking the charge has any doubt as to the man's drunkenness he would send for the doctor. In my opinion the police are very ready to send for a doctor, and very careful to fortify their own opinion by having the doctor's expert opinion about the case. That is my experience in these cases of drunkenness.

45605. Then even in the sort of case I have put to you, where a witness or witnesses have been afraid to come to the police station—their fears, as we all know, would be quite unfounded, but still even in a case of that kind you do not think the Inspector ought to have the power of delaying his decision on the question of taking or refusing the charge?—I think the disadvantages would outweigh the possible advantages in any particular case. That is briefly my view of the matter.

45606. Then to put another aspect of the charge room proceedings before you. The Inspector, according to the system now in vogue in our Metropolitan Police Force, is I believe in all cases a police officer who has been promoted from the ranks?—That is so.

45608. May I suggest to you that 20 years' experience in the Police Force must leave an impress upon the man's mind, and must tend, must it not, looking at the matter from a common-sense point of view, to give him a kind of professional bias?—I should think it would tend to make him extremely cautious. My experience is that the police are extremely cautious, and that Inspectors are extremely cautious in the way in which charges are taken against people. That is my experience, and I can say nothing more than that.

45610. I was not suggesting that in these cases necessarily any irregularity was committed in any one of them. That is a matter upon which the Commission will pronounce their opinion in due course. I am only pointing out to you that if you look at the evidence in the majority of cases the Inspector does not appear to have examined very elaborately into the statements made by the constable. I do not know that it is his duty, I am not suggesting it is his duty, but my question is only incidental to the one I was putting to you, whether if somebody, say a barrister, were placed in the charge room, or if not a barrister somebody who has a qualification for his office who would be required to have considerable knowledge of law and criminal procedure, would that be an advantage? Please do not take it that I am saying what my own opinion is; I am only giving you the opportunity of expressing yours?—I desire to express my opinion (I have thought over the matter) very emphatically that I think any change of that kind would be a change for the worse—unquestionably for the worse. May I say with regard to that matter I should like to add this, that to a great extent the reason I have found inspectors of the Metropolitan Police Force are the men of the high tone and character they are is, in my opinion, that they have these responsible duties cast upon them in the charge room, and I think if you were to divest them of those duties to any extent you might possibly lower and probably would lower the general character of the discipline existing in the force. I think the possession of those responsible duties is fully impressed upon them, and I think they see the necessity of, so to speak, living up to it. I hope I have made myself clear to the Commission on that point.

Mr. G. P. Taylor.

45611. The consideration that I was suggesting to you was simply this, that the continual performance of the same kind of duty often leads a man to discharge that duty with a lack of freshness and in a perfunctory kind of way?—That is no doubt the consequence of human nature being what it is, and Magistrates themselves are, I should think, probably more liable to the results of that than even police Inspectors.

45612. Passing from that topic, has anybody ever recently complained to you about ill-treatment in the cells or about the condition of the cells at the police station?—It is not an uncommon complaint to have made by a very rough class of persons that they have been roughly handled by the police—not at all an uncommon complaint. I can only say that my experience is that the more ruffianly the prisoner the more likely are you to have the complaint made. Personally I have never found any ground whatever for believing that an assault was committed in the station, either in the charge room or the cells, upon the prisoner in the case. That is my own experience. When I have inquired into it—that is to say, when I have had the Inspector who took the charge placed in the witness box—I have generally found that the people who made the accusation simply refuse to cross-examine him, and very often admit that nothing of the kind occurred.

45613. With regard to bail, are the regulations, in your opinion, satisfactory?—They are. I see nothing to recommend any alteration in. You are referring to the question of bail at the police station?

45614. I am dealing with the whole topic of bail in that general question?—I think so.

45615. I was rather putting it to lead up to this next question: Do prisoners ever complain that their friends whose names they mention as sureties are not sent for with sufficient promptitude, or when they arrive they are kept waiting too long or unduly long?—No, I have never had a complaint of that kind, but I have heard a complaint as to the address to which the constable has gone being false or being wrong, and the explanation of it is generally this, or I have found on inquiry that the explanation in many cases certainly is this, that the wrong name was in the first instance given by the person charged. It may strike the Commissioners as being very odd, but very frequently the persons charged with being drunk and disorderly make a mistake in the number of their own house. If they do that in the case of their own house they do it more naturally in the case of their own friends' houses.

45616. Even in cases where a defendant is not giving a false address he very often blunders as to the name of the street?—That is what I mean.

45617. With regard to medical attendance, have you any improvement on the existing system to suggest?—The Surgeons of the Metropolitan Police with whom I come in contact all strike me as being very competent men. The question of drunkenness is essentially a question for a medical expert, or rather more for him than for anyone else. That is all one cay say.

45618. We have been told, I think, by all your learned colleagues who have been good enough to come before us that there is a practice of annexing a kind of certificate or extract from the Occurrence Book signed by the medical gentleman when he has seen the prisoner?—That is so.

45619. That is attached to the charge sheet?—That is so.

45620. What use is made, according to the practice of your court, of that certificate?—I will tell you exactly how I use it myself. Supposing a person is charged before me with being drunk, and that he or she pleads not guilty, and the only evidence called in support of the charge is the evidence of the police-constable. If I find that the doctor has certified that that person was drunk, I then read out the contents of the certificate to the person who is on her or his trial. Then I say to him or her, "Well, the doctor says he examined you, and that was the conclusion he formed, but you can have the doctor called if you like to bear that out in the witness box—do you desire it or not? If you desire it, I will adjourn the case for the attendance of the doctor, so that you can cross-examine him." I may tell you that my almost invariable experience is that when you make the offer they decline to accept it.

Mr. G. P. Taylor.

45621. I suppose that you will agree the medical certificate, as such, is not evidence in the case?—Certainly. I do not attempt to make it evidence.

45622. Do you look at it before you hear the constable?—No, I do not, although, as a matter of fact, I know it very often exists without knowing its contents. I know it exists, because on the charge sheet or on my register for the purpose of guiding me as to the amount of costs in the particular case in my court—it may not be the case in other courts, but it is in mine—I know the amount of the fee, whether it is 3s. 6d. or 7s. 6d., according to the time the doctor was called to attend to the person, which is inserted so as to guide me as to the amount of costs I have to impose in the event of deciding against the defendant.

45623. So that while you are trying the case of the prosecution you do not in the least know what is in the certificate?—No.

45625. Have you any addition to make to that list of statutory provisions?—No, I have not. It seems to me that they comprise the sections of the various statutes under which these cases are usually presented to the Magistrate.

45626. More than one of your learned colleagues, certainly one of your learned colleagues, told us that sometimes he acted under an old statute that is practically declaratory of the common law, and bound over people. Have you ever had occasion to resort to that?—I think that one has power to bind over under the terms of one's Commission, and it is a very common thing to bind over a person—in fact, in a case of mere disorder that is all you can do—bind over a person to keep the peace.

45627. Do you find any special difficulty in the application of these statutory provisions to a particular case arising from ambiguity of language of the statute or from the very character of the offence itself?—No, I cannot say that I personally have ever found great difficulty in deciding whether the facts before me constituted a breach of the statute or not.

45628. Take drunkenness, do you find much difficulty in coming to a conclusion as to whether you ought to convict or discharge the prisoner on that charge? It is a matter of degree, is it not?—Yes.

45629. Do you think it would be possible to give anything like a clear definition of the drunkenness for which there ought to be a conviction?—I do not think it is possible to give an accurate definition of the exact state—certainly not, and I do not think anybody would say that it is possible.

45630. I am only seeking to elicit your views?—Quite so. What I mean is, I think it a matter for the Magistrate to satisfy himself of after hearing all the evidence, whether or not it is a proper case to convict in.

45632. In the one case it is "riotous or indecent behaviour" and the other the words are "to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers"?—That is the distinction.

45633. What evidence do you accept as primâ facie evidence that the defendant belongs to the class of prostitute or night-walker?—I do not quite understand that question.

45634. I suggest to you that in order to justify a conviction under, say, Sub-section 11 of the 54th Section of the Police Act for solicitation there are three material allegations that the prosecution have to prove —first, that there must be some evidence that the woman belongs to the class of common prostitute or night-walker?—Quite so.

45635. Secondly, that she was loitering in this way at a particular place at a particular time?—Certainly.

45636. And, thirdly, that her conduct was conduct giving rise to annoyance to an inhabitant or to a passenger?—Certainly.

45637. Those are the three material allegations?—Yes.

45638. What primâ facie evidence do you require of the first material allegation that she was a prostitute?—I should require the direct evidence of the constable that she was a prostitute.

45639. Then, of course, you would convict on the evidence of one constable only?—I never convict in any case on what in my view is the entirely uncorroborated evidence of one witness. May I explain what I mean by that, and may I take the case of drunkenness as an instance? If you go into a police court and hear a charge of drunkenness brought against a man, there may be only one constable's evidence to prove it—that is, putting aside the case where a doctor is called. But one must bear this in mind, that you are judging of the condition of the man at the time the charge is made against him, and one knows as part of the ordinary procedure of the charge room that the charge as originally made by the constable must approve itself to the inspector, who is a man of experience in these matters, before he takes the charge. Therefore in one sense even the taking of the charge by the inspector after exercising his discretion constitutes some evidence in support of the constable's statement, and therefore in a case of that kind, although only one constable is called, there is no conviction on the entirely uncorroborated word of a single constable.

45640. Then I understand that you do attach importance to the fact that the inspector has taken the charge?—In a case of that kind I should for this reason, that it depends entirely on what he saw was the condition of the person whose condition is no longer what it was. I have not the same opportunity, as I have not had an opportunity of seeing his condition except in a sober state. The inspector saw it when he was alleged to have been drunk.

45641. Then I will revert to what I was asking. What evidence do you require to make out a primâ facie case that the woman, in the case of Sub-section 11, is a common prostitute?—I should require the direct oath of the constable, and I should require his answer if I cross-examined him upon it or if it was denied, and, of course, once it is denied she is a prostitute I should at once ask him his ground for saying so, and I should require evidence of her being seen continually in the street soliciting men, going to a house of acknowledged ill fame known to be such by the constable, and so on, and I should hold evidence of that kind to be evidence on which her status in life would be ascertained.

45642. With regard to the evidence of loitering, that is the evidence in support of the material allegations of the particular offence, of course there is not much difficulty. What evidence do you require that the inhabitants or passengers have been annoyed?—I should require something more than mere accosting. I do not think a simple "Good-night" hurts anybody. I should require something more in the way of solicitation than that. The evidence I should require to prove annoyance would be persistent solicitation and placing the hand upon the arms of men walking by. That is a very common form of molestation by a disorderly prostitute.

45643. Do you presume that a man is annoyed if a woman places her hand upon his arm?—If the evidence is that he shakes her off with apparent annoyance, and I should say this also, that I should require in a charge under that section, probably in the majority of cases, the evidence of a complaint, but by saying that I do not mean to say I should require the actual evidence of the complainant, because my experience is it is impossible to get men to a police court for the purpose of complaining. No man could ever be expected to come and waste his time in the police court the whole of the morning for the purpose of giving in evidence the fact that the woman in the dock who is charged with soliciting him had put her hand upon his arm and addressed an indecent proposal to him. If it were necessary in all cases to require evidence of that kind you would never be able to convict at all in those cases. But may I say with regard to this question, and it is very important, that at all events in the Marylebone Court, and I believe it is the case in the other police courts in London, it is the practice of the police, and I think it is a very laudable practice, not to charge these women under those sections at all, but to charge them in cases of that kind under Sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act, because in that case it is not necessary to prove that they are prostitutes.

45644. We have been told that that has been the practice at Marlborough Street as well. But how do you bring a solicitation case under that section? The words are: "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." Do you think that the accosting by a woman, even if the accosting is accompanied by a woman placing her hand on a man's arm and his throwing it off, is any evidence of a likelihood of a breach of the peace occurring?—Yes, I think on the evidence that may very likely lead to a breach of the peace, and that is conduct which in a certain class of life does lead to a breach of the peace. I have known cases in which a man has turned round and struck the woman, showing that he was very much annoyed by her solicitation.

45645. In that case there is the evidence of a breach of the peace as well?—Yes.

45646. That is not the case that arises. In one of the cases that we have minutely examined into it was a case of solicitation, if anything, and the charge was made under this Sub-section 13. The only evidence was that one man had rather pulled himself away or thrown off the woman's arm or something of that kind. The Magistrate dismissed the case, but he dismissed it under the First Offenders Act, and it appears in the book as being a dismissal, but in reality it was a conviction and the charge was taken by the inspector under Sub-section 13. I will not read the full details of the evidence, but in substance it comes to that. There was no striking of the woman by any one of the men. I think there were three accostings, and one man turned and walked back, and talked to the woman, and I think it was the third man who was walking her off?—The case that presents itself to my mind is this, that conduct of that kind is likely to breed annoyance in the mind of the person molested, and a condition of annoyance existing in the mind of the person molested is likely to lead eventually to a breach of the peace, and on that ground I think it is a very reasonable way of dealing with a case of that kind.

45647. Do you mean to say that because a man is annoyed that therefore he is likely to be given to use violence to people. I do not want to press you upon the matter?—I do not think that in the majority of cases that would be so, but my opinion is this: It is necessary to deal with this particular class of offence in this way, you must either deal with it under Sub-section 13 or you must deal with it under one of the other sections.

45648. It is expedient that the law should be carried out, is it not. You would not suggest that the Inspector taking the charge should stretch the law at all?—Certainly not.

45649. You have said the reason why cases are brought under Sub-section 13 is the difficulty of proving one of the material allegations under Sub-section 11. itself?—No doubt that is what is in the mind of the police. They say it is safer to charge under Sub-section 13 than it is to charge under Sub-section 11, because in one case it is necessary to prove the woman is a prostitute, and in the other that necessity does not exist. That, no doubt, is what causes the charge to be made under Sub-section 13.

45650. I understand the effect of your evidence is that when the case is a case of accosting by a woman, and the charge is brought under Sub-section 13, you do require evidence from which you infer that a breach of the peace is likely to take place?—I require evidence which goes to show that the woman's conduct would really cause annoyance in the mind of the person molested, and that evidence usually consists of complaints made to the police by men who have been molested by a woman, coupled with some evidence that the police constable has seen the person actually accosted. I should like to say with regard to that point, that, of course, they can only charge persons within the four corners of the Act of Parliament. Those are the only sections of any Act of Parliament under which these persons could be charged. It is necessary, therefore, that they should be charged under one section of the other, unless they are to go unpunished for conduct of that kind, and I can only say that if you were not to apply Sub-section 13 to cases of that kind you would have a very considerable increase of disorder in the streets.

45651. Quite so; but if that liberty of solicitation is accorded by law I do not know, until Parliament has seen fit to alter the law, that the Courts ought to sanction any practice of going beyond the law?—Solicitation in itself is, of course, no offence.

45652. Quite so. You take care, I understand, that the case does come within the words of the section in your judgment?—Yes, that is the view I take. I have no hesitation in taking that view with regard to Section 13, bearing in mind that unqualified solicitation is in itself no offence.

45653. Taking that to be so, do you think the action of the police in recent years in the district in which your Police Court is situated has tended to diminish the number of prostitutes on the streets?—That is a very big question, and I really could not give any answer to it. It is a question involving all sorts of considerations, and I have not paid sufficient attention to it. First of all there is the growth of London in any particular locality to consider. Then you have the increase or decrease in population in a particular locality, and all those questions have to be taken into consideration before you can say that in a particular spot the action of the police has diminished street disorder of that type.

45654. Do you ever have complaints made before you by women that they have been molested by men?—I have never had a single complaint made of that kind. I was very much struck on looking at your memorandum of suggestions to find that point of solicitation of women by men mooted. May I say with regard to the matter of solicitation of women by men, supposing it was an offence which could be dealt with in a police court, in my opinion it can be dealt with in a police court under Sub-section 13 of Section 54. I would put the man and the woman practically on the same footing with regard to that. I think that a man accosting a respectable woman is doing an act which is likely to lead to a breach of the peace, because it might very easily cause the lady to use her umbrella upon him.

45655. The next topic is alleged bribery of constables by prostitutes. Has anything occurred in your Courts, or has any fact come to your notice which leads you to think that bribery of the police by prostitutes is a common or widespread practice?—I have no reason whatever to believe that it is so. I have never heard such a suggestion made in my own Court by a prostitute.

45656. Do constables ever state that money has been offered to them?—I have heard constables state that money has been offered to them—not by prostitutes, but by people in a very different position of life. In fact, I know it is so, because I have had letters from persons saying that they offered money to constables which the constables had refused. But that has nothing to do with the offence of solicitation; it is with regard to people in a different positon of life altogether.

45657. With regard to alleged bribery by street bookmakers, have any proceedings taken place in your Court which led you to suspect that the police constable in that case had been in receipt of money from the bookmaker?—I have never had any ground whatever for believing that in any case before me such was the case; and I should like to say, with regard to that, that considering that Marylebone, at all events before the new Act of Parliament, which has practically killed street bookmaking, was a district which was quite infested with street bookmakers—it was quite a common thing to deal with as many as five or six or even more cases per day during the racing season at Marylebone, irrespective of the summonses—I think it is a singular thing, in view of the fact that the particular offence was so rife in that district that I do not recollect any case where any evidence at all was forthcoming to show that such bribery had taken place. I only recollect one case in the course of my experience there in which it was stated that the police constable was bribed by the man who was then upon his trial. That was on a summons. Of course, anybody can make an accusation of this kind. This man was defended by a solicitor, and I asked the solicitor whether he had any evidence to support it. He had none. The impression I derived from the manner of the defendant on that occasion in making the accusation, and the way the constable repudiated it, was that it was an untrue accusation; but I told the solicitor in that case that if he had any grievance in the matter his duty was to report it to Scotland Yard, and I had no doubt they would make careful inquiries. In my opinion they never spare one of their own men at Scotland Yard. I must say that.

Mr. G. P. Taylor.

45658. It is the duty of the constable who is making the charge, if the charge is taken by the Inspector, to appear in Court to support the charge?—That is so.

45659. How, upon the whole, do the constables discharge their duties as prosecutors, in your opinion?—When you say "as prosecutors," you mean as giving evidence for the prosecution?

45660. When the charge is taken the constable's name appears on the charge sheet as the prosecutor?—Quite so; with regard to this particular class of case. I was thinking of more important cases.

45661. I was coming to the way in which the constables discharge their duty in your Court. Our terms of reference are rather wide, because we have to inquire into the duties of constables in dealing with cases. Part of the duty of a constable, if he makes a charge and the charge is accepted by the Inspector, is to go to the Court and conduct his case?—Yes.

45662. How does he conduct his case as a rule?—I have no cause to complain in any way. I think the cases are well conducted.

45663. Do you think the constable in any reasonable proportion of cases is at a disadvantage because he has not got the skilled assistance of solicitor or counsel?—No, I do not. As you no doubt know in cases of indictable offences, the assistance of the Treasury can always be obtained on the certificate of the Magistrate.

45664. Now I draw the distinction, because assistance is never given in these three classes of cases?—No, not in a simple case of this kind.

45665. Do you think it ought to be more freely given?—No. I do not think the occasion would arise for it in cases of this kind.

45667. We know that there is a Superintendent or Subdivisional Inspector in attendance at the court?—That is so.

45668. Do you allow him to take any part at all in the proceedings?—Nothing beyond arranging the order in which he proposes to call the witnesses if there are several witnesses to call. Beyond that nothing.

45669. He is not permitted by you to examine the witnesses for the prosecution?—Not without asking my permission and obtaining it.

45670. You sometimes do allow it? I am asking you these questions not to suggest there is any irregularity, but because evidence has been given to us by a gentleman from Leeds who told us he thought it would be of the very greatest advantage that the Superintendent should have a regular locus standi as a public prosecutor?—I sometimes do allow him to make suggestions and to put questions. It is not an infrequent practice of mine to allow him to do so in a case where I think it is right.

45671. That is practically the same as your putting questions yourself?—It is.

45672. You would not allow him to put any questions you would not put yourself if they occurred to you?—That is true. Of course he at the same time may be in the possession of knowledge which I am not in possession of at the moment.

45673. Passing from that, what is your practice as to dealing with complaints against the police? First take the case of a complaint made in the course of proceedings that come before you in your court?—My practice is precisely the same as it is with reference to any other complaint; that is to say, if a man applies to me, or were to apply to me—I have only known one case within the last two and a half years at Marylebone where a summons has been applied for against a constable—I treat the application in the same way as I would any other application; I require to know something of the person making the application as a rule, because if one were not to do that one might very often do very substantial injustice in a case, considering the class of persons who have access to a London police court. If the Commissioners were present in a London police court and heard the applications on a Monday morning, they would have an opportunity of seeing the class of persons with whom a Magistrate has to deal, and naturally in a perfectly open court of that kind persons are in a position to come in and to make complaints against a person simply and solely from motives of spite, which will not bear cross-examination at all, and therefore one feels it necessary in cases of that kind, and in all cases, to put some questions to an applicant for the purpose of ascertaining whether his complaint is well founded; but otherwise I treat it just in the same way as any other complaint.

45675. But short of that? Suppose it was not a case for which you could grant a summons. There may be misconduct on the part of a constable which does not necessarily involve an offence for which a summons could be granted?—I see what you mean. If a case of that kind arises in the course of a case that is brought before me, I should direct the attention of the Inspector to it; but my experience is singularly free from anything of that kind really.

45676. Do you ever have occasion to make complaints to the Chief Commissioner of Police?—I never have had occasion to make any complaint to the Chief Commissioner; and I would like, if I may say so, to dissociate myself from what I understand was the view put forward by one of my colleagues, that there was the slightest friction between the Magistrates and the Scotland Yard authorities. Personally, on the few occasions on which I have been brought into contact with the Scotland Yard authorities I have found they treated me with the most perfect courtesy.

45677. (Mr. Dickinson.) As I understand, you have never had to send any complaints to the police authorities?—No, I have never sent a complaint to the police authorities, but I have been consulted by the police authorities occasionally as to the conduct of matters not affecting the public but affecting the court itself, because in our court there are a certain number of persons called warrant officers who are supplied to us by the Scotland Yard authorities, but who while they are in our court are really under the Magistrate and not under Scotland Yard.

45678. But you have never had an instance in which you have had to suggest some course should be adopted by the Commissioner of Police?—No, I have never had occasion to make suggestions of that kind to the Police Commissioner.

45679. All the years you have been a Magistrate I understand what you say is you cannot trace your mind back to any case where a bona-fide complaint has been made by the public against the police of ill-usage or misconduct?—You mean against the police in their capacity as police when on duty?

45680. Against an individual policeman?—That is not quite the same question. I have heard one case at Marylebone in the course of the last year and a half against a constable who was charged with assault in his individual capacity—that is to say, while he was not on duty. He was charged with assault, and I fined him in that case I think 40s. I did not look upon it as a serious case, and in view of the fact that it was an assault committed while he was off duty, and in view of other circumstances in the case—his wife had quarrelled with a woman, and it was in consequence of his taking hotly his wife's side that the assault took place—I suggested to the Inspector on duty that I hoped no serious view would be taken by the Police Commissioner. I understand that no action was taken, but he was simply transferred to another division. That is all I know with regard to that case. But with regard to other cases where charges have been brought against constables for assaults committed in the execution of their duty, in my experience I have known very few such cases, and for the moment I cannot turn my mind back upon any one in particular, though I should think it is probable that in the course of 12 years I have tried cases of that kind.

45681. Those being cases in which accusations have been brought against police-constables and tried before you?—Yes. I am not referring to other cases of a public nature.

45682. Those are cases in which actually the constable has been tried, and in which he has been accused and charged by some private prosecutor?—Yes.

45683. In the other cases in which the police have been prosecuting anybody, if I understand you rightly, you say you cannot call to mind any bona-fide complaint against the police, or, at any rate, any that you thought it worth while to investigate?—In the course of my 12 years as a Magistrate you mean?

45684. Yes?—I cannot call to mind any important case. At the same time I would not pledge myself to the statement that there had been no such case, because my memory may not be sufficiently active to enable me to speak with confidence on that point.

45685. Not of sufficient importance to make you remember it?—No. To the best of my recollection—I can only say that.

45686. I think you said you had pretty often complaints of a vague nature brought against the action of policemen?—Yes, of a vague nature, such as undue violence in taking women to the station. That is a point I have already dealt with with regard to bruises on the arm.

45687. What steps do you take, supposing a person says a constable has knocked him about unduly, to satisfy yourself at all as to how far that is true?—I ask him if he has any witnesses to prove his statement, and I am prepared to hear any witnesses. That is the only possible way I can inquire into it. I say, "Where are your witnesses, and if you have any, call them, and I will ask them questions." Sometimes witnesses are called and sometimes not.

45688. He may not have any witnesses. I presume in most of these cases you have only the police-constable prosecuting and the defendant defending himself?—I think that would be so in most cases, but in a considerable proportion of cases there are witnesses for the defence if it is a case of street disorder, and there are also in a considerable number of charges of drunk and disorderly.

45689. Have you ever had cases in which the man has accepted your challenge, so to speak, and brought a witness?—Oh, yes, and I frequently remand the case for the attendance of witnesses.

45690. Charges of violence against the police?—Yes. Every facility ought to be given to persons who make allegations of that kind to call witnesses, and I have remanded cases from time to time for that purpose.

45691. For the purpose of investigating how far the accusation against the police is true?—Yes, precisely—for the purpose of allowing witnesses to be called who are supposed to be in a position to prove the allegations made by the defendant.

45692. Do you say that in all those cases you were satisfied the accusation was ill-founded?—As I say, I cannot pledge myself to the fact that at no time during my experience have I found the reverse. All I can say is this, that I cannot at the present time recollect any such case.

45693. I suppose you are under the impression, from your experience, that those cases were ill-founded?—That certainly is so. I have a strong view on that point certainly, but I say I will not pledge myself to the fact that I never have found the reverse. All I can say is I cannot recollect a case of that kind.

45694. I want to ask you with regard to what you said about not accepting the evidence of one constable unless there is some kind of corroboration given. I suppose I am right in saying that in the great majority of the cases before you the only man who can speak to the circumstances is a policeman?—No, that is not so. Policemen, but not one policeman. There are several cases, for instance, in which I think the police would have great diffidence in putting forward a charge on the evidence of a single constable. May I give you an illustration?

45695. I was under the impression (I may be wrong) that the majority of those cases were dealt with on the evidence of one policeman?—I am not prepared to say the majority are dealt with on the evidence of one policeman. I should think a very considerable proportion are dealt with on the evidence of more than one policeman. May I give you an illustration where I should not accept the evidence of one policeman, and where I think the officers would hesitate to put forward a charge on the evidence of a single policeman? Take the charge of indecency against a man. Only the other day I had a case of that sort in my court at Marylebone. A man was charged with indecent exposure of his person at night to girls who were, I think, in a hospital, and the evidence was to the effect that he had been seen on other occasions doing the same thing. I put it to the inspector who had the case in hand, "How is it that he was not charged before?" His answer to me was, I thought, a very proper one. He said, "Because on these other occasions we had not the evidence of more than one constable"; that is to say, the act which constituted the indecent exposure had not been witnessed on those occasions by more than one constable at a time, and, as he said to me, "I should be very chary indeed of making a charge of this kind against a man on the evidence of a single witness." On this particular occasion, in consequence of what took place before, they posted two constables to keep observation, and it was then that they caught him.

Mr. G. P. Taylor. 8 May 1907.

45696. That was very proper in a case like that; but we are dealing with cases of disorder in the streets and charges of being drunk and disorderly in the streets. Do you say in those cases you have the evidence of two policemen?—In a case of serious disorder the police very often call more than two, especially in cases where there are two or three persons charged together.

45697. In the ordinary drunk and disorderly case which you have on a Monday morning, do you have the evidence of two policemen?—In a great many cases the charges are joint charges. Two men are charged together, or a man and a woman, and in those cases you have the evidence of at least two constables, because, of course, one constable has to take a single prisoner to the police station.

45698. When you have a case brought in, and there is only one policeman, do you hesitate to convict?—Yes, I would certainly, subject to what I said with regard to the question of drunkenness.

45699. We are on the question of drunkenness?—On the question simply of being drunk.

45700. But when it is drunk and disorderly?—With regard to being drunk, I have present to my mind that the man has been seen by the Inspector at the time when the man is alleged to be drunk, and therefore in a different condition to that in which he is when I see him, and I think that is an element of corroboration of the constable's evidence which I ought not to overlook, and therefore I do not look on cases of that kind as being cases where the evidence of the constable is entirely uncorroborated.

45701. Do you really accept it as corroboration against the man without calling the Inspector?—I always offer to call the Inspector if the man desires it. I may say this with regard to that. Continually I put it to a man who is charged with being drunk, and who says he was not drunk, and I point out to him that the Inspector took the charge. I continually offer him the presence of the Inspector to prove it, and I may tell you that in a great majority of cases they refuse the offer. In cases where they accept it, they almost invariably refuse to cross-examine the Inspector when he is in the box, but I continually or frequently put cases back for the presence of the Inspector until the afternoon, because he is not on duty in the morning.

45702. Have you had cases where the person accused has protested and has asked you to see the Inspector?—I have never known of a case where he has carried his point successfully through, or where, on the Inspector being called, his evidence was anything but damaging to the defendant. Although it may be difficult, perhaps, to impress it upon you, still, knowing, as one knows, the class of persons that one has to deal with in connection with these cases, it is very unlikely that men in that particular class of life, against whom an accusation has been made, will admit it. In the great majority of cases, or in a great number of cases, they are old offenders, and the older offender very often the more trouble you have with him, and the more ready he is to make accusations against the police.

Mr. J. P. Taylor.

45703. Do you take the same line with regard to women. I did not understand the Chairman's question to that extent. You have told us that you require evidence that the woman is a prostitute, and has been seen from time to time carrying on her trade. In order to ascertain that, do you accept the evidence of one policeman alone?—If the question is seriously disputed I should probably require the evidence of more than one, but I may tell you that that is a question which, in my experience, very seldom arises. May I say, with regard to this question of solicitation, and the question of the difficulty of proving a person to be a prostitute, the difficulties in connection with those questions arise very much in consequence of the particular district in London where the charge may be made. For instance, I never found these questions arise in Marylebone. I have had no experience of Marlborough Street, or of some other districts, but it may be that in those other districts you are dealing with a different class of persons, and it may be that which gives rise to these difficulties. Speaking from my own experience as a Magistrate, in Marylebone they never arise at all, but the matter goes through as smoothly as possible.

45704. When you told the learned Chairman that you thought all these Acts of legislation were sufficient, is there anything in the section with regard to prostitution which you think is unsatisfactory?—I understand what is passing in your mind is this, that the application of Sub-section 13, as it is applied at present at certain police courts, is rather an undue straining of the language of the Statute to bring such conduct as I have described within the meaning of that section, but, as I say, you must deal with the law as it stands, and that is a convenient way, it seems to me, of dealing with that particular class of case.

(Chairman.) It so happens that while you have been giving evidence my attention has been called to the proof of the next witness we propose to call, and that refers to a case which was before you?—When was that?

45705. In 1900. I do not suppose for a moment you will remember it, but I have one question to ask you about it. In 1900 a woman named Ruth Tillman was fined by Mr. Paul Taylor at Southwark Police Court for keeping a brothel at 2, Howley Place. This woman, whilst a policeman was watching a house, offered to bribe him, and was charged on June 20th with the offence (i.e., obstructing him whilst in the execution of his duty), and was fined 40s. or one month?—I have not the remotest recollection of it.

45706. Would the fact of offering money to a policeman be accepted by you as sufficient evidence of obstructing the constable in the execution of his duty?—Primâ facie, I should say certainly not, but at the same time I am put in a very awkward position with regard to that question, because there may be a record of my own conviction against me. I have not the slightest recollection of the case.

45707. Of course, it is impossible to carry in your mind all the cases that occurred some years ago?—At present I should be disposed to say certainly not; I do not think I should. But I am not prepared to answer the question without further consideration. I have no recollection whatever of the case, and, as at present advised, I cannot understand it.

45708. (Mr. Dickinson.) One of the suggestions Mr. Plowden made was that there might be greater latitude allowed in adjourning a charge when it was brought in instead of its being sent at once before the Magistrate. Do you think there would be any advantage in that?—I have already expressed my opinion that there would be no advantage in connection with it, and, in my opinion, there would be an objection. I think, to allow a charge to remain over for some time while the Inspector was arriving at a conclusion in the matter would be a course that would be subject to very much graver inconveniences than the inconveniences at present. With regard to the suggestion which is supposed to have been made by Mr. Plowden, as to hearing cases in camera, I hope the Commissioners will understand, if Mr. Plowden made that suggestion, that I entirely dissent from it under any circumstances.

45709. (Chairman.) The Commissioners are much indebted to you for your attendance here, and for your valuable evidence?—I am very much obliged to you.

The Rev. Frederick Brotherton Meyer, sworn.

Rev. F. B. Meyer.

45710. (Chairman.) You are a Bachelor of Arts, and the Minister of Christ Church, Westminster Bridge Road?—I am.

45711. You are ex-President of the Free Church Federation, President of the Baptist Union, and President of the Central South London Free Church Council?—Quite so.

45712. A proof of the evidence which you are prepared to give us has been sent to the Secretary of this Commission?—Yes.

45713. I have read the proof, and I find that a good deal of it contains statistics and other information about the efforts of the police to suppress disorderly houses. That is going beyond our terms of reference, and I do not propose to ask you any details about that matter. I understand that in the capacity of President of the Central South London Free Church Council you have been for twelve years working with the view of dealing with the suppression of immorality in central South London?—Certainly.

45714. For the reasons I have expressed, I am not going into the details of the work you have done in conjunction with, I think, the Borough Council lately?—Quite so.

45715. But I will ask you this general question: Has your work brought you considerably in contact with members of the Metropolitan Police Force?—Weekly—constantly.

45716. Have you found that the members of the Metropolitan Police Force have been of efficient service to you in the cause which you have been prosecuting?—I can put it stronger than that. Really the cause would have greatly failed without their active co-operation, for the prosecutions have been initiated and really carried through by the police force.

45717. I suppose you have also been brought into contact with all classes of persons during your work?—Yes, with some of the lowest people in the Metropolis—with people of the most degraded character.

45718. Have you ever heard in any quarter that abandoned women habitually bribe the police, or that the police endeavour to blackmail them in any way?—I have heard promiscuous charges of that sort, but my experience has gone to contradict that—it has gone entirely in the other direction.

45719. Forming the best judgment you can form after having had now very considerable experience in the matter, you do not think such bribery is widespread?—As far as my own district is concerned I should say the police have resisted any attempts to bribe them.

45720. I think the greater part of your work has been to assist in taking proceedings against disorderly houses. That is the main portion of the work done by your association, is it not?—Quite so.

45721. I mean your work has not been the rescuing of these unfortunate women from their lives?—That is not specifically mentioned here, but I have got private people of my own who are always rescuing women, and we have never had a charge made by any of the girls against the police; and police officers are willing to co-operate with the people that I employ. I must say that the police have been extremely humane and kind in the treatment of children found in the brothels.

45722. Then there is no reason why I should not put to you the question which I put to the learned Police Magistrate who is now on the Bench. Do you think that the police in cases of solicitation discharge their duties with honesty, discretion, and efficiency?—I think certainly they have done so. Of course, the agitation which has lately been set on foot has been very prejudicial to the police, I mean the general rumours that have been in vogue, and therefore I do not know at all what effect those rumours have had on them, but, as far as my observation goes, which carries me up to the last month or six weeks, they have been very straight and strong in their dealings.

45723. Have any cases ever come under your notice in which the police have resisted attempts to corrupt them by money?—There is one case of a notorious thief who is mentioned in the Schedule who attempted to bribe a police officer, but he took action against the woman.

45724. Is that the case of Ruth Tillman in 1900, referred to in the last page of your proof?—Yes. It was before Mr. Paul Taylor. That was the case I was referring to.

45725. According to your recollection the constable himself took action against the woman, and she was fined by Mr. Paul Taylor for obstructing the constable whilst in the execution of his duty, the evidence being that she had offered him money?—I believe that was so.

45726. Have any other cases come under your notice?—I do not remember any just now. I should like to make a general observation, if I might.

45727. If you please?—Repeatedly we have recommended constables to Scotland Yard for promotion for the most efficient service they have rendered, and because of my high opinion of their integrity of character, and I should not have gone out of my way to do that unless I had been absolutely satisfied.

45728. (Mr. Dickinson.) I understand from your evidence that the offence of solicitation in the streets has been diminishing in recent years?—Greatly.

45729. And that you attribute to the action of the police as far as those charges are concerned?—Yes, in diminishing the number of brothels, and in dealing with cases of solicitation. Certainly my district of Lambeth is very much clearer at night than ever it was when I first went there.

45730. Do you attribute that to the active work of the police?—I think so, certainly, and I think the police have been encouraged by the fact that they feel that a number of Christian men were backing them up, as it were, and were in sympathy with them. I do not know but what they would have done their duty equally well apart from that; still it has been a great moral help to the police, and I hold that if more Christian people did that kind of thing it would be of great benefit to the community.

Rev. F. B. Meyer.

45731. Do you happen to know whether the police have difficulties in carrying out the law?—They not infrequently incur the risk of personal injury, especially in dealing with some of these brothel cases.

45732. I am dealing now with cases of women in the streets?—No, I am not aware of any.

45733. The police have never told you that they have a difficulty?—No, not that I know of.

45734. Do you know at all whether their more active work inflicts any hardship on the women?—I think it would have done, unless we had had the rescue work going on pari passu with the destruction of the brothel system. No women need go wrong, because a helping hand was reached out to all such. One has always great sympathy with the women themselves, and one desires to help them in every way, and one has done a great deal in that way with the help of the Salvation Army and other such agencies.

(Chairman.) Thank you, Mr. Meyer. The Commission are much indebted to you.

(Witness.) Thank you.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Might I suggest with regard to that fine for obstruction by Mr. Paul Taylor which has been referred to, that there is this possible view of it. If a constable is watching a brothel, and a woman comes and puts her hand over his eyes, that is clearly obstruction, for it prevents him performing his duty; but if, instead of that, she gives him a £5 note to look the other way, is it not equally obstruction?

(Chairman.) I have no doubt you would argue most ingeniously that it was, and you might convince some tribunals.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think possibly Mr. Paul Taylor in 1900 took the view which I am expressing now.

(Chairman.) I think there is a great deal in your argument, but do not think that I am admitting it.

FIFTY-FIRST DAY.

Monday, 13th May 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
WILLOUGHBY HYETT DICKINSON, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. St. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Colonel Sir C. E. HOWARD VINCENT, K.C.M.G., C.B., A.D.C., M.P., sworn.

45735. (Chairman.) You are a Knight Commander of the Order of St. Michael and St. George, Companion of the Bath, and Aide-de-Camp to His Majesty, and you have been a Member of Parliament for Sheffield since 1885?—Yes.

45736. You were trained for the Army, but subsequently became a member of the Bar, joining the South-Eastern Circuit and the Surrey Sessions?—Yes. I was five years in the Army, and have subsequently been a Captain in the Militia, and have commanded for many years big battalions of Metropolitan Volunteers.

45737. In addition to your qualification as a barrister in England, you also, I think, were entered at the Paris Faculté de Droit?—Quite so.

45738. I think you practised for some time, and then I think you were appointed, upon the recommendation of the Home Office Committee that sat in 1877, to Scotland Yard?—Yes.

45739. That was on March 4th, 1878?—Yes.

45740. And you became what was then called the Director of Criminal Investigations?—Quite so.

45741. What was the purpose of your department?—To reorganise the Detective Department and the administration of the criminal law by the Metropolitan Police.

Colonel Sir C. E. H. Vincent, K.C.M.G., C.B., A.D.C., M.P.
13 May 1907.

45742. In that capacity you founded the Criminal Investigation Department on April 6th, 1878, and you proceeded to organise the criminal system which with some slight alterations still prevails?—Yes.

45743. As I understand, the post of Director of Criminal Investigations was incorporated in that of an Assistant Commissioner when you resigned your office of Director in the year 1884?—Quite so.

45744. And the duties that you formerly discharged are now discharged by Mr. Leslie Macnaghten as an Assistant Commissioner, with Mr. Bullock as Chief Constable?—Yes.

45745. And Messrs. Kirchner, Froest, and Leach as Superintendents?—Yes.

45746. During the years from 1878 to 1884 you were, of course, engaged in the active discharge of your duties, and in the discharge of those duties came in close touch with every grade of the police and with all kind of work discharged by the Metropolitan Police Force?—Yes, the whole of the duties of the Metropolitan Police with the exception of the preservation of order.

45747. So I may take it that you obtained a very close personal acquaintance with the police system of London?—I think so.

45748. But I understand you also took advantage of opportunities of becoming acquainted with the police systems of all the principal capitals of Europe?—Not only of Europe, but of the world. I have had the opportunity of examining personally every police system there is.

45749. You have, I understand, taken care to keep your knowledge of the various systems up to date, so to speak?—I have always been in close communication with every change and with the chief officers of the police as they have been appointed.

45750. May I take it, then, that you have at the present moment a very close acquaintance with the way in which the Metropolitan Police Force has recently been discharging and is discharging its functions?—Living as I do most of the year in London, I have constant opportunities of observation.

45751. Perhaps you would kindly tell us what you consider to be the duties of the police under the three heads of our terms of reference, which I understand have been sent to you?—Yes. In my opinion, under the three heads of drunkenness, disorderly conduct, and solicitation in the streets, the first duty is to preserve public order; the second, to prevent larceny, crime, and damage to property; the third, to secure individual freedom from annoyance or violence; and, fourth, to prevent flagrant immorality.

45752. Can you tell us what your opinion is as to the way in which these duties as a whole are discharged?—In my opinion the duties as a whole are discharged with such discretion and such honesty and efficiency as to command the approval of the public and the admiration of every foreign visitor.

45753. Have you any qualification to make to that statement?—It is of course only natural that in a force which is very nearly 18,000 strong, and with a population of between six and seven millions of people and tens of thousands of strangers, a large proportion of whom are bent on pleasure or amusement, occasional mistakes and errors of judgment are inevitable.

45754-5. Would you like to add anything further to that observation?—No, I do not think my view of that could be so well expressed as it was by Sir William Harcourt when he was Home Secretary, if I might be allowed to read what he said on a public occasion. "When we consider the temptations to which the police are exposed, none perhaps greater than the hardships they have to encounter in the withering blasts of a wintry night, it is to my mind not so surprising that they should sometimes go astray, but it is marvellous how seldom. Their work is done with a fidelity and a diligence and a discipline which are the admiration of all who take the trouble to make themselves acquainted with it."

45756. To what do you chiefly attribute such mistakes as do occur, to which you have referred in your preceding answer?—I think they are chiefly due to ignorance and deficient and defective theoretical knowledge and practical experience. This would be proved to a large extent by the considerable number of young constables of short service who get involved in difficulties, who are the victims of assault, compared with those of more experience.

45757. Have you anything to say with regard to the training of police recruits?—Yes. When I was at Scotland Yard I considered that the training of police recruits, limited as it was then to elementary drill and patrolling in company with an old constable who more often than not taught him the objectionable tricks of the beat, was very defective and very inadequate. On the other hand, the young constable anxious to do right of course could go and ask the Station Inspector or his sergeant his opinion upon what his action should be on any moot point or under any given circumstances, and it is only natural to suppose that the answer was not always very encouraging to the police student.

45758. Is the system of training recruits the same now as it was in the years when you were closely connected with the Force?—No. I understand that considerable improvement was made under the directions of Sir Edward Bradford, the late Commissioner, and still further improvement made under the instructions of Sir Edward Henry, the present Commissioner of Police for the metropolis. But I should venture to urge the Royal Commission to inquire for themselves upon this point, and to inquire of the Commissioner if he has ample funds at his disposal for the purpose, and, if it would be possible for the Royal Commission to do so, I should recommend them personally to see what was the system of theoretical instruction.

45759. (Mr. Whitmore.) Theoretical, not practical?—"Practical" would be impossible, but theoretical instruction would very largely enter into such practical instruction as was possible to be given without the actual cases and prisoners being before the Commission. I may say that I am very strongly of opinion that it would be an advantage to the whole country if a school of police instruction could be established, under the direction of the Metropolitan Police and of the Home Secretary, to which recruits or members of provincial forces could be attached, if the local authorities so desired, on payment of a moderate fee which would cover the expenses. I may say that last Thursday I gave an address upon the subject of "the training of young constables" to the Chief Constables' Association which met at the Mansion House here in London, at which many Chairmen of Watch Committees were present, and the idea was very favourably received indeed. It was not wholly endorsed, as it was only laid before them in sketch, but it was very favourably received indeed, it being understood, of course, that it would only be optional on the part of the local officers. There would be no compulsion in the matter at all. What you want to arrive at is the best theoretical instruction you can have for the men in the interests of the public and the greatest uniformity of system.

45760. (Chairman.) With regard to the range of the theoretical instruction what is your view? I ought to say that Sir Edward Henry, in his evidence before us, did refer to want of education among recruits as being among the difficulties of properly manning the force. He pointed out that there are so many conditions required for an ideal constable. That was the substance of what he was saying, and then he pointed out that in addition to physique and instruction with regard to their duty as constables there was considerable need for raising the general educational standard of recruits. Do you contemplate that as within the scope of your proposed instruction school?—Yes, I should certainly do that as far as it was possible, and although it would be somewhat costly, taking three months at least, or even more, of a constable's time, I am sure the public would be gainers and get good value for their money. The best police recruits perhaps are men from the country unacquainted with town tricks, and although elementary education has made immense progress, it is common knowledge that from 14 onwards it goes back instead of forward, and that you find many men of great physique, probably much developed by the cultivation of games and so on, are perhaps the worst from an educational point of view. Therefore their theoretical education becomes of more importance.

45762. I was coming to the question of the use of language. There seems room for considerable raising of the standard among the police officers with regard to that?—That is so.

45763. The capacity, for instance, for narrating a series of events?—That is so, and that is really a matter of instruction, forming the order of the mind in order to trace certain events, and to put the narrative upon paper. But I should like to guard myself in this matter by saying this, that it is not always the best educated man who is the best policeman. Defective education is one of the great difficulties as regards promotion, and so on.

45764. (Mr. Whitmore.) From what class are the constables drawn?—They are drawn from all classes, but perhaps the invariable experience is that the agricultural labourer really turns eventually into the best policeman. Perhaps the worst is a man who has come from domestic service. But, however, it is difficult to lay down any hard-and-fast rule.

45766. I now come to a topic on which we feel that your evidence will be of the very highest value, and that is as to the Instruction Book—I am using the word "instruction" now, of course, as referring to the technical instructions and directions to the constables. I refer to the White Book which you know, of course?—I do not know it under that name. I knew a book, it was not "white," and which was called the Instruction Book in my time, but it did not instruct at all. The instruction was conspicuous by its absence.

45767. The book I hold in my hand is entitled "Instruction Book for the Government and Guidance of the Metropolitan Police Force," and the edition I have is 1900. Was there any book of that kind in use when you were connected with the Force?—Yes, there was a book, but it was a book more of regulations. Mr. Dickinson has kindly handed me a copy of the White Book, and I open it quite at haphazard. I find on the page I have opened "Duties of Chief Surgeon." That has nothing to do with the ordinary constable in the street. He does not care about the Chief Surgeon, except when he goes before him for his pension. There is considerable improvement no doubt in this book compared with what was contained in the old book, because the old book was so deficient. In 1881 I wrote the Police Code under the authority of the Home Office. It has been kept as far as it can be up to date, and has been adopted, I believe, by nearly every English-speaking police force. I have tried to make it as general as possible, and not to go in for the internal regulations of either the Metropolitan Police or any other police force; but adopting general principles and setting out police functions in every conjuncture under the law. The fourteenth edition of that Police Code was issued the other day, and I believe a copy has been submitted to this Royal Commission. It goes through about 2,500 copies a year. That would give an idea of the large extent to which it is in use. To show how much these duties change, the twelfth edition was issued only two years ago, and there would be about 40 pages of additional matter in the new edition, or matter altered very considerably.

45768. What has struck me personally about it is that your Police Code is an easy book of reference?—I am very much obliged to you, Sir.

45769. I found it much more easy to find what the policeman's duty with regard to any conjuncture in that book than in the White Book as issued. I am making that statement partly by way of expressing my thanks to you and also with a view of leading up to the question whether you have any criticism to make upon the arrangement of this White Book—whether the book that is handed by the Commissioner to the police constable for his use and instruction ought not to be better arranged?—I should not like to criticise any document that is issued under the instructions of any of my successors, but what I think is wanted is a book which is for use by the constable, and another book which would be for the use of superior officers. I find a number of things in this White Book referring to what we call in the House of Commons legislation by reference, which irritates the ordinary constable and the man of moderate education. He wants to know what he can do under circumstances which he is face to face with at that moment, or which he saw yesterday on his beat in case they should again arise—he does not want an enormous number of sections which have to do with the Commissioner's office, the Superintendent's office, the Inspector's, the Magistrates' Clerks, the Gaolers, the Coroners' officers, etc. What I always aim at, somewhat imperfectly I am afraid, is to try and endeavour to give something and nothing more, of what he should do absolutely in every case which may arise. For instance, the discovery of a body, the report of a larceny, the call of a householder to eject his servant, or whatever it may be—that the constable should know absolutely what to do under the circumstances.

45770. Do you think the substance of the regulations contained in the book as to the duties of the constables is satisfactory?—I should think no doubt it is; but without much more careful reading I am not able to say. Here I notice three pages about coroners. The constable A.B. who has just joined the force is not likely to become a Coroner, and he does not care much what the Coroner's duties are, except that he knows he has to give notice to the Coroner's officer under certain circumstances, but it is harrassing and troubling to his mind to give him three pages upon the duties of the Coroner.

45771. The sort of regulation or instruction I had in my mind was an instruction as to how to apprehend a person and when to use the truncheon, and so forth?—Yes, exactly. Taking the case of a murder, for instance, I should like to refer to page 157 of the fourteenth edition of the Police Code, in which I lay down absolutely point by point what the constable should do on having a murder reported to him and being brought face to face with the dead body.

45772. Do I understand you to suggest that the same might be done with regard to the duties of a constable in cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets?—My opinion on that is very strong. I should say that not only the present Commissioner but previous Commissioners have given me most generous help in bringing the various editions of the Police Code up to date. They have referred it to the executive branch, and I could not have brought it up to date without their kind assistance.

45773. I am looking at the heading "Drunken persons" in the Police Code. The substance of what you say seems very much the same as that which is contained in the white book?—Yes, that would be so, but my notion is not to give any more than is necessary for the individual. I ought to say that this Police Code is a boiling down of a much larger edition which I had, but which I found was too large for the purpose, and frightened the constable rather than helped him.

45774. Do you think that the Police Code is largely read by constables in the Metropolitan Police Force?—It evidently is, because they buy it themselves, and, as I say, the sale is over 2,000 copies a year. Of course, I do not know exactly who are the purchasers of it, but it evidently is so.

45775. Now, coming to particular points, what have you to say about the way in which arrests of persons are effected in London?—I have seen arrests probably in every country in the world, and I think the arrests in London are made more quietly and with more humanity than in any other country. I am quite sure that the system which is in force here of having men of great physique has a beneficial effect, because they see at once that resistance would in all probability be useless. The moral effect of a man of great stature and physical force is very large indeed. We see that in other countries, for instance, in Paris, where I am very intimately acquainted with the whole system and with the very able Prefect of Police, M. Lepine, the difficulty of finding men of stature is very great. They have small men, and these small men, having less confidence in their physical power, and their own strength, are very apt to endeavour to strike awe into the people they arrest by extremely rough methods. The moral effect of stature is very considerable I am convinced.

45776. As to the use of the truncheon, do you recollect any case in which the police have improperly used their truncheons, or any complaints that they have done so?—Oh, yes. I have known cases where truncheons have been improperly used no doubt; but, of course, it is much more easy to judge of the improper use of the truncheon at a distance and long after the event, than face to face with all the excitement and all the rough and tumble of the circumstances of the moment. There have been no doubt cases, but, on the whole, the truncheon is exceedingly seldom used, and I think perhaps I might tell the Commission this, that other police of other countries all have a revolver, and some have a sword as well, but our police only have the truncheon, which is at most a very inferior weapon except at close quarters. I think that rural police might have a stick, and the companionship of a dog would be a great advantage. At one time, about twenty-five years ago, murders and attempted murders of police were very frequent. There were about six or seven cases in one year, and I took a vote of all the police going on duty on several days through the stations, as to whether under the circumstances they would like to have a pistol themselves, and although there were a few of the young men who answered in the affirmative the very large majority of the men of experience said "On no account." They thought it would be both dangerous to themselves individually, and might involve them in severe cases of improper use, besides trials for murder that one could not think of making the change at all.

45777. We have had one or two complaints that persons after arrest and after being taken to the police station, have been kept waiting for their friends or their sureties to bail them out. What have you to say about the arrangements for communicating from one station to another station in London?—I think as London is about fifty years behind the United States, for instance, in the use of telephones so the police and public authorities in the country are many years also behind the general community in the use of the telephone. I think all electrical appliances and apparatus might be used to a much greater extent than they are. At the present time in New York, for instance, upon every beat there are a number of telephone calls, and the constable on the beat communicates with the head Precint Station by telephone or the head station communicates to the constable on the beat by telephone. That enables knowledge of a crime or a mob or a riot to be circulated very rapidly throughout the whole force, and it also enables the constable on the beat to telephone very rapidly, or to get somebody to telephone for assistance. In five minutes in New York a patrol waggon would come along, motor driven, which would take the prisoner to the station without any fuss or bother, without any hostile crowd at his heels. It is a very much better method than dragging a man through the streets with a mob after him. In Liverpool something of the same sort has been adopted, and in the City of London—not in the Metropolitan Police District—to-day or to-morrow something approaching the American system is to be instituted. Perhaps I may be allowed to give this caution. The Fire Brigade Committee of the London County Council have established fire alarms, and there has undoubtedly been a great deal of trouble with false alarms. The magistrates have now happily taken to imposing heavy fines of £20 for a false fire alarm, yet, as Mr. Dickinson knows, the London County Council have a great deal of trouble in connection with this matter, and I have no doubt that has alarmed the Metropolitan Police lest the same mischievous spirit should give them and the public great annoyance.

45779. (Chairman.) We have had three or four cases coming from one district alone in which complaints have been made by the prisoners of unduly rough treatment and assaults by police constables. We have been told with reference to the localities from which those complaints come that there is a good deal of what is ordinarily called hooliganism there—in fact, we have made the acquaintance of some young men who have been—perhaps I can hardly describe them as habitual criminals, but many of them or some of them have been convicted more than once or twice. Have you any recommendation to make as to the method of putting down hooliganism and dealing with that class of young man, larrikin, or call him what you like, who infests the streets and annoys the passers by, the tradesmen, and so on, and comes in conflict with the police?—There are two ways only in which, in my opinion, it can be dealt with. The first is by severer punishment on the part of the Magistrates. If there is violence then there should be the dread of the lash. Secondly, there should be ignorance as to the police force in a particular district on the particular night which the hooligan gang has selected. I have always been in favour of flying brigades, that is this district to-night and that district to-morrow, indicated only by a telephonic message from the Chief Commissioner as to which district they are to go to. That district should be filled with police. I did it with the plain clothes men of the Detective Department, and always with great advantage. I would fill a whole district with plain clothes men (they were called plain clothes patrols) on this and that occasion, and it was attended with considerable advantage. I think something of the kind might be done. But I ought to say that this hooliganism is giving very great trouble in Paris at the present moment. They are called Apaches in Paris, and the Prefect has been in great difficulty in dealing with the matter. I see, for instance, in to-day's papers there was a fire in Paris and these Apaches actually cut the hose. They are giving infinite trouble, and they are more violent than the hooligans over here owing to the lamentable custom of carrying a pistol or a dagger.

45781. In your experience, do you think that constables often arrest people when they ought to proceed by summons?—No doubt that is the case, but, of course, a summons is useless unless you know the person to be summoned, and unless you know that the name and address he gives is accurate. Of course, the general tendency of mankind would be, when asked for their names and addresses perhaps rather abruptly under the circumstances of the moment by the police-constable, to answer in a hesitating manner, or to say something entirely different to the real truth, or something of that sort, and therefore the constable is often in great difficulty. But at the station the tendency has been more and more to give bail. But bail, of course, can only be given after inquiry, and if I may take the Commission through the steps which would be necessary, the prisoner is brought in, the Inspector thinks this is a case for bail, and says, "Your name and address?" Then that must be verified. How is it verified? It is done by the Morse system of the telegraph, first to Scotland Yard, the central station, to communicate with, say, the R Division: "Ascertain if Thomas Smith lives at 14, Hackney Road," or something of that sort. I am merely giving an imaginary case. "Find out what he is and if he is a respectable man, and if he can be bailed." Now, of course, that depends on the line being free and on a constable being at the station, say, in the R Division ready to go, and having to get there on his feet, because cabs would not be tolerated in the expenses, and it would be looked upon as an undue charge. He had to find the people out who can inform him, or perhaps the information is not very satisfactory, and it may take twenty minutes or half an hour. He has to get back to the station, and the whole thing has to be telegraphed back again, the line has to be clear so that that involves a matter which under the most favourable circumstances could not be much under two hours. Considering the magnitude of the Metropolis and the enormous number of duties the police have to perform, I do not consider that is too long under the circumstances.

45782. With regard to the proceedings in the charge room, do you consider that they are conducted, as a rule, in London properly and in a satisfactory manner?—Of course, whenever I have been in a charge room, which is very often, the proceedings have been conducted in a very satisfactory manner, and I think, on the whole, I have never heard any serious complaint on the matter. Of course, the real difficulty comes with the howling mob, with everybody trying to see what is up, and pushing in on this excuse and that excuse. In a sensational case, say, in Piccadilly, or anything of that sort, there is more excitement than there ought to be perhaps, and it does not proceed with the decorum and the quietude of a Court of Justice, but so far as the Inspector can do it I think he maintains extremely good order, and conducts the business exceedingly well.

45783. What do you think the duty of the Inspector in charge is now? I am limiting myself to cases within our terms of reference—drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation?—His duty is, first of all, to inquire into the circumstances under which the arrest was made, whether he thinks there was a primâ-facie justification for the action of the constable in making the arrest and bringing the individual to the station. Of course, with regard to drunkenness his first duty would be to ascertain whether it is really a case of drunkenness and not of illness. There have been so many severe examples given, so many repeated warnings, that the Police Inspectors are very particular in that way. If there is any remote case of illness they send at once for the Divisional Surgeon.

45784. I take it the first duty of the Inspector may be summed up by saying it is his duty to see whether he ought to take the charge or not?—Yes, that is exactly the case, and to do that, of course, a preliminary inquiry from the constable and the individual is necessary.

45785. And if he comes to the conclusion that he ought to take the charge, then, of course, the prisoner is detained until bail is given, and if no bail is forthcoming or he is not let out on his own recognisances, he is brought to the Police Court the following morning?—Yes, quite so.

45786. Have you any alteration of that system to suggest? Do you think it would be expedient to enlarge the powers of the Inspector in any way or to give the powers of the Inspector to another class of public servant?—I should be very much against giving it to any other class of public servant. I think it would lead to a great deal of difficulty in the station itself. It would produce a new grade, and it would also, I think, be distrusted by the public. The rule which has always prevailed, I think as a whole, is that when an arrest has been made, except under very exceptional circumstances indeed, the Magistrate alone should have the power of dismissing the charge, because, of course, any individual arrested by a constable has a right of action against that individual, and the absolute independence of the Police and Magistrates' functions I believe to lie at the very root of the liberty prevailing in this country.

45787. I think you have told us that you know the system of the foreign capitals. Would you kindly tell us what is the system in vogue now in Paris? Supposing a man is arrested on one of the boulevards on the ground that he is drunk and disorderly, and he is taken to the police station. What takes place there? Before whom does the gendarme or sergeant de ville bring him?—In a serious case in all probability he would be taken before a Commissaire of Police. The Commissaire of Police occupies an extraordinary position. He is a civil officer under the Minister of Justice and he is a police officer under the Prefect of Police. He occupies a most anomalous position, and he has, of course, very large powers, but it is not a necessity that the prisoner should be taken before the Commissaire at all. He may be marched straight to the depot or straight to the local station and then to the depot, which is in the centre of Paris, where he is herded with a number of others, and is eventually, not necessarily within any definite lapse of time, brought before the Court which has to deal with that particular case.

45788. Do you remember the name of that Court under the Code de Procedure?—There are so many different Courts. It is so varied. There is first the Court of first instance, and so on, and it would be difficult to say what that Court would be called.

45789. I did not want to trouble you with the details of the Paris system, but I only wanted to know what took place at the station or depot when the prisoner so charged with being drunk and disorderly is brought there. Is he brought first of all before a police officer analogous to our Inspector or analogous to our sergeant?—Yes, he is brought before the person in charge of the station, but it would not be always the Commissaire, because the Commissaire is often about in every direction. He has a number of extraordinary duties to perform which take him constantly over his district.

45790. Is there somebody at the station or the depot who is in charge of it?—Yes, in charge of the station. The depot is a distinct organisation.

45791. Is there a Commissaire assigned to every station?—There is a Commissaire assigned to every district, not to every station.

45792. Then, I suppose, whoever there is in charge of the particular station, whether the Commissaire or not, there is a subordinate officer of the Commissaire?—Yes. It is a most extraordinarily difficult question to answer, and the subject is most involved. He is responsible for the time being. There is not the same formality with regard to taking a charge as there is in this country. The careful investigation of all the facts which we endeavour to have before the charge is taken is done in a much more summary way.

45794. Does that take place at once from the station?—Yes, in all serious cases at once.

45795. In a trivial case or a comparatively trivial case of drunk and disorderly, how long is the man kept at the station?—He would only be kept in the station till he is sober and does not make any difficulty.

45796. And he is then allowed to go home?—He is then allowed to go home in all probability in the majority of cases.

45797. When has he to attend at the court?—That I could not say exactly. In all probability I think he would not have to attend at all.

45798. Then a man is allowed to go away, and he may not after all be prosecuted at all?—That is so.

45799. He might not hear anything more of it?—The police have great latitude there which we do not allow them here at all. Here they have no latitude at all. The regular rule is that, of course, they make the arrest and then their function ceases entirely.

45800. We have got that, of course, in the book, and it has been told to us by other witnesses, so I need not trouble you about that. The moment the charge is taken in this country the man must come before the Police Court, before a Magistrate sitting in public?—Yes.

45801. As I understand it that is not necessarily the case in Paris?—It is not necessarily the case.

45802. Supposing it was a case that came before the Commissaire himself may the Commissaire say he will keep him till he is sober and then send him away?—Yes; I believe so. He has very large powers indeed.

45803. His powers partake then of the power the Magistrate has—not as a police officer?—Yes, and yet at the same time he is under the Prefect of Police. It is a dual qualification which has no analogy here at all.

45804. Is the Commissaire the prosecutor as well?—No. Then the Juge d'Instruction comes in.

45805. (Mr. Whitmore.) Who is the Commissaire appointed by?—My impression is that he would be appointed by the Prefect of Police with the authority of the Minister of Justice, but I do not give that as an absolute opinion. My impression is that that is the case. The Juge d'Instruction is the officer of the Minister of Justice who acts as the prosecutor, and does the investigation into serious crimes which is here done in open Court by our police magistrates. The Juge d'Instruction has unlimited power to bring a prisoner up and keep him there any length of time while the "instruction" is proceeding, weeks or months even, until he is satisfied that he has got his case. The evil of that—I say it with all respect to the French—is that he has got a direct interest in the prosecution, as much as the counsel for the prosecution has. His advancement really depends upon the success of his "instruction."

45806. (Chairman.) He has power to summon witnesses before him, I understand?—Yes, and he has the prisoner in his private room with no public present, and only quite recently, within the past few months, so to say—it is really within the past eighteen months or twenty-four months—has the prisoner been able under the law to have the assistance of his counsel in the room of the Juge d'Instruction. There, if it is a charge of murder, he is confronted with the body and confronted with the circumstances of the crime, and the crime is re-enacted, and an inquisition of great length goes on. I ought to say that in some respects the Procurator Fiscal in Scotland compares with the Juge d'Instruction in France, and the old Scotch law is very largely founded on the old French law. Under the exceptional legislation that was necessary in Ireland in 1883 and 1884 the same system was adopted there from absolute necessity, and there were great results. Of course one of the difficulties which the police have here is to produce the prisoner before the Magistrate always, under the Habeas Corpus Act, within twenty-four hours of his arrest, or immediately if the Court is sitting, and to produce the evidence in public. Of course, that has a very pernicious influence very often on the discovery of crime, but the public at large is a great gainer. As Sir William Harcourt said, we must suffer for some of the difficulties which the police go through under those circumstances.

45807. Then the smaller offences, such as drunkenness and disorder in the streets, and solicitations in the Paris streets, do not come into the sphere of work of the Juge d'Instruction at all?—No, not at all. It is treated very lightly, and the public take no interest whatever in it. It is not a thing that makes any commotion at all.

45808. Do you think the majority of cases in which people are arrested for being drunk and disorderly or for solicitation in Paris ever come before a court at all, as distinguished from the jurisdiction such as it is at the police station or the depôt?—I should think not, but I do not give it as an absolute opinion, because I might be in error; some new regulation might have been brought in, but I should think not. My general knowledge of France would lead me to suppose not. However, I will go over to Paris on Friday, make inquiry, and acquaint the Commission.

45810. Do you think that power should be given to the Magistrate to hear cases in camera—cases of gross immorality or cases in which there are disgusting and filthy details?—Personally, I think so. I think our system is extremely pernicious in that way, but I realise that it would be extremely difficult to introduce the alteration. I should very much like to call the attention of the Commission to an opinion which was given by Sir Thomas Henry—no relation to the present Chief Commissioner—who was twenty-five years ago the Chief Magistrate at Bow Street, and perhaps the Magistrate with the largest criminal experience of any. He repeatedly assured me that he thought the prosecution in open court of these offences was bad. At page 129, paragraph 5, of the 14th edition of the Police Code I say this: "The late Sir Thomas Henry, one of the most capable Chief Magistrates who ever sat at Bow Street, informed the author that in his long experience prevention in such cases was better than detection, for police court proceedings were infrequently found to direct lewd attention to such practices and induce imitation." I have a very strong opinion that this is the case.

45811. I think you have referred to the treatment of prisoners in the charge room charged with drunkenness. Have you any further observation you would like to make with regard to drunkenness as a street offence?—No, I think not. The only point is this that it is dealt with under a variety of statutes, and the police really are not called upon to take proceedings if the drunken person does not commit something to the detriment of the public—that is, if he makes a noise, or breaks windows, or commits damage, or creates an obstruction, and so on. I think the system of arrest with a patrol wagon would be a special advantage in connection with drunken people. Of course they resist the arrest very often. Nothing is more curious than the various ways in which drunkenness affects different nationalities. The Englishman becomes sullen in drink; the Irishman is very violent; the Russian is very affectionate, and gives very little trouble; but the Italian and the Spaniard become violent and use daggers or the knife, and so on. The conveyance of drunken people to the station takes four or five police away, and very often for the man's own protection he must be carried face downwards, which creates a bad impression on the public. If the police had these patrol wagons, which they have in America, the man would be away in a minute and the mob would be quickly dispersed, and the police would not be taken away from their beat. Before I pass from that may I call attention to one thing which I should direct the attention of the Commission to very strongly—that is, the mode of effecting arrests. A very remarkable system of police self-defence has been inaugurated in the City Police and is in force, and I should strongly recommend the Commission to get the Commissioner of the City Police to show them how it is done. It enables a man to be quieted almost instantly. He sees resistance is absolutely impossible under this system. It is the adaptation of the system, which is well known in some countries, by Sergeant Wheeldon, of the City Police, and greatly perfected by Captain Nott Bower and his assistants. I think it would be very interesting if the Commission saw that system.

45812. (Mr. Whitmore.) Is it known by any particular name?—You will find it described in the Police Code, and it is called "The Police Self-Defence." Then I should say with regard to effecting arrests how very greatly tact and experience come in. For instance, the assaults on officers of the Criminal Investigation Department are extremely rare, because they are officers who are chosen for their tact and their method of dealing with the public, and although they are unarmed and have no handcuffs, it is very rare indeed that they have any very serious trouble with prisoners. Of course there are occasional cases, but they are very rare on the whole. That emphasises the great importance of education. They have gained their education largely by long service. I have always been of opinion that some service in detective work in the Criminal Investigation Department prior to promotion to the higher ranks of the police force is very desirable, as not only making the two branches of the force—the uniform and the plain clothes men—work well together, but ensuring that the higher ranks of the police force have knowledge of the actual means of enforcing the criminal law.

45813. (Chairman.) With regard to solicitation, you are of course acquainted with the sections of the Acts of Parliament under which that is dealt with by the police?—Quite so.

45814. What is the view you have formed as to the way in which the police discharge their duties with regard to that matter under those statutory provisions?—I think as well as they can, but it is an extremely difficult question, and it is confined to a few divisions in a large measure. The risk to the individual policeman of making a mistake is so great that there is a great unwillingness, not to use a stronger word, on the part of the individual policemen of being mixed up with these cases if they can possibly help it, and that leads perhaps to more toleration and more tolerance than is permitted in any other country. I do not think street prostitution in any other country is anything like so bad as it is here—certainly in no country that I know of. I may say I have prepared a memorandum which I have submitted to the Commission dealing with this matter from the historical point of view.

45815. Will you kindly read it to us, and then I will ask you one or two questions upon it?—I ought to say I submitted this to my successor, Sir Robert Anderson, who held office from 1888 to 1901, and he says: "This memorandum is quite admirable, not only as a statement of the law and the practice of police in this matter, but also because of the opinions it expresses—opinions with which I would wish to associate myself."

The memorandum was put in, and is as follows:—

Memorandum on Prostitution and Solicitation in London and Other Capitals.

1. London has been within the past generation through three stages of what the French call "la vie galante."

2. There was the time when night houses or cafés, filled with prostitutes, abounded in the vicinity of the Haymarket. At the closing hour, and for some time after it, the Haymarket and adjacent streets were an absolute pandemonium, and the most flagrant prostitution and solicitation abounded. It was impossible for any respectable person to pass unmolested—so the late Sir Adolphus Liddell, for long the very practical Under Secretary of State for the Home Department, often assured me. I have distinct personal recollection of many prosecutions under Sections 14 and 15 of the Licensing Act of 1872, which I thus epitomise in the Police Code, 14th edition, page 206.

Harbouring Prostitutes.

"If any licensed person knowingly permits his premises to be the habitual resort or place of meeting of reputed prostitutes, whether the object of their so resorting or meeting is or is not prostitution, if he allows them to remain thereon longer than is necessary for the purpose of obtaining reasonable refreshment, he is liable for a first offence to a penalty of £10; for a second, £20; and if he allows his premises to be a brothel, he shall incur the latter penalty, forfeit his licence, and be disqualified for ever from holding one."

Gradual improvement resulted.

Cremorne Gardens and Argyll Rooms.

3. There was also the time when the Cremorne Gardens, succeeding Vauxhall Gardens of an earlier period, flourished in summer, and the Argyll Rooms in Windmill Street in the remaining months.

Cremorne Gardens cleared the central streets in large measure of prostitution, and, although for an hour after the closing time of the Argyll Rooms, Coventry Street and Piccadilly Circus were crowded with prostitutes, the refusal of the licences and the closing of these places of resort threw the former habitués thereof into the streets at all hours.

Steps to Combat Increase of Juvenile Prostitution.

4. The effect became very marked upon the girl life in London. The presence of so vast an amount of evident prostitution excited curiosity and induced imitation. The increase in juvenile prostitution was fearful. In 1881, I moved the Home Secretary to take action in the matter, and a Select Committee of the House of Lords was appointed on May 31st, 1881, under the chairmanship of Lord Chancellor Cairns, "to inquire into the state of the law relative to the protection of young girls from artifices to induce them to lead a corrupt life" (Paper 109, Session 1881). I have nothing to withdraw from the evidence I gave before the Committee upon July 19th, 1881. That evidence, and its cross-examination by the late Lord Salisbury, and the testimony of the other witnesses, particularly of Mr. Dunlap, ex-Superintendent of C Division, would, I think, be of interest to the Royal Commission.

Demoralising Effects of Street Prostitution.

5. Then, as now, I was convinced that this street prostitution is the most demoralising factor to the community at large that can possibly exist.

It encourages vice among women and young girls. It exposes boys and young men to excessive temptation and danger of contagious disease at an age when they do not know how, and have not the means, to treat it. Permanent ill-health, reflected "unto the third and fourth generation," and early death often result. The going to a licensed brothel is a premeditated act. Falling to overwheming temptation in the streets is in a wholly different category.

I said to the Select Committee: "The Civil Service Commissioners hold their examinations in Burlington House, and almost compel the candidates for the Army and other callings of the State to spend a week in London, and to pass twice daily through a double row of prostitutes."

This I grant is a strongly-drawn picture. But that it is substantially accurate is shown by the fact that some of the most successful crammers insist on their pupils, up for examination, returning to them in the country each evening.

The "Modern Babylon" crusade of Mr. Stead in the "Pall Mall Gazette" succeeded the Select Committee, and led to the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1885, raising the prohibited age of carnal knowledge "even with consent" to 16, and of abduction to 18.

The French Code provides (in theory) against the "Débauche" or "Detournement de Mineurs" of either sex, but gives the mother of an unrecognised illegitimate child no right against the father.

Action of the London County Council re Music Halls.

6. The well-meant action of the London County Council as regards music halls, and which has so greatly advanced their prosperity by increasing their clientèle to a class which never before went to them, has tended to add to the street prostitution and all its evils of parade and temptation.

Street Prostitution in London.

7. There is only one world capital whose streets bear any comparison in regard to London, namely, Berlin, and there, although luxury and vice have kept even pace with growing prosperity, it is mainly confined to the Friedrich Strasse. In London the Strand, the Haymarket, and Regent Street (north side), there is open prostitution from 3 or 4 p.m. to 2 a.m., and after 9 p.m. it is also rampant in Piccadilly (north side) and Regent Street (south side).

I have always wondered at the toleration in this regard of the ratepaying shopkeepers in those streets, for this traffic not only brings no custom, but actually drives it away. The new Piccadilly Hotel (old St. James's Hall) will never answer unless there is improvement. Regent Street might be a great promenade. But no lady alone or two ladies should be there now after dark.

Limited Powers of Police.

8. The powers of the police in dealing with the street nuisance are exceedingly limited (see Police Code 14th edition, page 195, tit. Prostitutes), and there is such serious risk of making a mistake, involving ruin in the service, that constables will not touch it unless absolutely compelled.

The Cass case is fresh in recollection. Without the slightest knowledge of the facts the public rushed to conclusions entirely unwarranted. A Government with a large majority was in serious danger of defeat in the House of Commons, and I have the best reason for knowing that if a General Election had ensued the determining factor would have been this case. Probably few members of Parliament enjoy more electoral independence that I have had for over 20 years. But one of my leading supporters, a banker, went quite wild over the Cass case on entirely erroneous premises. There was a general demand for the prosecution and the dismissal of the unfortunate constable. The prosecution was attempted but failed, as when the case was set down for trial, the complainant was about to be confined. In the more recent D'Angely case, leading to this Commission, in which the Metropolitan Police in general, and the C Division in particular, were held up in the Press and in Parliament to public execration as "uniformed ruffians," events have shown that sympathy was more than misplaced.

Comparison between Policeman and Soldier.

9. The policeman differs from the soldier in this, that the initiative of action, and responsibility for it, lie with him instead of with his officers. Unless the policeman has confidence that he will be supported not only by his superiors, but by the Magistrates, Judges, Parliament, and the public, he will simply not act. Excuses for inaction are easy, such as persons to watch, a fainting passerby, an accident, a discussion, a foreigner in trouble. They are very difficult to controvert in a great city. After every "crisis" such as the recent one an era of licence ensues, because the police are intimidated in the discharge of their duty.

Vagrant Act.

10. Under the Vagrant Act (Section 3) every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner, is deemed an idle and disorderly person, and liable to one month's imprisonment with hard labour.

Metropolitan Police Act.

11. Under Section 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act every common prostitute or night walker loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution and solicitation, to the annoyance of an inhabitant or passenger who will charge her and attend the Police Court to give evidence, is liable to a penalty of 40s.

Town Police Clauses Act.

12. Under the Town Police Clauses Act (10 and 11

Colonel Sir C. E. H. Vincent, K.C.M.G., C.B., A.D.C., M.P.

13 May 1907.

Victoria, chapter 89, section 28) every common prostitute or night walker loitering and importuning passengers for the purpose of prostitution is subject to a fine of 40s. or 14 days' imprisonment in default.

Difficulty in Finding Private Prosecutor.

13. Now no man in his senses would charge a prostitute for annoying him, or waste his time in attending the police station at night, with all the inevitable annoyance and risk of hustle by a frolicsome crowd, or the police court next day, with all its publicity and an army of reporters eager for a head line name and sensation.

"What was he doing there?"

"Never was there smoke without fire."

"A.B. Oh, yes. I saw in the papers he was in some dirty police court case the other day. I never thought much of him."

Such will be the comments of his relations and friends, even if he escapes censure by the Magistrate and cross-examination by the defendant's solicitor, tending to show either that he had given encouragement himself, or was a cross-grained, unsympathetic bully, who liked to interfere in other people's business. The risk will be in direct proportion to his repute and respectability.

The G. A. case, which made some sensation, is an instance in point. A highly-respectable and well-known married man went out to post a letter, was persistently accosted and charged the offender.

Position of Police Regarding Street Prostitution.

14. The whole onus rests therefore in practice upon the police. Whatever complaint may be made to a constable privately, whatever he may see with his own eyes, whatever his knowledge from continual observation, action is attended by much trouble, by very likely a scuffle, by cross-examination by the Station Inspector, by the necessity of making out a written report, by the loss of at least four hours' rest next day at the police court, by risk of blame by the Magistrate, and of other consequences. To do nothing, not to see, is therefore the safest policy from the individual point of view, except from a high sense of police duty to the public. There is absolutely nothing to be gained. "Don't touch those cases" is the advice of experience to the young constable.

Male Solicitation.

15. This applies with even greater force to that increasing scourge, male solicitation by males, as much in London as in foreign cities. For a private individual to charge in such a case would be madness on his part. The late Sir Thomas Henry, one of the most experienced and successful Chief Magistrates who ever sat at Bow Street, told me in the seventies when I went to Scotland Yard, that he thought the policy of prosecution in these cases was very doubtful, as the publicity attaching to them aroused morbid curiosity, and undoubtedly induced imitation. There is much common sense in this view, and, as his successor, Sir John Ingham, said, "Common sense is the greatest quality for a Magistrate." The danger would not be present if, as on the Continent, such cases were taken in camera. Publicity has advantages, but it has also great disadvantages, when every item nauseous and sensational is detailed and magnified for the benefit of young boys and girls, especially in the Sunday and halfpenny Press.

No Inducement to Police to Act.

16. Not only is there no advantage attaching to a constable bringing in charges against prostitutes, but excessive zeal in this direction would at once arouse the suspicion of his superiors that he was paying too much attention to this class of case to the neglect of other duties. The proof of police efficiency in the maintenance of order and the regulation of traffic, as in crime, is in the absence of complaint, not in the multiplication of charges. (See Lord Brampton's Address to Police, Police Code, page xxi.)

Anglo-Saxon Female Liberty.

17. There is another especial difficulty in dealing with street prostitution in England. It is the Anglo-Saxon habit, and a growing one, in all classes of society, from the highest downwards, to give our young women and girls an individual liberty no French, German, Spanish, Italian, Russian, or Austrian parent, even of the working classes, and still less of any Eastern race, would dream of. That it is to the advantage of the race is undeniable. That it is comparatively rarely abused is a matter for congratulation. But that it gives rise to a greater amount of clandestine prostitution than in other countries no one with practical knowledge will deny. Mr. Denman's observation in the D'Angely case was much criticised. But it is one which would commend itself, unfortunately, to the common sense of every father and brother knowing the locality. The streets previously specified are not only full of prostitutes, but also of single girls not in that category as a profession, but successful amateurs none the less. That condition of affairs is not present to like extent in any foreign capital from Santiago de Chile passing eastwards to Tokyo.

Alleged Bribery of Police.

18. Are the police bribed to countenance prostitution, and, failing the giving of such bribe, do they prosecute?

Personal inspection of the position of affairs would show at once how little good bribery would do. Apart from an incessant change of beats and duty—almost, indeed, too frequent, for it diminishes local knowledge—there are double and single patrols every few hundred yards. If one man could be bribed to do a favour or permit evasion of the law, it is hopeless to bribe a score or more. Besides, police know well that there is a great risk of the proffered bribe being a "plant."

Probably some of the foreign prostitutes, French, Belgian, and German, numbering in May, June, and July not less than 5,000, and in other months 3,000, many with attendant souteneurs, in the early days of their immigration or season visit to the land of the public licensing of street prostitution, offer a shilling occasionally in the belief that, as abroad, it will do them some good; but no woman of experience of London would do so. Allegations by prostitutes that it is done, and also that favourable testimony at the police court has been rewarded, are, however, certainly made. But never, so far as I am aware, have they been made to a Magistrate or to the police authorities, although no constable can hide his identity. In this connection it is to be borne in mind that the police of C Division are largely single men, or married men, living in tenement houses, owing to the high rents, and that it is difficult for a constable living with or near comrades to have much money without arousing suspicion. Service, moreover, in C is not popular, by reason of its risks to character. The contrary would be the case if it was a lucrative station.

Superior Recruits for Police.

19. Suggestions for the employment of a superior class of persons in the police as Inspectors or Detectives are frequently made in the Press. Especially was this so after the scandals which led to my appointment in 1878 to reorganise with a free hand the detective and criminal administration. Ready to make any experiment for the public good, I appointed six highly recommended "gentlemen." Five had to be dismissed within a year or two, and the sixth "compelled to resign." The only case in six years I could bring home of raising money on police information was traced to one of these "gentlemen."

Public Opinion and Police Work.

20. It must be remembered that police work in this country must be carried out in accordance with public opinion. That public opinion, while inveighing against occasional police failures, does not like "traps," even to catch criminals. One which I authorised for an abortionist who was responsible for the death of several young women, and which brought about his conviction, led to the indictment of all the police concerned and to Parliamentary agitation. The English will not tolerate "agents provocateurs." As the late Sir William Harcourt said: "You must not be surprised if the police are sometimes foiled, baffled, and defeated by weapons they cannot match. It is the price England pays for a system which she justly prefers."

The aim is not merely the discovery of the guilty party. It is the proving of that guilt in open court by means acceptable to magistrate, judge and jury, and permitted by the law and public opinion of England. No man can do so save by going through a regular apprenticeship. My efforts were directed, but without much success—for the candidates were not under me—to a better system of police education. Much progress has, however, been made in this direction under Sir Edward Bradford and Sir Edward Henry, and more remains to be done. Most police mistakes are the result of inexperience and ignorance. It is not to every Inspector and sergeant that a young constable can go for guidance. "Find out for yourself" may be the answer of one unwilling to take responsibility; or maybe the constable hesitates to show that he does not know.

Suggested Reforms.

21. To hazard a suggestion is always dangerous, for criticism invariably fastens on the suggestion and not on the principle.

Two alternatives are, however, open to the British public:

(1) To keep their streets open as at present to prostitution, with the attendant demoralisation of both sexes and loss of material value in the streets affected.

(2) To shut it off the main streets and tolerate it elsewhere, either in a special quarter or in special establishments. Abolish it you cannot so long as the world is peopled by men and women. For myself, I adhere generally to the draft Bill suggested to the Select Committee of 1881.

Foreign Systems.

22. The French license houses and keep them under strict supervision, forbid the entrance of minors male and female, tolerate prostitution in certain gardens or cafés, or shut it more or less off the main thoroughfares. In Paris there is a permanent police department, termed "Des Mœurs," having charge of these matters. The Belgians and Austrians shut it off the streets. The Prussians license no houses, and have the street prostitution of England, but more under control. The Russians only allow it to a very limited extent on the streets after 10 p.m. In music halls they require each prostitute to be accompanied by a duenna. In neither Rome, nor Madrid, nor Lisbon, nor Washington, nor New York, is there much street prostitution. In Athens, Calcutta, Constantinople, Pekin, Rio de Janeiro, Teheran, and Tokyo, there is none at all. In Buenos Ayres no loitering or accosting is permitted. The women must walk rapidly and not pass to and fro. A horse patrol is at every street corner—more, though, as a precaution against revolution than anything else.

In most American cities prostitution is kept off the streets, but permitted in certain quarters, though not licensed nor controlled.

C. E. Howard Vincent.

House of Commons,
July 23rd, 1906.

P.S.—I may perhaps add that in 1880, with the authority of the then Government, I induced Mr. Snagge (now Judge Sir Robert Snagge) to proceed as Commissioner to foreign capitals to ascertain, with the help of the local authorities, if there were any British girls detained, against their will, in Continental houses of ill-fame. Although the result was negative in this regard, a direct consequence of this inquiry was the recent International Agreement upon the White Slave Traffic which has been ratified by all the Powers. This circumstance, coupled with my acquaintance with foreign police—still kept up—has given me special opportunities of informing myself officially upon the matters in question. It is an unpleasant subject, and I only submit this memorandum in order to assist the Royal Commission.

I should like to say that in my opinion street prostitution is a very great difficulty and a very great danger. In Paris and Vienna it does not exist. In Berlin it does exist—Berlin and London are the worst—but in no other capital is it tolerated at all.

45816. I suppose there is a larger toleration of disorderly houses of various kinds in those capitals than in London where none are tolerated?—Yes, and that is why it is so bad in Berlin. I must not be taken as advocating the institution of such houses, because it must be recognised that anything of that sort would be absolutely absurd and futile, and contrary to the sense of the public.

45817. I understand you to say the problem for the Paris and Berlin police is not quite the same as for the Metropolitan Police in this country?—There are no houses in Berlin. Berlin and London are the only two capitals in which the houses are not really tolerated, with the exception of New York. In New York, Washington, and Philadelphia, speaking generally, they deal with it in this way, that they do not permit it at all about the street, which is attended with great risk and sometimes great abuse of the power on the part of the police, as we have seen recently, but they do not take notice of it if it is confined to two or three streets in a particular locality. There they are strongly policed, and if there is no infraction of the criminal law it is allowed to pass. But the view I understand is that it is a form of vice that must have an outlet, and they think that is the best way of dealing with it.

45818. By confining it to a particular area?—It is confined to a particular area, and everybody in the particular area knows perfectly well what is going on, but in America they have no recognised houses. There are houses, but they are not recognised.

45819. Very great progress has been made in London of recent years in the suppression of disorderly houses, we are told by Inspector McKay and some of the other police witnesses who have come before us, and, of course, we know it from other sources. Do you think that has tended to increase the amount of solicitation in the streets?—Yes, I think it has, personally. For instance, with Cremorne Gardens and Vauxhall Gardens in the earlier period going back to our extreme youth it existed, and was not so flagrant in the central streets as it was later. When the Argyle Rooms existed in the other months for an hour after the close it was serious, yet the closing of the restaurants had a very beneficial effect on that and it was soon cleared. But the open prostitution in certain streets of London from a very early hour in the afternoon to a late hour at night is a very serious matter I think for the public health and the public morality.

45820. Do you think the evil has been increasing during the last few years, or decreasing during the last few years, say, the last ten years?—No, I think decreasing, on the whole, because I think the institution of double patrols in the C Division has had a very beneficial effect. But, on the other hand, of course, the pleasure population of London has very much increased. The erection of the new great hotels brings tens of thousands to London more than used to come, and London is replacing Paris as the pleasure resort of the world, and that, of course, brings the usual accompaniments in its train.

45821. You deal more fully with that in your memorandum?—Yes. I would like to refer also to the evidence I gave before the House of Lords Committee on the protection of young girls, which will be found in Paper 448 of the House of Lords of 1881, and I would respectfully direct the attention of the Commission to the evidence of Superintendent Dunlap, who was one of the best Superintendents who has ever been in the Metropolitan Police. He was in command of the C Division for many years which is the Division most particularly affected by this evil. It was a Select Committee that I moved the Home Secretary to induce the Lord Chancellor to appoint to inquire into the terrible increase there was at that period in juvenile prostitution. It required very prompt dealing with, and it was dealt with not so much owing to this Select Committee as to the agitation which led to the Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885.

45822. Suggestions have been made to us that police officers are too friendly with prostitutes, sometimes leading to intercourse between them, and toleration by the police officers therefore of solicitation by the women. Do you think there is anything in that, forming the best judgment you can?—There may be occasional cases of that. On the other hand the police are in an extremely difficult position. Of course, many of these unfortunate women are in great distress, and the police often would direct them to homes or to night refuges, or give them a little help and advice of that sort, and it would be impossible for the police to prevent these women speaking to them. Of course, that gives rise to unfair and undue suggestions in the mind of a suspicious public. The police are constantly changed, but there must be young men in the police, and there must be young men in the C Division, because otherwise the most difficult police division perhaps of all to police and maintain order in would not be in the efficient state in which it is. Of course the constable runs, as he knows, very great risks. He cannot conceal his identity; his number is on two places on his collar and his number is on his helmet. Inspectors and sergeant are passing to and fro, so there is very great risk in dealing dishonestly with these matters. I need hardly mention that two cases occur to everyone in connection with this subject, in one of which the police were proved by subsequent events to have been absolutely in the right. It was a very notorious case—I need not give any name, but really the person who was alleged to have been improperly arrested was found afterwards to be enceinte and the mother of an illegitimate child, and, of course, there is a great risk to the individual policeman in being connected with a case of public notoriety. It does not absolutely stop his chances in the police, but he becomes identified with the man who made a serious mistake, and, as we all know, there is nothing more fatal in a public career than to be identified with a mishap.

45823. Passing from that kind of relation between the police constables and these women, suggestions have been made, I may say, to the effect that constables habitually receive bribes from prostitutes, or it is sometimes put in another way, that the constables blackmail these unfortunate women. Do you think there is any substantial foundation for that notion?—No, I should not think there was any substantial foundation for it. As I say, humanum est errare—but the risk is great. May I draw your attention to paragraph 18 of my memorandum, in which I say: "Are the police bribed to countenance prostitution, and, failing the giving of such a bribe, do they prosecute? Personal inspection of the position of affairs would show at once how little good bribery would do. Apart from an incessant change of beats and duty—almost indeed too frequent, for it diminishes local knowledge—there are double and single patrols every few hundred yards. If one man could be bribed to do a favour or permit evasion of the law, it is hopeless to bribe a score or more. Besides, police know well that there is a great risk of the proffered bribe being 'a plant.' Probably some of the foreign prostitutes, French, Belgian, and German, numbering in May, June, and July not less than 5,000, and in other months 3,000, many with attendant souteneurs, in the early days of their immigration or season visit to the land of the public licensing of street prostitution, offer a shilling occasionally in the belief that, as abroad, it will do them some good; but no women of experience of London would do so. Allegations by prostitutes that it is done, and also that favourable testimony at the police court has been rewarded, are, however, certainly made. But never, so far as I am aware, have they been made to a magistrate or to the police authorities, although no constable can hide his identity. In this connection it is to be borne in mind that the police of C Division are largely single men, or married men living in tenement houses, owing to the high rents, and that it is difficult for a constable living with, or near, comrades to have much money without arousing suspicion. Service, moreover, in C is not popular by reason of its risks to character. The contrary would be the case if it was a lucrative station."

45825. Do you think there could be any steps taken within the Police Force whereby the prosecution should be taken out of the hands of the individual Inspector or the policeman concerned and directed by a branch of the Police Force?—That would be possible, but it would entail considerable delay. It would prove very costly, and I do not think the gain would be proportionate. For instance, in 1877 the Commissioner of Police at that time felt the need of a legal adviser in police cases. His opinion was rarely of value, because he had not got the responsibility before the court of supporting that opinion. He gave, so to speak, a chamber opinion, and had no responsibility for it, and it was very largely founded on theory. I think that would be the case in the adoption of any such course. I am very much averse, from practical experience, to bringing into the police a class of persons who are not policemen. There is at the Commissioner's office a civil service branch of clerks, able men no doubt, but at one time (I do not speak, of course, about the present time) there was a good deal of hostility between the civil service branch and the police, owing, perhaps, to defects on both sides, which was very detrimental to the public interest. The civil service branch had the checking of an account, for instance, and they would raise the most interminable quibbles over a cab or an omnibus, and say: "Why did not the man walk?" The police were engaged in never ending discussions with the civil service branch, and it led to much friction, which was detrimental to the public interest, I am convinced. That, I think, would be the case if your suggestion were adopted. If I might venture to suggest a question, it would be this, whether I think that if legal aid were given much more extensively than at present it would be beneficial—if you ask me that, I say yes, I think it would be very advantageous, but I am strongly opposed to people being able to give opinions on police cases unless they are responsible for them in open court and before the public.

45826. Of course, under the present system, not wishing to suggest that anything of the sort goes on at this moment, yet it does seem possible that a police constable who has brought in a false charge and the Inspector is anxious to shield that police constable, the charge can be brought before the Magistrate's court without the police authorities themselves having much opportunity of becoming aware of this possible mistake or neglect of duty?—That is possible, of course, but it would very rarely happen that the Inspector would desire to shield the police. They discharge their duties very fairly and very conscientiously indeed as a whole, but the Magistrate being an absolutely independent authority, has the charge sheet laid before him as it was at the station. There is a column for remarks and complaints. If the Magistrate thinks there is anything wrong in a case, or anything doubtful, or anything demanding any inquiry, or that the charge was improperly taken, or that there is any fault on the part of the police, he would mark the charge sheet to be brought before the Commissioner: "I think the conduct of the police in this case unsatisfactory, and demands inquiry." It would be quite impossible to conceal that charge sheet from the Commissioner, it would have to be reported by the Inspector in the court to the Superintendent, who would have to report it to the Commissioner, and the charge sheet itself would come before the Chief Commissioner, and I should think there were not 20 cases a year in which the charge sheet is marked. I am speaking from memory entirely, but that number out of 70,000 or 80,000 cases is very small indeed.

45827. (Mr. Dickinson.) You said something about its being advisable to have a constant change of police methods. What do you think about the change of the personnel? Is it a good thing to have men a long time in the same district?—No, I think it is not—not to have them too long, but the rules existing in my time aimed at that. For instance, a constable was never allowed in a district where he had relations; if he marrried a wife who came from the district he was never allowed to be in that district either; he was always moved on promotion; and, of course, if there was any suspicion about him he was moved instantly.

45829. What about the higher members?—The higher members are not moved to the same extent, and there, I think, knowledge is very necessary. I do not think it becomes necessary that they should be moved; the Superintendents might be, but it would be rather difficult. Knowledge of the locality becomes of very, very great importance, and they obtain great influence in a locality, not of a pernicious character, but of a very beneficial character; the public get to have great confidence in them. All the leaders of public thought and of public opinion in the district get to know them.

45830. Of course it might be well to move some of them if they were too much attached to public-houses, for instance?—Yes, but of that I think the Commissioner is well able to judge. I think any hard and fast rule might work very badly in that way; and I think the Commissioner could tell directly if there was necessity to move a man, and he would not hesitate in any case to exercise his powers, which are unlimited in that direction.

45831. Of course if it were found necessary to move a man it would not be in his favour?—No, unless it could be associated with some mark of approval, or otherwise, or if some particular difficulty had to be encountered. Then, of course, events and families always come into consideration, the moving of a family, the moving of a house of furniture, and so on, and districts in London vary very, very much as regards facilities for accommodation and house establishment. Personally, I am very strongly in favour of a change of functions and moving in subordinate ranks; it is a good thing; it keeps men fresh.

45832. Do you think there should be any system by which witnesses of a street row could be more easily brought forward. Now so much seems to rest on the evidence of the police alone in cases or in some of the cases we have had to deal with?—Yes, of course, it would be a good thing if it could be so, but it would be attended with considerable difficulty. The only way I think is to insist very strongly on the regulation that no one not connected with the case should have admission to the police station, and that everyone desiring to make any representation of a proper character should be admitted. Those regulations are very strict, and they are enforced as well as they can be.

45833. I do not think there is any difficulty with regard to the admission of witnesses who are anxious to come, but my point is rather whether the police have power to bring witnesses before the court?—Of course they have power now, and they could apply for a subpœna, and serve a subpœna.

45834. That is if they know them?—That is if they know them.

45835. But if they do not know them?—But if they do not know them they could not.

45836. I believe in some cases they could call upon anybody?—Yes, but it would have rather the effect of a man taking care that he was not called by going on the other side of the street, and not being involved in any way at all. The consequences of police court publicity are so disagreeable that everybody desires not to be called as a witness.

45837. Of course that is so, but in most of these cases, or I might say in almost all the cases of the kind that we are inquiring into, the sole witness is the policeman?—Yes.

45838. And he is prosecutor, too?—Yes. He would always try to get independent testimony. I do not think people are so reluctant in this country to give evidence either for or against as they are in other countries where it is a matter of common knowledge that to give information of a murder, or of a serious crime, in many countries raises a suspicion against yourself.

45839. I was not thinking so much of those cases as of these minor cases. Have you any knowledge of the Scotch system of the Procurator Fiscal?—No, only indirectly—not personally.

45840. You do not seem to think it advisable?—I think it is a first-rate thing. I think a Fiscal is excellent, but I do not think you would persuade the English public to take that view of it at all. The Fiscal has very much the same power as the Commissaire; he has the power of a private examination of an accused person; that is very advantageous no doubt, and if we could have that it would be very advantageous to the police, but it would be a serious innovation upon our system, and I doubt whether it would be accepted. If it could be done, nothing could be better. Of course many cases fail altogether and break down entirely by reason of the necessity of the public examination of the accused within a limited number of hours, and practically the police, in vulgar language, give away their case, and give away their knowledge. Take the case with regard to the Park Lane pictures. The prisoner was apprehended, he was defended, and it is easy to see what is the line which is being taken by the defendant's counsel in that case. He showed his hand at once. The prisoner was put up to it, so to say, by the informant, and of course that is extremely injurious to the police. If the Fiscal could make this examination in private, as in Scotland, it would be advantageous from the police point of view, although the real difficulty is that it is useless to propose anything which is not readily accepted by the public. The Government is afraid to propose it, and a private individual is afraid to propose it.

45841. Does it not also tend to give a certain protection to the public against improper action on the part of the police?—No, I should hardly say that; I think it is rather the other way, because the Fiscal in all honour is a man with sympathies, and everything against the police is told to him alone, and he may conceive it to be his public duty not to unnecessarily make it public.

45842. You were saying that the Fiscal would be a great advantage to the police for the protection of the police. Do you not think the public of England would accept him for that reason?—I do not.

45843. I was suggesting to you that it would also be a protection to the public against improper action on the part of the police?—I do not quite follow that.

45844. Suppose a man is brought up on a false charge of drunkenness by a policeman, then the fact that it is to be taken up by the Procurator Fiscal gives an additional security against that charge being further proceeded with?—Yes. No doubt you are speaking from knowledge, but I do not know that the Procurator Fiscal would come into action at all in a case of drunkenness; prima facie I should think not.

45845. The evidence given to us was that the Procurator Fiscal had an officer who took up the case when it was brought before the police court?—Really, I thought it only applied to criminal cases, but I am no doubt wrong. I did not know it applied to ordinary street cases.

45847. (Mr. Dickinson.) We have been dealing with cases of that very kind in which, rightly or wrongly, the police have been charged with either having bolstered up a case or making a mistake, and then bolstering it up so as to carry it through; and my question turns on this—whether greater security would not be afforded if the Police Force itself had an official of the same kind as the Procurator Fiscal?—I think if we could have a Procurator Fiscal it would be an excellent system. So far as I know, the system is a great improvement on what we have here; but that does not apply quite to some official being in the Police Station who was not connected with the police for the taking of charges.

45847. That is quite true, but I understood that in Glasgow the police officer at the station was an officer of the Procurator Fiscal?—I did not know that.

45849. With regard to street solicitation, I should like to know your view as to whether the police could do more to put a stop to street solicitation?—Yes, I think they could, but it would require the firm support of the Magistrates on some definite and uniform system, which would be very difficult to establish. Each Magistrate is absolutely independent, his discretion is absolutely unlimited, and he is only responsible in a very minor degree in a remote way to the Home Secretary for gross misfeasance; therefore it is very difficult to get people in the position of Magistrates to come to a uniform system. If the Magistrates made up their minds to support the police thoroughly in it, it could be done, but there are many Magistrates who will not listen to a charge of solicitation without the production of the individual solicited, that is other than the policeman. Everyone would hesitate to give evidence in a police court of solicitation, because many questions would arise; he would be cross-examined very likely as to what he was doing there at that hour: there would be unfair suspicion, and his friends would shrug their shoulders and say they had long suspected him of that sort of thing. In fact, the risk is too great for any person of any note at all.

45850. I think we can take it that where the actual complainant is required to attend personally it is almost absolutely impossible to obtain a conviction?—Short of that it could be done.

45851. Short of that I suppose the police could take more active steps to arrest the women, and, with the concurrence of the Magistrates, they could rid the streets of them very considerably?—Yes. I think this would be a favourable opportunity for me to mention a suggestion which was made to me on Friday, knowing that I was coming here to-day, by a very distinguished King's Counsel of great experience, and his suggestion was this: He thinks the arrest is a matter upon which the public fasten, and so he disapproves of it, and he thinks that if street solicitation and street prostitution could be dealt with by way of summons, and they could be fined 5s. to £1 and £5 for repeated offences it would be the best way of getting rid of it, but I only give that as his opinion, which he authorised me to give. I have no objection to mentioning the learned gentleman's name if the Commissioners think it necessary.

45852. Of course your knowledge of London would lead you to know that a great number of women would not be known to the police at all?—Of course that is the great difficulty, but it is not an insuperable difficulty. The police would say: "What is your name and address?" that would be reported to the station, inquiry would be made, and if it was a false name and address the individual would be sure to reappear before long, not in a matter of twenty-four hours, but during three or four days, because that is her hunting-ground, so that the difficulty would not be so very great.

45853. I should like to ask you about the process of cautioning. We have been told that the police are always instructed to give the woman a caution before they take her up, and the practice has generally been construed to mean that the caution must be given on the same day, with the result that a woman who is cautioned can move away to a very short distance to another beat, and thus get safely away for that day. Do you think a caution is necessary, especially when you are dealing with women who are fairly well known to be prostitutes?—I think it is advisable, on grounds of humanity, and on other grounds. I think it would not be desirable that it should be otherwise, and I think the liability to make mistakes and to misconception is so great that a caution is always desirable. As to moving away, it may be so for that day, but they are sure to come back again.

45854. But then the caution has to be given the same day. I do not think there is any law about caution?—No, but there is a law about practice.

45855. In practice a policeman has told us: "I could have taken the woman if I had not had to caution her"?—The first duty of the police is to prevent crime, and not to detect it and multiply offenders, and multiply prisoners. In many, many cases I have directed cautions to be given—in hundreds and thousands of cases. If people are going wrong it is much better to stop them by a timely word than to put the country to the expense of maintaining them in prison. I did not know there was any practice about the same day at all; I never heard of it; it certainly was not so in my time, at any rate; but, of course, the streets were not under me.

45856. If a woman is a well-known prostitute, and she has been cautioned once, and she continues to come the next day, and on the following day, she ought to be dealt with?—I do not think it would be by the Commissioner's orders that a caution must be given the same day. I think the constable must have had some vague idea about that; but if it is an idea I am convinced it was erroneous.

45857. (Chairman.) I wish to put to you just one or two more questions that occur to me. One arises out of something that Mr. Dickinson put to you. Have you heard of any case in which, when a constable has misconducted himself in some matter, instead of being dismissed he has been removed from the division in which he misconducted himself to another division?—Yes.

45858. Have you ever heard of those cases?—Yes, but they would be rather on the "Not proven" basis, which also is the Scotch verdict. The constable would be brought before the Commissioner, and if there was a reasonable doubt in the case he would say: "As there is a doubt in the case, I will not punish you, but I am not going to leave you there, I will transfer you to another division."

45859. One case has been proved before us. That was a case in which a constable had used his truncheon with some violence on a man, upon which he was sued in the County Court, and the man obtained damages in the County Court against the constable who used his truncheon. That, of course, as between those two parties, was absolutely proof of misconduct on the part of the constable. What the Commissioner appears to have done was simply to transfer that constable from the division in which the misconduct had taken place to another division. Assuming that there were extenuating circumstances, and that it was not a case for the absolute dismissal of the man from the Force, do you approve of that course of transfer by way of punishment?—I should not like in any way to criticise any case which was before the Commissioner without knowing the whole of the facts, but I can quite understand a case; in fact, I have a case very present in my mind at this minute in which that course was adopted, and it was quite a recent case, and I, knowing all the circumstances, should have adopted the same course.

45860. You say you yourself would have adopted that course?—Yes. It was a case affecting my own property, in which some people connected with me had been badly truncheoned; but then the constable had reasonable ground for entry into the premises, which belonged to me. There was a light in the house at night, a sick person was there, and people were up all night. The constable could not know that. The constable saw a light. He went into the garden, and electric bells which surrounded this property were rung, and the people who were on duty in the house attending to the sick person came out and were mistaken for burglars. This course was adopted—compensation was paid to the individuals, and the constable was transferred. There was a want of discretion, but there was a reasonable excuse for the action of the constable without going into full details as to why he thought they were burglars seeking to escape, instead of rushing to the electric alarm.

45861. You think there are cases in which, although a constable has been guilty of misconduct, it has been adequate punishment to transfer him to another division?—Yes, I think so, and this was a case absolutely in point. These were people fully dressed who ran out of the house because, they were on duty with a sick person in that house; they were the male nurses, and there was reasonable ground for the constable's action. He thought he had made a very great capture.

45862. It is obviously no punishment at all to a constable if he is only put to the expense of removing from one division to another?—Yes; it is a mark against promotion. It is put in the defaulters' sheet, "So-and-so transferred." It is a mark against him, and it all counts against promotion. No man is promoted without the whole of the circumstances of the defaulters' sheet being gone into, and some inquiry would be made upon seeing this, the papers in the case would be sent for, and the man would certainly have his promotion retarded for two or three years by a case of that kind. If he was a married man the inconvenience would be very great.

45863. Does it not strike you that there is some general inconvenience about that form of punishment, or that it ought to be one very rarely resorted to? Does it not look rather like saying: "You, Policeman X, have been found out in this division; we will not dismiss you, but we will put you in another division where they do not know you"? Does it not look as though it might be open to that observation?—Yes, it does at first sight; but I have known many men do well in a new atmosphere, and in new surroundings, by having this caution, this punishment, and so on.

45864. One of the learned Magistrates made some remarks from which I inferred that he thought it was not at all a sound and proper practice, and that is why I am asking this question. As I understand it, you put it upon this ground, that where dismissal from the Force would be too great a punishment to inflict on a constable who had erred, still there might be circumstances which would justify his being moved to another division where he might start de novo with new surroundings?—Yes, that is my view; and, at the same time, it is a punishment. I ought perhaps to say this. The Superintendent to whose division the man is transferred is always made fully aware of the circumstances attending the transfer, and he would take care that the man was placed in such surroundings and under such observation as that no harm would happen to the Force, that is, to the public. It is not as if one took a man and put him there without a word being said, or one said: "There you have an archangel to deal with," or anything of that kind.

45865. I was rather surprised to hear you say so broadly that transfer from one division to another division is a kind of black mark against a man, and hinders promotion, because I think it has been rather suggested sometimes before us that a man has been transferred from one division to another, not by way of promotion, but because he has been of such good service in doing a particular kind of work in one locality that he is transferred to another locality for that very reason?—But you will forgive my saying that the circumstances are quite different; the one case is entered on the defaulters' sheet, and the other case would not be. Whenever a constable's promotion, or anything to do with him, or his transfer to another division, or anything affecting his future, is considered, the first paper you look at is his defaulters' sheet, and if he was brought before his superior officers charged with misconduct you would see the result—"Transferred," and then you would send for the papers making the transfer, but if he were transferred to another division to deal with the cases that he is capable of dealing with it would not appear on his defaulters' sheet; it would rather appear on his merit record.

45866. Have you ever heard of this kind of occurrence—a constable dismissed for misconduct, and at the same time told that he will be re-engaged after a time if he behaves himself?—No, I have not heard that; in fact, I should doubt there being a case of that kind. In fact, the other day I had an application of the same sort, although I have no authority in any way—a man who wanted to get into a police force in which I am supposed to have some influence with wrote to me. I made inquiry into the circumstances; I found he had been compelled to resign from the Metropolitan Police, and I wrote to him at once and said: "You would not have the slightest chance of being accepted." Colonel Sir C. E. H. Vincent, K.C.M.G., C.B., A.D.C., M.P. 13 May 1907.

45867. You would not approve of that kind of arrangement?—No—quite impossible.

(Chairman.) The Commissioners are much indebted to you, Sir Howard, for your valuable evidence.

Mr. Charles John Vollhardt, sworn.

45868. (Chairman.) I think you are engaged at Swan and Edgar, Limited, of 9 to 13, Piccadilly, and 39 to 57, Regent Street?—Yes. Mr. C. J Vollhardt 45869. I think you are the secretary?—Yes.

45870. You have come here to give evidence on their behalf?—Yes.

45871. We all know that Regent Street, in which Messrs. Swan and Edgar's premises are situate, is a very busy and a very crowded thoroughfare of London?—Yes.

45872. How long have you known it?—I have known it for thirty years, but for twenty-one years as secretary of the company.

45873. Of course a street like that is much frequented by undesirable characters, male and female?—Yes.

45874. I suppose there is a considerable number of prostitutes and night-walkers to be observed in Piccadilly and Regent Street?—Yes.

45875. Near your premises?—Yes. Of course, I speak more particularly as to the daytime.

45876. Have you had ample opportunity of observing the way in which the police do their duty in Piccadilly and Regent Street during the years you have been connected with this firm?—Yes, very much opportunity.

45877. What opinion have you formed as to the way in which the police do their duty? Do they do it intelligently, discreetly, and efficiently?—Yes, absolutely.

45878. Will you mention in particular what you have noticed? You have sent in a statement. Perhaps you might look at it and read any paragraph that you think is necessary?—In reference to your last question I would read this portion of the statement. The large number of foreign women of a certain class that used to promenade the north side of Regent Street from the early afternoon until dusk is now very greatly diminished. Up to two or three years back such very familiar figures were certain of these promenaders, and so well known, too, by sight to ordinary people having business in the street that they must have been much more than well known to the police, and it was always a matter of surprise to us that the police were not vested with power to warn them off without waiting for a charge to be made, or witnessing an act of solicitation. Indeed, we have more than once expressed our wonder to officials at Vine Street Station. Possibly the police have recently been given a wider discretion, and hence the marked improvement.

45879. I gather what you mean by that is that the police find themselves hampered by the existing state of the law in dealing with any of these women unless they are prepared to make a charge, arrest, and take them to the police station?—Yes, that is the conclusion I should come to without a knowledge of the law.

45880. I understand that that evil has diminished of late years?—Yes, we think very greatly.

45881. Is there another evil of a similar kind which causes you inconvenience in your business?—I will not go so far as to say that it causes inconvenience in the business, except that we have had numerous complaints. May I read the next paragraph on that point?

45882. Yes?—Another, and apparently increasing evil, calling for police intervention is the molestation by well-dressed men of ladies walking in the West End shopping district, and particularly whilst looking in shop windows. We feel most strongly on this subject, as we have had numerous complaints from customers, friends, and relatives, some of whom have been absolutely terrified by the persistence of these blackguards. These complaints we have at various times reported to the police authorities, only to be answered with an expression of regret: "Yes, we know all about it, but are quite powerless unless a charge is made at the police station by persons molested"—an ordeal which not one lady in ten thousand would face. There are several of these pests well known as regular loiterers round our windows, whom we, as well as our outside employes, have seen raise their hats to ladies in the endeavour to attract their attention, or deliberately push against ladies walking along or looking in the shop windows, and then, by pretending apologies, try to entrap unsuspecting ones into conversation. We could point out one or more such gentry almost any fine afternoon, and most certainly think the police should have discretionary powers to caution them or to move them on, as well as to act against offenders on a simple complaint made on the spot, or on witnessing an act of annoyance, making the offence a "police charge." Prevention is better than cure, and we are firmly of opinion that even only a word of caution here and there from the police would be a sure means of mitigating a serious scandal and nuisance known to exist everywhere in the West End where lady shoppers are to be found.

45883. You have had occasion, I suppose, as you are in a large way of business, to prosecute from time to time individuals for theft, shop-lifting, and so on?—Yes, unfortunately.

45884. What kind of assistance have you had from the police?—Always the very best; we have always consulted the police as to the particular case, and we have always acted on their suggestion as to whether or not we should institute a prosecution, and not in one case of the many we have unfortunately had have we failed to obtain a conviction.

45885. (Mr. Dickinson.) What for?—Shop-lifting.

45886. (Chairman.) Cases which have been tried either at the Central Criminal Court or at the Quarter Sessions?—Quite so.

45887. Have you ever, yourself, spoken to a policeman and pointed out one of the men to whom you have referred of accosting ladies outside your shop windows?—Yes.

45888. You have actually spoken to a constable and pointed to the individual?—No, not I personally.

45889. That is what I asked you—whether you personally had done that?—No, not personally.

45890. Then what you are saying is said upon a conversation which you have had with the police?—I do not quite follow the question.

45891. I thought you said that you had spoken to the police authorities about this nuisance of men accosting women?—Yes. I do not say I pointed out to the police any of these loiterers we know by sight. I have lodged formal complaint at Vine Street with regard to it.

45892. I am asking you the question because one or two Magistrates, in response to a question of mine, have said that if such facts as you are suggesting could be proved in a particular case, and if there was any persistence on the part of the man cautioned by the constable, they thought the present law gave them sufficient power to deal with the case?—I did hear of a case in which one of our managers had pointed out a man to the policeman on duty just about last Christmas time, and this particular man was eventually arrested and fined the next morning at Marlborough Street, but we were not called to give any evidence in respect of it.

45893. Do you know what the charge was?—For annoyance.

45894. (Mr. Dickinson.) Are these men that you speak of whom you have seen accosting women men who are constantly there day after day?—Yes.

45895. Men whom you recognise?—Yes, men I know very well by sight.

45896. And whom the police could also recognise?—Certainly.

45897. Have you ever spoken to the police about those men?—No, I cannot say that I have.

45898. Why have you not?—As I have already said, I have spoken to the police about the matter generally, and I have always understood that they had no power; in fact, I spoke to Inspector Drew when he was Chief Inspector at Vine Street, and it was he who said the great difficulty was the possibility of making a mistake. I also spoke to another Detective Sergeant there, and he told me that some years ago, when he was an ordinary constable on duty in Piccadilly, there was a man there who was very well known to him, and he frequently saw him annoying ladies, and on one particular occasion he was so persistent with a lady that the lady turned round to him and struck off his hat with her parasol, kicked it into the road, and walked away. The man complained to this policeman, and the policeman said: "I know you very well by sight; I have seen you do that sort of thing frequently, and I think you only got what you deserved." This man took the policeman's number, and complained about him, and he was reprimanded.

45899. The policeman was?—The policeman was reprimanded.

45900. Now, at the present moment, you say there are men whom you know who are constantly annoying ladies in that part of London?—Yes, annoying respectable ladies.

45901. Men whom you could point out to the police?—Yes, absolutely.

45902. (Chairman.) I suppose these men of whom you are speaking are well-dressed men?—Yes.

45903. Have you any reason to believe that any of them are pickpockets and criminals who are pretending to be men of leisure, loafing, if I may use the word, about Regent Street?—No, decidedly not.

45904. You think they are simply men of leisure who come there for the purpose of accosting women?—Yes, I think so. We have had several ladies who have complained; customers have come in and complained to us, and have explained the circumstances. I went out myself one day with a lady, a daughter of one of our directors, who came in in a fainting condition; she had been molested by three men outside, who surrounded her when she was looking in the shop window, and they asked her if she would not go and take tea with them, and they made several suggestions to her to go for a walk, and otherwise. I went out with her, but, of course, there was no one to be seen, and she could not point them out, or I would have given them in charge. That is a very frequent occurrence.

45905. (Mr. Dickinson.) At that time of day are prostitutes about the streets, too?—There are a few on the other side of the street in the afternoon, and when I say "a few" I am speaking of those one gets to know by sight by seeing them every day.

45906. These men are not there, you think, for the purpose of meeting prostitutes?—Certainly not.

45907. They are there for the purpose of leading astray respectable women?—That is the idea.

(Chairman.) Thank you. The Commissioners are much indebted to you for giving evidence.

FIFTY-SECOND DAY.

Friday, 31*st May* 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esq. (Barrister-at law).
J. W. St. Lawrance Leslie, Esq. (Secretary).
J. F. Waley, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Mr. Edward Nicholas Fenwick Fenwick, sworn.

Mr. E. N. F. Fenwick

45908. (Chairman.) You are one of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates?—I am.

45909. When were you appointed?—I was appointed in 1887. Before that I had been a little over two years Stipendiary Magistrate at Bradford.

45910. To what Metropolitan Courts have you been attached since your appointment?—When I was first appointed I went to Hammersmith. From Hammersmith I went to Greenwich and Woolwich, and from Greenwich and Woolwich I went to Southwark. From Southwark I went to Marlborough Street, and from Marlborough Street I went to Bow Street.

45911. I think you have a memorandum relating to the evidence which we propose to ask you to give?—I have it before me.

45912. You see what the terms of reference are, and that our inquiry is limited to cases of drunkenness, disorder and solicitation in the streets?—Yes.

45913. I should like to ask you first of all a general question. How would you define the duties of constables in the Metropolis in regard to those classes of cases?—It is rather difficult to state shortly and accurately the extensive duties of the police with regard to the three classes named. Of course, they are really to be found set out in the numerous statutes dealing with the subjects. With regard to the first head, the duties which the police are most frequently called upon to perform are those relating to persons found drunk and incapable in the streets, and anybody found drunk on the highway and guilty of disorderly behaviour, and anybody found drunk in charge of a horse and cart, or drunk in possession of firearms. Those are in substance the cases that most frequently arise before us. In all these cases the offender is liable to be arrested by the police, and, except under some exceptional circumstances, I apprehend that it would be the duty of constables to arrest him. Under the head of disorder, the powers and duties of the police must depend very much on what the nature of the disorder is. I know of no statute which uses the word "disorder" alone. There is a statute dealing with the offence of being drunk and disorderly, but I know of no statute that makes it an offence to be "disorderly." By Section 64 of 2 and 3 Victoria, cap. 47, a police-constable may "take into custody all loose, idle and disorderly persons whom he shall find disturbing the public peace," and by Section 54, Sub-section 13, he may arrest any person making use of threatening or abusive or insulting words or behaviour whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned or is likely to be occasioned. He may also arrest any person making use of obscene language to the annoyance of the inhabitants. He may also apprehend under his powers as a police officer any person committing or being about to commit a breach of the peace, and I should suppose that, as a police officer, he would have the power to arrest any person seriously disturbing the public peace. Those are what I apprehend to be the duties and powers of the police with regard to disorder. Whether in any particular case an arrest should be made or proceedings should be taken by summons is a question which must, of course, be decided as each particular case arises. With regard to the statutes relating to prostitutes, there is first of all 2 and 3 Victoria, cap. 47, Section 54, Sub-section 11, whereby a police officer may arrest prostitutes being in any thoroughfare for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. By Sections 3 and 6 of the Vagrancy Act 5 George IV., any common prostitute wandering in the public streets or in any other place of public resort and behaving in a riotous or indecent manner may be arrested by the police. I apprehend that if it could be shown that the woman was so acting to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers in the one case, or in a riotous and indecent manner in the other, the police would be justified in arresting her and taking her into custody. Those are what I apprehend, as shortly as I can state them, to be the duties of the police under the three heads which you have put before me.

45914. You have now had a great many years' experience in trying many cases, and have come in contact with the police in the discharge of their duty and in the discharge of your duty a great deal. What opinion have you formed as to the manner in which the Metropolitan Police Force of all grades discharge their duties?—My own opinion is that they discharge them extremely well.

45915. With discretion?—In the words used in the memorandum, with discretion, honesty, and efficiency; most certainly, in my opinion, that is so.

45916. Have any cases of misconduct on the part of police officers come under your notice?—Do you mean recently?

45918. The constables?—The prisoner for assaulting the constables, and the constables for assaulting the prisoner. The result of it was that it went to the Sessions, I forget which, but I know in one case the grand jury threw out the bill, and in the other case the petty jury stopped the case before it had got very far. That was the end of that charge.

45919. Have you any comments or criticisms to make as to the organisation of the work of the Metropolitan Police Force?—No, none occur to me that I can usefully make.

45920. You do not think it is advisable to alter the regulations in any particular?—Do you mean the regulations in the White Book?

45921. Yes?—I must confess I have not gone over it sufficiently carefully to say I think no alteration should be made, but I have not noticed anything. I should have to go through it much more carefully and exhaustively.

45922. Then that answer leads to my next question, which is more detailed. Do you know the White Book?—Yes, I have looked through it.

45923. Do you think it is as well arranged as it might be? Perhaps that is putting the question a little too generally, but you see what is in my mind?—I will tell you what I have thought about it. I turned up the index to see if I could find something on this head. Supposing a constable wishes to find something about calling in a doctor at the station to a prisoner insensible from drink, etc. I could not find this under the head "Doctor." There is no such heading. Strictly speaking, perhaps, "Doctor" is not accurate. I then looked under the head of "Medical Man" or "Medical." I did not find it there. I looked up the head "Divisional Surgeon," and I could not find it there—I am speaking of the index. But under the head of "Prisoner" I did find "Treatment of prisoner." It is at page 258. That is the only thing that occurred to me about it.

45925. The word "Surgeon" ought to appear, but that is a question of whether the index is or is not a very good one, which is a topic on which all authors and public critics disagree, I think?—It occurred to me that an index for the use of the constable ought to be as full as possible, and I think a constable might well look under the head of "Doctor." But it is a very small point.

45926. Then with regard to arrests, do you think that the directions given as to the method of apprehending a prisoner are satisfactory?—I think so.

45927. That applies also, I suppose, to the directions as to the way in which the prisoner is to be conveyed or taken to the station?—I think so.

45928. Have any prisoners recently complained to you that they have been treated by constables irregularly and with undue violence in regard to arrests or during the time they are being taken to the station?—Not lately—not for some years. Not any complaint that had any substance at all in it. There may be some little things.

45929. Have you any reason for believing that constables use the power of summary arrest unnecessarily—I mean unnecessarily in the sense that they might just as well proceed by summons?—No, I have not the slightest reason for supposing they do.

45930. Do you recollect any instance in which you thought the constable ought to have proceeded by summons in which he proceeded by arrest?—I cannot recall one.

45931. Coming to the charge room, you are acquainted, I daresay, with the regulations as to the proceedings in the charge room?—Yes, generally. Of course, I have not been present when charges have been taken.

45932. We have it that there is an inspector in the charge room whose duty it is when a prisoner is brought in in custody to take the charge or refuse the charge which is made by the arresting constable. How do you define the duty of the inspector in the charge room?—I think that the duty of the inspector in the charge room is, first of all, to satisfy himself that the offence is one for which the constable was entitled to arrest, and then to see whether there is any credible evidence upon which the charge can be supported. If so, I think it is his duty to take the charge.

45933. Do you think that inspectors as a rule exercise a sound discretion in taking or refusing charges?—I have never seen any reason to doubt it.

45934. I suppose there is a percentage of cases in which you dismiss the charge?—Undoubtedly.

45935. In your judgment, does dismissing the charge involve the suggestion that there is any negligence on the part of the inspector, or impropriety with regard to his conduct?—Certainly not.

45936. I understand that you do not recollect any case in which you thought an inspector was clearly guilty of wrongful or negligent conduct in taking the charge?—I think I may go further, and say that I am perfectly certain that the charges I have had have been properly taken.

45937. Is that quite so? Take a case where a prisoner is charged with being drunk and disorderly, and you dismiss the charge because you think the prisoner is sober, does not your judgment rather reflect upon the conduct of the inspector?—I think not. One may come to the conclusion that the man was sober, and yet be of opinion that at the station the inspector was perfectly bonâ fide in the conclusion he came to. You may not agree with him. There may be a great difference among persons as to whether a man was sober; but the inspector sees the man at the time, and you who try the case have to act upon the evidence.

45938. But supposing the inspector is not called before you, and you listen to the prosecuting constable only, and you come to the conclusion the prisoner is not drunk, does not that rather suggest that the inspector, who was in a more favourable position, was rather negligent in taking the charge?—In such a case as that you would always call the inspector. He would be called.

45939. Then if the inspector is called and gives evidence on oath that the man was drunk, and you find against him, does not that reflect on the inspector?—I cannot recall a case where that has ever happened. I can recall a case where a man has been discharged, but that may be because it was his first offence, and you did not want to fasten a conviction upon him, and therefore you let him off easily. That is another case, of course.

45940. I understand that, but I was thinking of a case in which the constable who arrested the prisoner is called and the inspector is called, and still the magistrate finds the prisoner not guilty?—I do not remember ever having had such a case.

45941. You mean that so far as you can recollect you have always accepted and believed the evidence of the inspector and the constable if they both say that the man was drunk?—I would hear the inspector and the constable, and, if necessary, the medical man who examined him, if one did examine him.

45942. I quite see what is in your mind. What I was rather leading up to was this: it might be, might it not, that the inspector, from a kind of professional bias, would be rather too prone to take a charge that an unbiassed person like a magistrate if he was in the charge room would not take. Do you think there is any ground for that suggestion?—I do not think so.

45943. You have told me what you think the duty of the inspector is, and I rather gather that he has got first to consider whether the charge is one in respect of which the constable had the power of arrest summarily and which amounts to an offence punishable in your Court, and, secondly, to see whether the charge is supported by credible evidence. Of course, he does not take evidence on oath?—Exactly.

45944. Then I understand your view would be that the inspector is not discharging a judicial duty?—No, not strictly speaking, I think. Of course, he does exercise some discretion, but I do not think, strictly speaking, he could be described as a judicial officer or his office as a judicial office.

45945. Will you look at page 4 of our syllabus? You will see we have put down a question there about the possible damage to reputation which is sometimes sustained by innocent persons in consequence of being publicly put upon their trial for these street offences. Are you of opinion that some reform is desirable in the direction of making the proceedings in the charge room, I will not say more orderly, but of a more searching character?—In what direction?

45946. At present the inspector, as I gather from the evidence which has been given before us in numerous cases, simply listens to what the arresting constable has to say; he then listens to anything the prisoner has to say, and he hears what anybody who may have accompanied the prisoner and the constable has to say?—Yes, that would be his duty.

45947. But might there not be cases in which the inspector who is desirous of being scrupulously fair might be doubtful as to whether he ought to accept the charge or not to accept the charge?—I think myself that the golden rule is that directly a man is arrested and is in the hand of the police he should be taken with the least possible delay before a magistrate sitting in open court and discharging his duties under the light of publicity.

45948. That I think is common ground, that he should be taken before the magistrate as soon as is reasonably practicable, but what is suggested to us, and what we all know does arise, is that a man late at night is taken to a charge room and is accused, say, of being drunk and disorderly. He vehemently denies it, and it may be that from his position—he may be a clerk in a City firm, he may be a public man, or some person of a very good position, and the mere fact of being placed upon his trial publicly the next morning, even if the magistrate finds him innocent, might inflict great damage upon him. That is the case I am putting. Supposing in such a case as that the inspector is doubtful as to whether he ought to take the charge, do you think there ought to be any reform of the proceedings in the charge room?—I think the inspector must make up his mind whether he will take the charge or not, but if he is doubtful I think he must let it alone and decline to take it.

45949. You would suggest that he should simply take the name and address of the prisoner, and let the constable apply for the summons if he likes?—Yes, if he likes. He must make up his mind whether to take it or not. If he thinks he ought not to take it, he should let the man go, and the constable may apply for a summons

45951. Do you think that that kind of responsible duty ought to be discharged by an Inspector of Police?—I think that they do it remarkably well.

45952. It may be that the particular Inspectors have got an adequate knowledge of law and that they are very experienced men, but I am now looking at it from a broader point of view than the actual existing state of circumstances in our police courts. I was asking you your opinion upon the question whether you think it would be expedient, instead of having an Inspector of Police—that is to say, a man who has been in the force himself for some years and been promoted from the lower grades—that there should be placed in the charge room another kind of public officer appointed, say, by the Home Office and not by the Commissioner of Police?—Of course I do not know how that would work in practice, but I see no reason to suppose that at present the Inspectors do not discharge their duties with every satisfaction.

45953. Then you are not in a position to recommend such an alteration as I have suggested?—No, I am not, certainly. On the contrary, I think they do the work very well.

45954. Do you think there would be any advantage in giving the Inspector in the charge room power to bind over the prisoner to appear at a later time before him, say the next day, in the charge room, so that he might finally determine whether he would accept or refuse the charge?—I think that would be a dangerous thing to do. I think it would open the door to every kind of suggestion of favouritism and corruption. It would afford an opportunity of whipping up all sorts of witnesses and statements not made upon oath, would be pressed upon the Inspector. Every effort made to induce him to decline to accept the charge. You create, in my opinion, the impression that there is one law for A and another for B, and you would have a complaint by X that his case had not been adjourned while Y's had been. I think that would be the result. My own opinion is, let the case stand or fall, as it now does, by the evidence that is produced at the station when the man is brought there. In some cases no doubt a certain amount of harm would be inflicted upon a person by a charge being entertained that ought not to have been taken. I believe, however, such cases are extremely rare. A man who is discharged in open court when a case cannot be made out of course suffers to some extent. When a man is arrested in the streets it becomes known that he has been taken to the station, and if the man appears the following day or the same day in open court the matter is cleared up; everybody knows exactly for what he was arrested and taken into custody, and how it was that he was discharged. But if, on the other hand, the matter is to be dealt with at the station privately after a delay, it may be after some hours or some days, you may be pretty sure that rumour would soon be busy, and all sorts of theories would be put about as to the nature of the charge and why it had not been proceeded with, and the result would be that in 99 cases out of 100 certainly more damage would be done to that man than if he had been proceeded against under the present system. I am certainly opposed to any suggestion that would have the result of causing any delay in bringing the man before the Magistrate. Publicity I believe is the only safeguard you have—complete publicity. Open court, the Press represented, and the public there.

45955. So much for the charge room. Do you ever hear prisoners complain of their treatment in the cells at the police station?—I have, of course, from time to time had complaints, but I cannot recall any one in particular. I do not recollect any in which I was satisfied.

45956. No complaint which attracted your attention?—No.

45957. When I say attracted your attention, I mean attracted your attention to such a degree as to make you inquire further into the matter?—No, I have not. Of course, as soon as a man complains that he has been ill-treated by the police when being charged with being drunk and disorderly, or whatever the charge is, one thinks it one's duty to investigate it thoroughly, and his complaint often occupies the greater part of the time. One must do the best one can by offering him an adjournment to get his witnesses and by seeing that he is let out on bail in order to do so, and send yourself for such witnesses as you can; for instance, the barman of the public-house where he was put out, or whatever the case may be.

45958. What kind of complaints of ill-treatment in the cells are you thinking of?—I have had no complaints about ill-treatment in the cells.

45959. With regard to bail, do you find that prisoners ever complain that the facilities for obtaining bail were insufficient?—No, I have never had any complaint of that sort.

45960. By that I mean that the police did not send for their friends quickly enough, or did not take the recognisances at once on the arrival of the sureties?—No, I have never had any complaints of that kind.

45961. With regard to medical attendance on prisoners in the class of case that we have to deal with, do you think the regulations are satisfactory?—I do as they at present stand. I have seen all the regulations, I think, and they appear to me to be satisfactory.

45962. Do you recollect any case in which there was, in your opinion, improper neglect to send for medical assistance?—No; no such case has ever come before me that I know of or that I can recall.

45963. What is the practice in your court with regard to the use of medical certificates in cases where the charge has been one of drunkenness against the prisoner and the divisional surgeon has been sent for to the station?—I do not look at the certificate.

45964. You do not use it at all?—No, I do not see it. If I want the doctor I ask, "Was the doctor called to this man at the station?"

45965. And supposing the answer is "Yes, a doctor was summoned"?—Then I would ask the doctor to attend, and put the case back for his attendance.

45966. Who is to pay for the doctor in that case?—It depends upon the result. If I am satisfied the man was drunk and the charge is made out, I should call upon the man to pay the 7s. 6d. or the 3s. 6d., according to the time at which the doctor was called.

45967. Would you kindly explain to us how the doctor's charge comes to be treated, as it were, as part of the fine or as costs?—It is generally, I think, treated as costs. If you wish to make the fine small, you put on the doctor's attendance fee as costs—some Magistrates treat the doctor's fee as part of the fine. Then it ceases to be the doctor's fee as costs and becomes part of the fine. It is only a way of avoiding piling up costs. If you wish to penalise a man 10s. and there is 7s. 6d. for the doctor's fee, you can fine him 10s. and let the doctor's fee go, or you might make it 2s. 6d. fine and 7s. 6d. the doctor's fee if you liked.

45968. How does the order appear in your book?—If you fine him 2s. 6d. and 7s. 6d. costs you enter it "2s. 6d. fine and 7s. 6d. costs." You would arrive at the same result by entering it as a fine of 10s. There is a little difference—I am not quite sure I am telling you correctly about this. The Receiver would know more about it than I do, but I believe in a case of drunkenness the fine goes to one fund and the costs would go to another. I think one goes to the Police Superannuation Fund and the other goes to the Police Court Fund.

45969. Then really the matter is nothing much to do with you, but it has to do with keeping the accounts?—Yes, they both go to the Receiver.

45970. I think you will find on page 5 of our memorandum we have made a note which we took from Sir Edward Henry's evidence of the statutory provisions under which these cases within our terms of reference are dealt with by the Court?—Yes, I have seen that, and it seems to set out correctly the statutes under which we proceed.

45971. Do you find any special difficulty in the application of these statutory provisions to any individual case? I mean, rather a difficulty arising from the form of the statute or the language of the statute?—No, practically I think not. Practically I think no difficulty arises.

45972. I think that probably no great difficulty arises in the drunk and disorderly cases. I suppose that you cannot give any definition of drunkenness as clearly showing what you in your practice mean by a man being drunk?—No, I do not think you can define it, but I think, according to everyday experience and common sense, there are a great many cases in which you have no difficulty in saying whether a man is drunk or sober. There are difficult cases on the line, of course.

45973. It must be decided in each case with reference to the evidence in each case?—I think so. I know of no other way.

45974. In solicitation cases under Sub-section 11 of Section 54 of the Police Act or under the Vagrancy Act I gather there are three material allegations required to be proved by the prosecution before a case is made out, first that the defendant is a common prostitute or nightwalker, secondly that there is loitering or being in a public thoroughfare or place for the purpost of prostitution or solicitation, and thirdly that the solicitation, etc., must be to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers. Those seem to be the three material allegations?—I think so.

45975. What evidence do you usually accept as making a primâ-facie case with regard to the first allegation that the woman is a prostitute?—You only have the evidence of the constable. Assuming the woman denies it and requires you to prove your case against her, you generally have only the evidence of the constable who says he has seen her there on previous occasions soliciting men, and that he has known her for two or three months frequenting that neighbourhood, and that he has seen her on some occasions going up to and accosting men. My experience is they generally caution the woman and then after the caution they arrest her. That is the primâ-facie evidence that you have. To prove that it was to the annoyance of the inhabitants you have the evidence of the constable that she caught hold of the man's arm and the man by some gesture pushed her away or turned away or drove her away, or something of that sort. From that we draw the inference that it was to the annoyance of the passenger.

45976-7. You would not convict unless there was some evidence that the person solicited was annoyed?—Under that section you must have it.

45978. Would you accept a simple gesture as sufficient?—I think so. If a woman was seen by a constable to take hold of the man and address to him some words asking him to go with her, and the man turned away and pushed her away, I think one may take that as some evidence of annoyance.

45979. Supposing he simply quickened his pace and walked past her?—You may put cases that are on the line and as to which it is extremely difficult to answer, and with regard to which one man might answer one way and another the other.

45980. I think you have virtually answered the next question I was going to put to you, whether you ever required the evidence of the person solicited or annoyed?—No, we do not require it, and I do not think we should get it if we wanted it. He would not come.

45981. Do you remember Sub-section 13 of Section 54?—That is the section dealing with indecent conduct.

45982. Indecent words or behaviour likely to lead to a breach of the peace?—Yes.

Mr. E. N. F. Fenwick.

45983. Evidence has been given before us tending to show that at Marlborough Street Police Court women who have been accosting men or alleged to have been accosting men are frequently charged under Sub-section 13 because, as I understand it, of the difficulty of proving that the defendant belongs to the class of common prostitutes or nightwalkers. What do you say as to the propriety of charging a prisoner under Sub-section 13 in that class of case?—When I was at Marlborough Street, where this class of offence is more common than at any other court that I know of, one had to consider from time to time how to cope with it, and I had to consider, amongst other things, whether one could call in aid that Sub-section 13. Personally I did not use it, but I am not prepared to say that it cannot be used. I am not prepared to say that conduct such as we have been considering would not amount to conduct which would be calculated to provoke a breach of the peace, especially when you remember the case of Bonnor v. Lushington. One was uncertain whether the Court of Queen's Bench would hold it to be primâ-facie evidence of riotous and indecent behaviour where a woman had caught hold of a man's arm. But the Court of Queen's Bench said: "It's a question of fact. The Magistrate found it as a fact and the Quarter Sessions did not find it." It is a question of fact, and I should not like to say you could not take that view of Sub-section 13, but I have not used it myself.

45984. What was rather in my mind was this, whether mere solicitation, supposing the words were not in themselves obscene or indecent, would be considered as evidence of indecent behaviour?—I have considered it, but I have not used it. I am not prepared to say with confidence that the sub-section might not apply.

45985. I think I follow you. You mean that for a woman in a public place to invite a man to go home with her to her lodgings if it is done so that it might possibly be heard by somebody else is primâ-facie evidence of indecent behaviour?—I think the Court of King's Bench might so hold, but I do not feel very confident about it. I think the best comment I can make upon it is that I do not use it myself.

45986. In one of the cases that came before us the Magistrate did, under Sub-section 13, in effect find the prisoner guilty, and the only evidence was of ordinary solicitation, coupled with the suggestion of annoyance on the part of one, or it might be more of the persons accosted. What occurred to my mind was this. How could that indecent behaviour tend to provoke a breach of the peace? Where is the evidence of that? What do you say to that?—I should not like to say any more than I have said. I should not do it myself, but I would not say that a Magistrate who did so was wrong. I think there may very well be a difference of opinion with regard to that. You have given me an A B C case. There might be many cases in which the surrounding circumstances might bring the woman within Sub-section 13, but putting it to me as you do as an A B C case, I should not deal with it under that sub-section myself. I should not like, however, to go so far as to say that a Magistrate who did deal with it under that sub-section was wrong.

45988. We have had evidence that a considerable number of disorderly houses have been suppressed, at any rate in the Soho district, during the last few years. What effect do you think the closing of disorderly houses has had on those women carrying on their avocation in the streets?—I should not like to express any opinion about that. I really do not know. I have not formed any opinion about that.

45989. You have not found a sudden increase in the number of solicitation cases since disorderly houses have been suppressed?—I have said that at Bow Street during the last six years I have not noticed much difference, except that during the last twelve months there has been a great falling-off; in fact, there have been very few of them.

45990. Do cases in which women complain of having been solicited or molested by men often come before you?—I cannot recall a case of a woman complaining. I have had cases of men charged with attempting to pick pockets where, on investigating the charge, I have come to the conclusion that it was not a bona-fide case of attempting to pick pockets, although it looked very like it, but it was a case of a man behaving in an indecent manner. I have never had a case in which a woman has complained that a man has insulted her in the street.

45991. Supposing a woman came before you, and said "I complain of that man, and my ground of complaint is that he came up to me and solicited me for improper purposes, and I told him to go away," would that be an offence with regard to which you would have any power?—I would then call in aid Sub-section 13, and deal with the man under that. I should say it was calculated to provoke a breach of the peace if a man went up to a woman in the street and grossly insulted her in that way, and I should deal with him under Sub-section 13.

45992. Then you think if a lady went up to a constable and said, "That man has asked me to go home with him, and behaved very improperly," do you think the constable ought to arrest him?—I must be consistent. Under Sub-section 13 it would be an offence for which a constable may arrest if committed within his view.

45993. Suggestions have come to us from various quarters that there is bribery of the police by prostitutes, or, to put it the other way, that the constables blackmail these unfortunate women. Have you any ground for believing that such a practice is common or widespread?—No, I have never heard any complaints made by any women of blackmailing by a constable. I have heard them complain and say that a constable has asked them to go round the corner. I have had cases which I think may throw some light upon it. I had a case I remember at South-West London last summer where a prisoner was brought in charged with representing himself to be a member of the Metropolitan Police Force. The facts were that a man and his sweetheart had been on Clapham Common, talking together, on a seat, and the prisoner came up to them and said he was a member of the Metropolitan Police Force, Scotland Yard, and he had been watching them for some time, and he frightened these people out of their lives. Then he said they must accompany him to the police station. On going towards the police station, he said the matter might be settled if they give him 5s., or something of that sort, and the man gave him 5s., and the prisoner was proceeding to go away; but luckily two detectives had been watching him, and went up and apprehended him. They then went on and overtook the man and the woman, and brought them back, and the prisoner was charged and pleaded guilty. One can see that had these detectives not come up, and arrested the prisoner, and he had got away with the 5s., that man and woman would have gone about and said to their friends, "We were blackmailed by a member of the Metropolitan Police Force." I think it quite possible that some of those charges may arise in that way, but I do not know.

45994. With regard to blackmailing of bookmakers by the police, have you ever heard any bookmaker complain that the police took money from him to allow him to carry on business on his pitch?—No, I have never had a complaint of that kind.

45995. Has anything ever come under your notice to lead you to think that there might be such a practice?—No, nothing has ever occurred that I can recall; in fact, I am safe in saying that nothing has occurred which would lead me to think that the police blackmail bookmakers. I have seen cases in the papers, but I have never had any experience of it myself.

45996. With regard to the duties of constables as to prosecuting charges, will you kindly tell us what the duty of the constable is? Will you kindly tell us what the law is on the matter?—The constable who signs the charge sheet and makes the charge comes into the box and gives his evidence.

45997. I suppose the burden of calling any witnesses that he may wish to be heard in support of the charge is also cast upon him?—To some extent, yes; but it is really very much in the hands of the Magistrate as to calling witnesses. The Magistrate watches over the case, and if he thinks more witnesses for the prosecution ought to be called, or witnesses are not there, he directs the constable to bring them. If there are witnesses the prisoner wants to call, the Magistrate also directs the constable to fetch those witnesses.

45998. I was not thinking so much of what actually takes place in Court as of the legal aspect of the case before you, and the relation of the constable to the proceedings. We have, of course, no real Public Prosecutor in this country; we have no Procurator Fiscal as they have in Scotland. Supposing one man assaults another in the street, I suppose the normal and the ordinary course of events would be for the man to come before you and inform you of it. I suppose the aggrieved citizen would swear an information, and you would grant a summons against the person alleged to have committed the assault. I suppose that is the ordinary procedure before a Justice of the Peace, or a Petty Sessional Court?—Yes, I think that is right.

45999. I am not seeking to impose any view of the law upon you, but I want you to tell me what you think is the normal proceeding at common law before a Justice of the Peace?—That is the usual course. The individual comes and applies for a summons.

46000. A constable has under the statute special rights that an ordinary citizen has not got in regard to the offences which are mentioned in the various statutes?—Certainly.

46001. If he exercises the power of summary arrest, and takes the prisoner to the charge room and charges him there, the charge is accepted, and then the constable the following morning comes up before you. What is the process? How would you describe it? I am using the word "process" in its technical form What is the process which gives you jurisdiction?—I do not know that I quite follow you.

46002. I know in the country, and Mr. Whitmore also knows, that if you sit at Petty Sessions, in most cases you have the summons before you, and that summons has been very likely granted by you, or by one of your friends belonging to the same Petty Sessional Division. When you take your seat you have the summons before you?—If it is a charge we have what is called the Register before us. The Register is really a copy of the charge sheet. The charge sheet contains the charge which the constable preferred at the time he brought the man to the station. We have the particulars copied into our register. Registers did not exist before the year 1879. Every Magistrate before that worked on the charge sheet which was before him, but the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, said that registers were to be kept, and registers are now kept, and I think the majority of Magistrates work, as I work, with the register before them which contains most of the particulars in the charge sheet. The charge sheet comes from the station.

46003. Does the Clerk in your Court copy into the Register from the various charge sheets he has received the particulars before you take your seat?—Yes, and the Magistrate has it on the table before him.

46004. But even before the Act of 1879 I gather that the charge sheet was no part of the proceedings in the Court. It was not process in the strict legal sense, but only a document prepared for the information of the police court, if I may so put it?—That is all; but primarily the charge sheet shows the charge which the constable will go into the box and prefer.

46005. What I was leading up to was this: supposing the charge in the charge sheet is a charge of drunkenness and disorderly conduct under Section 12 of the Licensing Act, 1872?—It might be, of course, under 2 and 3 Victoria, c. 47.

46006. Yes?—I will take the Licensing Act.

46007. The other will suit me for the purposes of my question quite as well. The case then comes before you. You might be of opinion that the defendant was sober, but still that he had been guilty of disorderly conduct under Sub-section 13 of Section 54, for instance?—Yes.

46008. Guilty of riotous and indecent behaviour calculated to provoke a breach of the peace?—Yes.

46010. I do not quite see how the mere telling the prisoner would alter the extent of your jurisdiction. I am not in the least saying there is any doubt about it, but I do not quite see how the mere telling the prisoner anything can be a factor that alters the extent of your jurisdiction?—It does not, except that in fairness he ought to know the new charge against him.

46011. That goes to the method of exercising the jurisdiction. The answer I expected you would give was that you as a Justice of the Peace listen to what the constable says in the box?—So we do, of course.

46012. If you think that the charge has been wrongly described in the charge sheet, that is a mere matter of irrelevancy?—Certainly.

46013. You can deal with the offence disclosed by the evidence before your court?—Certainly.

46014. Then I am right in that view of the law, am I?—Yes.

46015. Then in that case the charge sheet becomes a document of no real importance?—Of no real importance. I have the register, and I see the charge which will be made when the prisoner is brought into court.

46016. Some one or more of your learned colleagues has told us about marking the charge sheet where there is a variation of the charge. Is that a practice that you follow?—I do not have the charge sheet before me; I have the register.

46017. Supposing the offence charged in the charge sheet is an offence under the Licensing Act, 1872, Section 12; if a charge under another section has been absolutely proved against the prisoner, what would you do with the register?—Strike out the charge as entered and insert the new charge.

46018. That is the correct practice?—Certainly, because then it is a true record of what he is charged with and convicted of.

46019. Do you ever think that constables are placed at a disadvantage in the police court in your court where the other side are represented by counsel or solicitor?—I do not think so.

46020. You see yourself that the proceedings are properly conducted?—Yes, unless it is a difficult case when there is a remand, and then a solicitor appears for them.

46021. Then I gather from that that you think in this class of cases that we are dealing with in our inquiry there is no reason to think that matters would be improved by the more frequent allowance of counsel or solicitor to the constable?—I do not think so; I do not think it is necessary.

46023. I mean when you are sitting in your court. I am not thinking of a case of alleged misconduct in regard to a matter which is sub judice in your court. Do you find that people frequently come and complain of the police in general or of a particular constable?—I have never had a case. I have never had a case of a member of the public coming and complaining of the conduct of the police.

46024. Then it is no good my asking you whether, if such a complaint were made to you, you would communicate with the Home Office or with the Chief Commissioner. You say you have never had a case of that kind?—I never have.

46025. Have you ever had occasion, in consequence of something you observed in a case before you, to think that there has been such misconduct on the part of the constable as to justify you in calling the Chief Commissioner's attention, or some other officer's attention, to it?—Never to the Chief Commissioner. I have had cases where I thought a constable sometimes acted with a want of tact, and I have seen the Superintendent, and I have pointed out to him that he had better have a word with him. He has said, "Do you wish it reported to the Chief Commissioner?" and I have said "No, I do not wish that; I think the man only wants a word to tell him to be more discreet in the future." They have always come and told me the result, and I have been satisfied with what they have done. But those have not been serious matters at all. They have been matters of advice to a young officer rather than anything else.

Mr. E. N. Fenwick. 46026. Does any other topic occur to you upon which you might help us?—I do not think so.

31 May 1907. 46027. (Chairman.) The Commissioners, Mr. Fenwick, are very much obliged to you for your valuable evidence?—Thank you very much.

Mr. Harry Titterton, sworn.

Mr. H. Titterton. 46028. (Chairman.) You are the Chief Clerk of the Westminster Police Court?—I am.

46029. Do you remember a case coming before the court in which Mrs. Louise Bramham or Braham was the defendant?—Yes. I have here a copy of the register.

46030. How have you got it spelt there?—Braham.

46031. Is that the charge sheet you have got there?—No, I have an extract from the Magistrate's register.

46032. Perhaps you will kindly explain to us how you deal with the charge sheet when it comes from the station. That charge sheet came from one of the stations in Lambeth, did it not?—That would be so. I see the charge was made in South Lambeth Road.

46033. And the cases arising at that station are sent on to Westminster Police Court?—Yes, we take cases from that part.

46034. That charge sheet in the ordinary course would be brought by a police officer from the station to your court?—Quite so.

46035. That is before the Magistrate sits, I suppose?—That is so.

46036. Then do you copy the particulars in the charge sheet into the register?—As a matter of fact, by arrangement the gaoler of the court has all the charge sheets before him, and he copies them into the Magistrate's register.

46037. The gaoler of the court?—Yes.

46038. Not the warder at the station, but the gaoler at the court?—Yes, the court gaoler.

46039. About what time do the charge sheets arrive at the court?—I cannot say exactly what time they arrive at the court, but they arrive in time to be entered in the Magistrate's register before 10 o'clock.

46040. So that when you come to take up your duties as Clerk of the court you find the register filled in from the charge sheets?—That is so.

46041. Will you kindly read the copy you have got from the register in Mrs. Braham's case?—Yes. "No. 5.—Name of informant or complainant, Walter Atkinson, 800 W, age 36. Name of defendant, Louise Braham, married. Nature of offence or of matter of complaint, disorderly conduct at South Lambeth Road. Time, 12.25 a.m., 6th; bailed 1.50 a.m., 6th. Minute of adjudication, discharged. Magistrate, J. Sheil."

46042. That is the whole of the register?—That is the whole of the register. I have seen the charge sheet, and I know how it is marked exactly. I saw it last November.

46043. We do not seem to be able to lay our hands on this charge sheet at the moment, but it appears from the shorthand note what is in it?—Yes.

46044. The charge sheet would be exactly the same as the Magistrate's register?—Practically the same.

46045. Under the head of what the Magistrate did with the case, the word I think is "Dismissed"?—"Dismissed" or "Discharged—insufficient evidence." I think you will find that is so.

46046. The word on the charge sheet appears to have been "Disd."?—"Dismissed or "Discharged."

46047. Then there were other words added on to that which were read as the words "insufficient evidence"?—That is right; that you will find is so.

46048. Who wrote those words?—I wrote those words.

46049. I thought you had nothing to do with the charge sheet?—Yes, but not with the register. As Mr. Fenwick said just now, the Clerk has the charge sheets before him; it gives the names and addresses, and so on; and in my court, and in all the courts I have been at, it is my duty to mark the charge sheet with the Magistrate's decision.

46050. But the Magistrate on the register simply seems to have written "Discharged"?—Yes.

46052. Yes?—I have made a reference to what was stated here because a learned Commissioner, I think, upon the hearing of that case remarked that the charge sheet was marked "insufficient evidence," and he asked who was responsible for that entry, adding, "Only it looks to me as if someone had put that in afterwards." Then Mr. Muir stated that it was in my handwriting, and I think you yourself said, "In this case the entry is quite an incorrect note of what Mr. Sheil is reported to have said—'Discharged; not a word against her.'"

46053. Do you dispute that the Magistrate used those words?—After this lapse of time I should be sorry to say, but I do not recollect anything of the case. I think Mr. Sheil discharged her without comment. In marking the charge sheet as I did I acted solely for the purpose of affording the police information in the preparation of their returns of crime for the annual volume of Judicial Statistics. In furnishing this information I am obeying the instructions contained in a circular letter issued by Mr. Asquith, the Home Secretary, on the 9th February, 1893. Shall I hand that in?

46054. Is it printed?—Yes. May I read it?

46055. I think you had better read it?—"Whitehall, 9th February, 1893." This is addressed to the then Mr. Albert de Rutzen: "Sir,—I am directed by Mr. Secretary Asquith to inform you that, on the recommendation of a Committee which has for some time been considering the revision of Judicial Statistics annually prepared in this Office, he has made considerable additions and alterations in the forms of the Returns of Crime, which are rendered annually to this Office by the County and Borough Police Forces in pursuance of Section 14 of the County and Borough Police Act, 1856. In particular in the returns of the cases dealt with by Courts of Summary Jurisdiction they will be required to show more accurately and in somewhat greater detail than in the past the results of the proceedings before the Magistrates and the sentences passed on persons summarily convicted. The preparation of these returns is a matter of some difficulty for the police, and there may be a question whether, as suggested by the Committee, the duty might not more appropriately be imposed on the Justices' Clerks. Though Mr. Asquith is not disposed at the present time to propose so considerable a change, involving an appreciable addition to the work of the Clerks at all Petty Sessional Courts, he feels that he is justified in asking that the Magistrates and their Clerks should as far as possible assist the police engaged in preparing the returns of cases heard at the Petty Sessional Courts. There are many instances in which the police, unless assisted by the Magistrates and their Clerk, would have considerable difficulty in knowing how a case is dealt with—e.g., in knowing whether a defendant is released under the Probation of First Offenders Act, 1887, or under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879—or, again, in distinguishing between a case where the Magistrates discharge a person charged with an indictable offence because there is no primâ-facie case for committal for trial and one where they try the defendant summarily and dismiss the charge. Mr. Asquith hopes therefore that you will afford police officers all the facilities you can for obtaining the information necessary to enable them to prepare their returns correctly, and that you will also assist them with your advice if occasion should require it. He would suggest that for this purpose the officers preparing the returns should have access to the Register of the Court kept under Section 22 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, which might frequently be of use to them in correcting their notes or returns.—I am, Sir, your obedient servant, E. Leigh Pemberton."

46056. That refers to the marking of the particulars of the Register, and not of the charge sheet?—I am going to explain that by-and-bye. It says you are to give the police information necessary to enable them to prepare their returns. I am going to explain to you how they asked for that information, if I may. In cases where charge sheets are marked simply "Dismissed," the police send them back to the Court (sometimes after a considerable time has elapsed—sometimes after even a lapse of six months) with printed memoranda applicable to each case (as to which further information for statistical purposes is required) attached. I produce specimens of such forms marked respectively 4, 5, 6, 7, and 8. I think you have those before you.

46057. Yes?—Form 8 would be used in summary cases such as that of Mrs. Braham.

46058. That comes from the Executive branch: "Charge sheet No. (—) attached. Will you be good enough to state whether the prisoner (—) referred to in No. (—) charge was discharged under Section 16, Sub-section 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, or in consequence of the evidence being insufficient to support the charge." Section 16 refers to a case in which a Magistrate may be of opinion that the case is proved, but it is either so trifling or something of that sort that he enters it "Discharged"?—Simply "Discharged." That is so.

46059. The object of that is to distinguish between such a case—that is to say, a case in which the Magistrate thinks the prisoner was actually guilty, but thinks he ought to be discharged—and a case in which the Magistrate has come to the conclusion that the prisoner is innocent?—Quite so, or it may be that there was no evidence to support it.

46060. The words put in the form are "The evidence being insufficient to support the charge"?—I am in no way responsible for that at all.

46061. I quite follow that. What you say is that the words "Insufficient evidence in this case" are put into the charge sheet by you in compliance with the request contained in this Form 8?—Quite so.

46062. And that you are not responsible for the form of words?—Quite so. May I finish my explanation? As the case was clearly not dealt with under Section 16, Sub-section 1 (which applies to cases which the Court thinks proved, but of a trifling nature), I marked the sheet "Insufficient evidence" as a short notification that it came under the latter head—"Dismissed" head. A reference to the form of Criminal Statistics will show that the case could come under only one of two heads—"Charge dismissed" or "Defendant discharged under Summary Jurisdiction Act 1879, Section 16, Sub-section 1," and any entry was made simply to enable the police to put it under the proper heading.

46063. Your position is very clear and your explanation adequate, but still I do not see why the words "insufficient evidence" are brought in at all?—If I may say so, I should have suggested Section 16, sub-section 1, or not.

Mr. H. Titterton.

31 May 1907.

46064. Quite. I have looked at the Criminal Statistics, and the only headings there are "Discharged," "Dismissed," or "Discharged under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879"?—If I have refrained from saying anything about the case it is because I did not think my evidence was required on that point. Further, my great object was to make it clear that this case was not marked for any special purpose, but in the ordinary course.

46065. This Form 8 comes, as it seems to me, from Scotland Yard?—That is so.

46066. From the Executive Branch?—What I want to emphasise is that my information (it may be a wrong entry or not) would enable the police solely to put it under one of the two heads.

46067. The form is a little hard on the prisoner, I think; it seems to exclude cases where the Magistrate decides the case on the merits in favour of the prisoner?—It does not appear as a separate heading in the statistics, as far as I can find; I have searched them through, and I can find nothing. The two heads are as I have stated.

46068. (Mr. Whitmore.) Who is the head of the Statistical Department?—I think Superintendent Moore is the head of the Statistical Department.

46069. (Chairman.) You see what was in our minds when we saw this entry in the charge sheet. I can understand a Magistrate may say in dismissing a case that he said in Mrs. Braham's case—"Prisoner discharged—not a word against her." That is somewhat contemptuously dismissing the charge. I can understand that. I can also understand a case in which a Magistrate says, "The burden of proof is upon the constable; there is only the oath of one constable against the prisoner; I do not think the evidence is sufficient, and the case is dismissed." That is dealing from a different point of view with the case of the prisoner in the dock. The legal effect is "Discharged," and if a case is dismissed in consequence of the evidence being insufficient to support the charge it looks to me as though it would come under that class of case?—I suppose the greater includes the less—if there was no evidence. I trust my explanation has been satisfactory.

(Chairman.) We have your explanation of how the words came into the form. We thank you for your attendance.

FIFTY-FOURTH DAY.

Tuesday, 4th June 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
WILLOUGHBY HYETT DICKINSON, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. ST. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant Secretary).

Sir FORREST FULTON, K.C., sworn.

47517. (Chairman.) You are the Recorder of London?—I am.

47518. Before that you were the Common Serjeant?—Yes.

47519. When were you appointed Common Serjeant?—I was appointed Common Serjeant in August, 1892.

47520. And before your appointment as Common Serjeant you practised for a great many years?—For 20 years, mostly in criminal cases.

47521. Chiefly in London, I think?—Yes. I had a great deal of experience in the country, but chiefly in London.

Sir F. Fulton, K.C.

4 June 1907

47522. In those capacities, of course, you have had large experience in criminal courts?—Yes.

47523. And therefore have come in contact a good deal with police officers?—Yes, almost daily—when in practice at the Bar, I mean.

Sir F. Fulton, K.C.

4 June 1907.

47524. I think you received a copy of a memorandum of evidence from the Secretary of the Commission?—Yes.

47525. And from that you will have gathered what are the terms of the reference to us. We are only asked to inquire and report upon the duties of the Metropolitan Police in dealing with cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets, and the manner in which those duties are discharged. Of course, those three classes of cases are dealt with by the Metropolitan Magistrates, and it is only very indirectly that you would have knowledge of the way in which the police deal with those cases, but still I think I am entitled to ask you, having regard to your long experience, what view you have formed as to the way in which the Metropolitan Police discharge their duties?—My opinion is that the Metropolitan Police discharge their duties as a rule in the most admirable way, and that giving evidence in courts of justice they give their evidence extremely well. Of course, I have no doubt that in such a very large body as the Metropolitan Police there are here and there to be found unscrupulous policemen as there are unscrupulous members of every class, but I think they compare most favourably with the general witnesses who give evidence in the criminal cases. I may add that, so far as cases of disorder are concerned, they only would come before me when the disorder is of such a nature that the accused person is committed for trial. I think sometimes I have had occasion to notice that where the conduct of the police is directly called in question—as, for instance, where the charge is one of assault on the police in the execution of their duty—the police have a tendency, which I sometimes have had to comment upon adversely, of hanging together, if I may say so, and perhaps not altogether stating the whole of the facts. But, with that exception, I am bound to say from my long experience that the police are very excellent witnesses. Of course, I am sorry to say that not only in criminal cases, but in civil cases, witnesses very often do not speak the truth. Of course, there are cases where I may have arrived at that conclusion with regard to the police, but, having regard to the enormous number of cases which come before me, I cannot at this moment recall any particular instance.

47526. Of course, the duties of the police are not confined to giving evidence in courts of justice; they have duties, of course, as constables with regard to the preservation of order and as to the arrest and custody of prisoners and so forth?—Of course, that is a matter of which I have no more knowledge than any member of the ordinary public. So far as solicitation is concerned, that does not in any way come under my cognisance; it did not when I was a member of the Bar, and it has not done so since I have occupied a position upon the Bench; but I must say, as a member of the public, it appears to me that the police discharge those duties with great discretion, and certainly the condition of the streets appears to me to be very much better than it was some 40 years ago when I first came to London. Beyond that I really have no knowledge of the matter that is not common to every one of His Majesty's subjects.

47528. Have you any comment or criticism to make on the regulations or on the existing law relating to the police?—No. As far as I can discover, they seem to me to answer the purpose very well both in the City and in the Metropolitan Police area. The police regulations have been the result of the collective wisdom of successive Commissioners of Police and Assistant Commissioners and Home Secretaries, and, as far as I know, I do not know any point upon which those regulations could be amended; but that, again, is rather a matter which the Metropolitan Police Magistrates would be better able to answer than I am sorry to say I am.

47530. What do you think are the duties of an Inspector when a constable brings a prisoner under arrest to the charge room and makes a charge against him?—I think his duties are to ascertain by the usual questions whether there is reasonable ground for believing that the offence has been committed; and, if so, to bail him until he can be brought before the Magistrate the next day; that is to say, assuming the case is one which comes within the category of bail, of course.

47531. Do you think that the duties of an Inspector are practically of an executive character?—I do not think I exactly follow what you mean by "executive." I certainly do not think they are of a judicial character if that is implied in the question, and I agree with those Police Magistrates, Mr. Fenwick I think particularly, and some others whose evidence I have read, that it would be most undesirable that an Inspector of Police should deal judicially with any case which was brought in by a constable.

47532. Then I may take it from you you do not think that there is any necessity for altering the course of proceedings in the charge room?—No, I see no necessity for altering it; it has answered very well. There may have been individual cases where of course mistakes have arisen, as they always will do, but under no possible system which the wisdom of man could devise could you avoid mistakes as to charges or otherwise.

47533. Do you recollect any case in which you came to the conclusion that an Inspector had taken a charge which he ought to have refused?—I am afraid not. My attention would probably not be concentrated upon that point; when the case came before me it would be at another stage, and my attention would not be concentrated upon the question of whether the Inspector of Police had exercised a wise or an unwise discretion.

47534. My object in putting these questions to you is this. As you have said, a policeman may make a mistake. Supposing he arrests a young woman on a charge of solicitation, which involves the charge that she is a common prostitute, and he takes her to the charge room, and there charges her with solicitation, if the Inspector takes the charge the young woman is put upon her public trial the next morning?—Yes.

47535. Supposing there has been a blunder on the part of the police and the case is dismissed, it is obvious that possibly great damage to the reputation of that young woman is done?—I am not so sure of that, because I should have thought the best way for a person so improperly charged to clear themselves absolutely was by inquiry in a public court. I think that is the best way. Assuming that a mistake is made, I am quite sure, knowing as I do every one of the Magistrates, that they would be the first to declare that there was not a shadow of foundation for the charge, and the person would leave the police court without the slightest stain on his or her character. In trials before myself it occasionally happens that in my judgment, and in the judgment of the jury, the charge is wholly unfounded, and I never hesitate to say so, I always do say so, and the jury very often say so. That appears to me to be much the most satisfactory way of having a stigma such as that of being taken to the police court wiped out.

47536. You do not think it would be in any case expedient to allow an Inspector, when he is doubtful as to whether the charge ought to be accepted, to postpone the consideration of whether he ought to take the charge on a subsequent day?—No, because it would probably get known amongst some persons, at any rate, that the woman had been taken to the police station, and the result might very well be that it might be said that the matter had been hushed up. That cannot be said where the investigation is of a public character before the Magistrate in a public court.

47537. Taking the duty of the Inspector to be what you have said, and assuming that there are no alterations in the law or in the regulations with regard to the proceedings in the charge room, do you think it would be expedient that a person discharging the duties of the Inspector should not be a policeman but a public servant appointed not by the Chief Commissioner of Police but by some other authority?—I think that would be a most mischievous thing. It would be, I believe, an imperium in imperio of the very worst kind.

47538. So much for the charge room. Have you anything to say about bail?—So far as bail is concerned, of course I very often express my opinion with regard to bail, and that is that persons are very often detained in custody who ought to be bailed; but at the same time, of course, the difficulty is, in such cases as you are investigating, in finding bail in the dead of the night, for instance, and persons are necessarily detained. I think myself the difficulty is one which it is almost impossible to overcome at a police court, because these things happen when most people have gone to bed, and beyond what I might describe as the "professional bail" it is very often difficult for persons in a humble position of life to release them the following morning; but I should think in many cases they might be released upon their own recognisances, and I believe they are, unless the charge is of a very serious description.

47539. Have you heard prisoners complain that the facilities for bail are not sufficient in any case?—I have heard prisoners very constantly complain that the bail fixed by the Magistrate was excessive, and their only remedy, of course, is to go before the Judge at Chambers and get it reduced. Personally, where a Magistrate has fixed bail, I do not myself interfere, because I have no means of inquiring as to the circumstances of the prisoner or the sureties, and therefore I refer them to a Judge in Chambers, which is the constitutional tribunal to deal with such matters.

47540. I will not ask you any questions about the Statutes under which summary proceedings are taken, because you have really nothing to do with that class of case?—Nothing to do with it.

47542. I suppose the street action of the police in applying the statutes which have from time to time been passed as to drunkenness has largely contributed to that decrease?—I am afraid I should not like to hazard an opinion upon that point. I think it results mainly from improved education and the fact that drunkenness has diminished amongst the better classes, and in that way has found its way down to the other classes, as you would naturally expect it to do, by example. I think people smoke more and drink less. That is what my own opinion is.

47543. Do you think that the amount of solicitation in the streets has decreased of late years, and that the number of women soliciting in the streets has diminished?—I think it has, as far as I can judge. From what I see when I have occasion to walk home at rather a late hour I certainly think the condition of the streets is very much superior to what it was when I came to London.

47544. Have you any recommendations to make as to any alteration of the existing powers of constables in regard to solicitation in the streets?—No. I think that is a matter which the Magistrates are more competent to assist you upon than I can do, because my knowledge is merely that of one of the public.

47545. Allegations have been made before us that prostitutes and street bookmakers are in the habit of bribing the police. Has any case recently come under your notice which would lead you to think there is any ground for the allegation that such corruption is widespread or general?—No. The last case which was publicly investigated dealing with bribing the police force to which my memory carries me was the case of the De Goncourt frauds, but that was about 25 years ago.

47546. Was that a case tried at the Central Criminal Court?—At the Central Criminal Court.

47547. Then that was when you were at the Bar?—That was when I was in practice at the Bar. I should think that is 25 years ago.

47548. That is a good many years ago, but I am much obliged to you for referring to it?—It was known as the detective case; a number of the members of the police force were involved in it, and several of them were convicted and sentenced to long terms of imprisonment. I believe that is the last case, as far as my memory carries me, which we have had before us at the Central Criminal Court in which the police have been convicted of receiving bribes in the discharge of their duty.

47549. Have you ever, since you have been on the Bench, had occasion to complain either to the Chief Commissioner or to the Home Secretary of the conduct of a policeman in a case that came before you?—No, I should not do so, because we always have an Inspector of Police in court, and any observations or remarks that I have occasion to make reflecting on any constable are, I am informed, reported to the superior officer, and he would, I should assume, deal with the matter, unless, of course, it was a very flagrant matter; but I have not had any such before me.

47550. (Mr. Dickinson.) Have you often had occasion to remark on the action of the police in such a way that the Inspector would report it to his superior officer?—No; very seldom.

47551. Only one question with regard to the action in the charge room. You said you feel very strongly that the Inspector ought not to discharge any functions of a judicial character?—No.

47552. But in answering the Chairman, first of all, you said he must satisfy himself that there was reasonable ground for believing that the offence had been committed?—Yes.

47553. Would that include asking questions of any witness?—You mean if there were persons there who contradicted the statement of the police as to what had occurred?—Yes.

47554. Yes?—Yes, I should think so. I think he should if any person was there who flatly contradicted the statement of the constable, but even then there would be a conflict of testimony, and the probability is that he would refer the matter to the Magistrate in the morning.

47555. You rather contemplate that the Inspector would be acting in a semi-judicial character?—Except the person was there I should say he probably would and ought to question the witnesses, but I am not sufficiently conversant with the conduct of affairs in the charge room to know whether outside persons are admitted or not; I could not tell you that. I mean, supposing there was a person outside who wanted to come in and say something about it, I do not know whether it is the practice to admit such persons to the charge room or not; I have not sufficient knowledge on the point to inform you.

47556. It is rather difficult to assume a case in which an Inspector would have no judicial function at all if he has to satisfy himself that there was reasonable ground for believing that an offence has been committed?—What I meant to imply was that there was nothing more than, if one may say so, the judicial duties that the Grand Jury discharge; I mean that kind of thing, and not to try the case or attempt to try it. If the Grand Jury are of opinion that the charge is frivolous they constantly ignore the Bill; so, in the same way, the Inspector, if he thinks the charge is frivolous, may not take the charge. That is all I mean.

47557. The Grand Jury does see the witnesses for the prosecution?—Yes, as many as they please.

47559. Because you say it would be establishing an imperium in imperio. I should like to know what objection there would be to that course?—I think the objection would be this: A police officer is responsible, and properly responsible, firstly, to his Superintendent, and then to the Commissioner of Police. Under his direct authority he is liable to be dismissed by him and dealt with in any other way he thinks right; whereas a third person, introduced for the purpose of taking these charges, would be responsible to nobody. At any rate, he would not be responsible to the Commissioner, and in that way you would have a divided authority, which I think might prove highly mischievous.

Sir F. Fulton, K.C. 4 June 1907.

47561. But we are not dealing with the Commissioner of Police. We are dealing with the Inspector in the charge room, and if there is a tendency for the police constables and Inspectors to hang together (I do not use that word offensively at all) that might tend to the bringing of unjust charges?—From my experience I do not believe Inspectors of Police would be likely to protect a policeman who they thought had acted wrongly. Nothing in my experience would lead me to that belief. An Inspector of police obtains that position after very many years of public service; he is fully conscious of the responsibility and importance of his position, and there is the fact that his pension depends on the way in which he discharges his duties. I see nothing in my long experience to lead me to believe that Inspectors of Police would in any way shield a constable. For instance, supposing it was evident to the Inspector that the constable was the worse for drink when making an accusation against a woman of solicitation, I do not think there is an Inspector in the Police Force who would not dismiss the case and report the matter to his Superintendent, and in due course the matter would be brought before the Commissioner. That is the kind of thing I have in my mind.

47562. That is your opinion; but we have had certain cases brought before us which we are able to form an opinion upon. I was only asking you the question with a view of ascertaining the reason why you hold so strong an objection to somebody not connected with the Police Force being appointed who would have the important position of conducting prosecutions. I daresay you are aware that in Scotland there is an individual called the Procurator Fiscal?—I am afraid my knowledge of Scotch procedure is nil. I know they have a verdict of Not proven, but I am afraid, with that exception, my knowledge of the practice in Scotland is nil.

47563. You are not aware of it?—I am not aware of it. I have read of it in these proceedings, but I have no other knowledge of it.

47564. That is why I was anxious to get at the reason for your opinion. Your opinion, I take it, is this: You think the whole prosecution ought to be carried on by the Police Force, and that the Police Force ought to be responsible for it?—Any division of authority would, I think, be highly mischievous. That is my opinion. I am not speaking from any concrete instance.

47565. Why would you call it a division of authority if you put the prosecuting part of the police work out of the hands of the Police Force?—That is assuming it is desirable to hold anything more than a general inquiry as to whether the charge is well or ill founded at the station. I do not think it is. You will then be converting the police station into a kind of police court.

47566. You have rather admitted that the Inspector must perform the functions of the Grand Jury?—Yes, that kind of function, to see whether the charge is frivolous or not. If it is not frivolous, then he ought to send it to the Magistrate. I would not enlarge his functions in any way beyond that.

47567. The Grand Jury is a body, of course, independent of the police?—Yes, of course.

47569. (Mr. Dickinson.) I quite agree, within certain limits, the Inspector must use discretion?—Certainly.

47570. That being the case, I am rather putting to you whether it would not perhaps be advantageous if a person who performed that function was not directly connected with the Police Force, but you say no?—I think not. I think the number of cases in which such a person might be very useful would be so very, very small that the evil resulting from his constant presence, and acting as a sort of check and spy upon the Inspector of Police, would quite outweigh any possible good that might arise from his presence.

47571. Do you think it would be an evil if he was to check them?—I do. I think that the whole discipline and usefulness of the Police Force depends entirely upon the fact that trust and confidence is placed in them, and I think nothing is so likely to destroy the efficiency of the Police Force as constant interference with them by persons other than the properly constituted authorities of the Police—the Commissioner and the Assistant Commissioner of Police. I think nothing is so likely to undermine the confidence of a constable and to interfere with his usefulness as the idea that he is always liable to be brought up before other persons than the properly constituted authorities to whom he is directly responsible.

47572. (Chairman.) Thank you, Sir Forrest. The Commission are much indebted to you for your evidence?—I am extremely glad, Sir David, to have been able to attend, and I am only sorry that I have not been able to give you more information than I have done.

47573. Is there anything you would like to add?—Nothing.

Sir Mackenzie Dalzell Chalmers, K.C.B., C.S.I., sworn.

Sir M. D. Chalmers, K.C.B., C.S.I.

47574. (Chairman.) You are now the Permanent Under Secretary of State at the Home Office?—Yes.

47575. In what year were you appointed to that office?—In 1903.

47576. I understand that you were called to the Bar in the year 1869?—I was.

47577. You then became a magistrate in the North-West Provinces of India?—Yes, I was for two years in the Indian Civil Service.

47578. Then you returned home and practised as a barrister on the home circuit?—Yes.

47579. And you were appointed a County Court judge in the year 1884?—That is so.

47580. While you were a County Court judge you also temporarily acted as Chief Justice of Gibraltar in 1893-4?—Yes.

47581. And you were also a Commissioner of Assize in 1895?—Yes.

47582. Then you became legal member of the Viceroy's Council of India in 1896?—Yes, legal member of the Executive Council.

47583. And after that you were from 1899 to 1903 Parliamentary Counsel to the Treasury?—Yes.

47584. In 1903 you were appointed to your present office?—That is so.

47585. I need hardly say that in the course of your long career you have come in contact a good deal with the police with regard to the discharge of their duty in this country?—This country and elsewhere.

47586. And especially in London?—During the last three years in London.

47587. You have received, and probably knew before, the terms of reference to this Commission?—Yes, I helped to settle them.

47588. Would you prefer to make a statement, or would you rather I asked some questions upon these matters?—I have no statement I wish to make, but I shall be happy to give you any information I can.

47589. If you will look at page 1 of the statement you received from the Secretary you will see some general questions. That statement was really drawn up for the information and assistance of the magistrates who have kindly come to give evidence before us, but it is a document very similar to the document we ought to have submitted to you, although I daresay it goes into matters which you have no special knowledge of?—I have read the evidence of some of the magistrates which you have kindly supplied to me.

47590. Would you define for us the duties of constables in the metropolis with regard to the three classes of cases mentioned in our terms of reference?—The main duty of the constables is to keep order in the public streets, and they have to exercise their discretion as to whether for the purpose of keeping order it is necessary to make an arrest or not.

47591. And they have also to attend at the police court and prosecute a charge?—Yes.

47592. In your opinion are the duties of the Metropolitan Police discharged, as a rule, with discretion, honesty, and efficiency?—As far as my observation goes I should say certainly, and, judging from the very few complaints which have come before me, I should also say certainly.

47593. Have any recent instances of alleged misconduct on the part of constables come under your notice in your office?—Of course, both the Gerothwohl case and the D'Angely case came before me. Perhaps I may explain shortly the relation I have to those kind of cases. In the Home Office there are four departments dealing with official matters. One of them is the Criminal Department. The subjects one has to deal with in the Home Office are roughly divided into 51 heads or branches, distributed among those four departments. The Metropolitan Police would be one. The average number of cases that come before the Home Office for which I am responsible as the head is rather more than 200 a day. Last year there were 62.000 official cases, but, of course, the official cases only form a portion of the work of the Under Secretary. For example, during last year we had 14 Commissions and Departmental Committees sitting in connection with the Home Office. All that gives a certain amount of work to me which would not appear officially. There are many matters which are done by personal conversations and matters which do not appear on the official record. So that only a proportion naturally of the 200 cases a day can come before me personally.

47594. (Mr. Dickinson.) What sort of cases do you mean when you refer to the 200 cases a day—200 matters?—Two hundred matters. I mean the matters in which some order has to be passed. I do not mean only criminal cases, but some matter in which an order has to be passed, and in which a letter would usually follow to somebody.

47595. (Mr. Whitmore.) Not the Criminal Department?—No, the Criminal Department has about 20,000 cases a year. Would you like me to describe the work in the Criminal Department?

47596. (Chairman.) If you please?—The Criminal Department consists of a principal clerk, a senior clerk, and three junior clerks, and is under an assistant secretary, Mr. Troup, who will give evidence before you. The work of that department is roughly classified as follows:—Prerogative of mercy—that means any petition from any person who is convicted, or on behalf of any person who is convicted, including, of course, capital cases which are always reviewed, whether there is a petition or not. The second head is extradition. The third is prisons and prisoners. The fourth head is Broadmoor and criminal lunatics generally. The fifth head is Police, County and Borough, including also the Metropolitan Police in certain aspects. The sixth head is Disturbances and Riots—communications generally about disturbances all over the country. The seventh head is Coroners. The eighth head is Production of Prisoners. The Secretary of State, as you are aware, has the duty of producing prisoners whenever it is necessary for the interests of justice. The ninth head is Commissions Rogatoires. That is rather a troublesome head—Commissions Rogatoires, issued by foreign courts to get information with reference to foreign criminal proceedings. They go through the Home Office. The tenth head is the removal of Colonial prisoners. That involves a good deal of correspondence. The eleventh head is Salaries and Fees of Justices' Clerks and Clerks of the Peace. Then there are miscellaneous matters relating to the administration of criminal justice. That is the summary of the headings into which the work of the Criminal Department is divided.

47597. Under the head of Petitions I suppose petitions against convictions at the Metropolitan Police Courts would come?—Certainly. There are about 5.000 petitions in a year, and a certain number of those would be petitions from convictions by metropolitan police courts.

47598. Can you give us any estimate as to the percentage of cases that come from the metropolitan police courts out of the 5,000?—I am afraid not, but Mr. Troup, through whose hands they would go, might possibly be able to give you that information.

47599. Have you any criticism to make upon the organisation and work of the Metropolitan Police Force. I mean with regard to the class of cases coming within our terms of inquiry?—Only this, that populations, of course, are rapidly growing in the metropolitan area, and without increasing the police rate it is very difficult to increase the number of police in proportion. The police of recent years have had better terms as to pension, and so far as we can we are trying to give them a few more days' leave, but anything in the nature of that involves increased expenditure. New duties, of course, are continually being placed upon the police by new legislation, and it is exceedingly hard within the present limits of expenditure to keep up with the requirements. For instance, motor cars and motor omnibuses have added enormously to the work of the police, but they do not add to the police rate.

47600. Do you think there are any districts in London in which it would be expedient that two constables should always go together on the beat?—That is a question I could hardly give an opinion upon. I think only the Commissioner could say that. There are certain districts in London where the police are especially exposed to danger. I think you have the figures with regard to the number of men invalided by assaults and attacks. I think it is something like 12 per cent. of the entire force every year.

47601. Reverting for a moment to one of the observations you made about the expenses involved in increasing the number of Metropolitan Police, are we to understand that you would recommend the force should be increased in numbers?—To this extent only, we should be very glad, and we think it would be very beneficial if a policeman could by a system of rotation always have one day a week—that is, Sunday. But that would involve, I think, an extra £160,000. At present a policeman gets one Sunday in two.

47602. (Mr. Whitmore.) That expense would be involved because of the necessary increase in the police force?—The necessary increase. Those were the figures given to the House of Commons when the question was put to the Secretary of State.

47603. (Chairman.) Supposing that the conditions of employment of constables and other officers remained the same, do you think that the existing number of men is adequate with the present population of London?—The Commissioner certainly would like more men.

47604. (Mr. Whitmore.) Is there an automatic increase according to the increase of population?—No. The Secretary of State has to sanction each increase, and for some years no proportionate increase was made. Larger increases have been made in the last four or five years.

47605. (Chairman.) May I put the question in another way. Has the increase proceeded pari passu with the increase in population according to sound principle?—Some few years ago it did not, but it has been brought up now. Also with the increase of population you have an increase of duties as well.

47606. Just following that up, though in another direction, do you think that the powers of the police ought to be increased in any way? Ought they, for instance, to have power of summary arrest in cases in which they have not now the power of summary arrest?—No, I should say not. If I may say so, as regards dealing with solicitation in the streets, a more liberal construction is placed on the power of arrest by London Magistrates than by Magistrates elsewhere. For instance, you kindly sent me the evidence of Chief Constable Tarry, with regard to Leeds. There, owing to the view of the law as to the construction of the Vagrancy Act, he thinks he has insufficient power of dealing with solicitation in the streets. In London certainly a different construction is put on that provision, and a wider construction.

47607. I will come a little later on to a consideration of the treatment of solicitation cases in the Police Court. I was only asking you in general whether the powers of arrest given to the police are sufficient to enable them to keep the peace on the whole properly?—The powers are sufficient if in the case of any disturbance there is sufficient physical force on the spot.

47608. One reason why I was asking that question was that more than one of the learned Police Magistrates who have given evidence before us said, and said rightly, that there is really no offence called disorder, and for disorderly conduct as such you have to look at some particular Section in the Act of Parliament. For instance, people who are simply noisy in the streets, walking together in knots, was suggested in one case, and one of the Chief Constables, I think it was Major Tarry, also complained that he did not think the law was sufficiently strong in regard to disorder or disorderly conduct?—I have not had my attention called to any defect in the law on that ground, and I think it would be very dangerous indeed to give what we might call a blank cheque.

47609. I think you know well what we have called the White Book, which contains rules and regulations issued for the information of the police force?—I do not know it very well. It does not come before me, but I know there is such a book.

47610. I thought perhaps you would have occasion to refer to it from time to time?—No, I have never had occasion to refer to it yet.

47611. Then I am afraid it is no good asking you what you think of its arrangement, or whether you think the book might be improved?—No.

47612. With regard to arrest and the conveyance of the prisoners from the place of arrest to the charge room, I do not know that you can give evidence on that?—No; I do not think I could give any assistance there.

47613. With regard to the charge room, I should like to ask you a question or two. Do you think that the Inspector in the charge room as a rule exercises a sound discretion in taking or refusing charges?—Judging from the few complaints that come before me, I should say yes. That is the only means I have of judging.

47614. What view do you take as to the duty of the Inspector in the charge room? Take, for instance, the Gerothwohl and Lavalette case, to which reference has been made. There the case was made that three persons, including those two, had been arrested in Piccadilly, and the charge was that they were drunk and disorderly. What should you say was the duty of the Inspector in the charge room of Vine Street Police Station?—From what I saw in the evidence, I should say his duty clearly was to send the matter at once before the Magistrate for judicial determination, and, if I may say so, I think it is the greatest possible protection to the public that when a man is arrested without warrant the policeman who arrests him should know that the matter will be brought forthwith before an independent judicial authority. I should be very much afraid of having anything approaching what I may call a judicial inquiry conducted in secret before an officer of police. Of course, in giving that opinion, I am considering not only the police in London, but the police all over the country. I do not think you could have one rule for London and another rule for other parts of the country. I think there would be grave peril to the public if it were not known that when a man is arrested without warrant the matter will be judicially investigated. I do not know whether it is relevant, but I had to consider that question to some extent when I was in the Viceroy's Council. I was in charge of the Bill amending and consolidating the Criminal Procedure Code, and, among other questions, that question had to be dealt with. I do not know whether it would be relevant to refer to the provisions of the Indian Criminal Procedure Act?

47615. Yes, we should like you to?—The material provisions dealing with arrest without warrant are contained in Sections 58 to 67 of the Criminal Procedure Code, of 1898. Section 62 is as follows: "Officers in charge of police stations shall report to the District Magistrate, or, if he so directs, to the Sub-Divisional Magistrate, the case of all persons arrested without warrant within the limits of their respective stations, whether such persons have been admitted to bail or otherwise"—that is to say, whether the charge has been taken or otherwise.

47616. It is clear that the Inspector in charge at present, notwithstanding the fact that in the White Book he is required to listen to what is said by the prisoner, and required also to listen to any witnesses, and take a note of the statements made by the witnesses, is not exercising jurisdiction in the strict sense of the term?—No.

47617. He has no power to administer an oath, for instance?—No, he has no power to try the case.

47618. Still, the Inspector has, first of all, to determine this, whether the charge which is made against the person arrested does amount to the commission of an offence?—Certainly.

47619. Whether it is within that Section or the other Section of some Act of Parliament, or is an offence at common law?—He must exercise a certain discretion. May I put an extreme case? Supposing a constable who was drunk brought in a man who was sober. Clearly the duty of the Inspector would be to make them change places.

47620. Is that so?—Clearly.

47621. I think his first duty would be to decide whether he would or would not take the charge, because that goes into the refused charge book?—Yes, that would be the machinery, but as a practical result they would change places.

47622. If the sober prisoner had made a charge against the drunken constable I suppose that would be so. I suppose he would be heard?—He would be heard, and I think he would be told to charge the constable, anyhow.

47623. At any rate, it is clear that the Inspector has to determine whether the charge is one which he can receive in the sense that it charges the man with an offence?—Certainly.

47624. Then a certain amount of knowledge of law is required—it may be very small?—Yes. Every executive officer has to know something of the law relating to his own department.

47625. Then there is also a certain judicial discretion exercised, I suppose, in deciding whether there is a prima facie case. Take the case you have put. I gather that the Inspector has got to inquire as far as he can whether the person accused is or is not guilty?—Whether there is something that ought to be submitted. It is clearly an executive rather than a judicial discretion. An executive officer always has to use a discretion of some sort before he takes executive action.

47626. That is what I was going to suggest to you. It is perfectly clear that the Inspector is in no sense exercising jurisdiction?—No, he has to exercise common sense.

47627. What he has to discharge is an executive duty?—Yes.

47628. But in discharging that executive duty he has to exercise the judicial qualities of his mind?—It is better for everybody in every relation of life to exercise judicial qualities.

47629. What is the position of an Inspector who takes a charge, and therefore continues the imprisonment of a man in a case in which a man ought not to have been arrested at all. Would an action for false imprisonment lie against him?—I should think not.

47630. On what ground?—On the ground that when once a charge has been made his prima facie duty, unless there be mala fides, is to send the case before a judicial authority for determination.

47631. I am inviting your opinion on the question of law, and not expressing any opinion of my own. Does not that suggest that the Inspector then is acting as a judge?—I think not. I think what applies to the inspector would apply to every executive officer throughout the Kingdom. For instance, an Excise officer. If a complaint were made to an Excise officer of an Excise offence, if it was absurd on the face of it possibly an action might lie if he took proceedings, but if it was not absurd on the face of it I think the Excise officer would be protected.

47632. What is in my mind is this. In any case of summary arrest if the Magistrate ultimately dismisses a charge against the prisoner, the prisoner may bring an action for false imprisonment against the constable. That is so, is it not?—Yes, anyone could bring any action against anybody.

47633. And obtain judgment on it?—I do not know that. Would you not have to prove absence of reasonable and probable cause?

47634. Is it a good defence to an action simply to say he is a constable?—Are you referring to the man who makes the arrest.

47635. I am talking of the man who makes the arrest?—I thought you were speaking of the Inspector who passed the case on to the Magistrate.

47636. No, I ought to have put my question in the old way: Whether an action would lie against a constable who had arrested a man on a charge which was ultimately found to be groundless?—I do not think he would succeed unless he could prove it was done without reasonable and probable cause. If it was done in good faith, I do not think he would succeed. Any number of charges may be dismissed, but the constable may be perfectly right in bringing the matter before the Magistrate.

47637. Is not there a distinction between an actior for false imprisonment against the man who actually arrested the plaintiff, and the case of an action for malicious prosecution. Is not the defence different in the two cases?—Without looking it up I could not be certain. There is a technical distinction in one case—reasonable and probable cause being a question of law for the Court, and in the other case it is a question for the Jury. I think that where there is an express statutory power of arrest, and consequent duty, the constable would be protected if he acted reasonably, even though the charge was dismissed.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) The position of the Inspector who takes a charge was decided by Mr. Justice Kennedy in the case of Marks v. Frogley. I cannot tell you where it is reported at the present moment. That was an indictable offence, and it depends on the provisions of the Indictable Offences Act as to what the duty of the Inspector is in taking the charge.

47638. (Chairman.) Passing from that, do you think that in cases where an Inspector is doubtful as to whether he ought or ought not to take the charge, the law as to the proceedings might be altered in such a way as to give the Inspector a right to postpone the decision of the question whether he will take the charge to a later time—it may be a later time in the same day or on the next day?—I think it would be most dangerous myself. I think the real protection to the public is the fact that the charge will at once be brought before an independent judicial authority. Of course that results in hard cases occasionally.

47639. Even if the judicial authority decides in favour of the accused. In other words it may be that if a prisoner is entirely innocent in the matter, considerable damage to reputation may be done by his being placed on his trial?—Yes, that happens in every case, of course, where a man is charged either civilly or criminally with anything that appears to be disgraceful. Of course, the main mischief arises from the case being reported in the papers. The papers have to report day by day, and unfortunately the man's defence usually does not come on the same day as the charge. In a case of any importance whatever, the allegations against the man get a week or a fortnight or three weeks' start of the refutation. In an ideal state of things (it is not, of course, practicable), no case should be reported until it is finished. Then again, naturally, the papers have to report what interests their readers, and instead of reporting the whole of the proceedings they report what we may call the tit bits of the proceedings, which alone the public take any interest in.

47640. Then I understand that upon the whole you think that the existing law and the existing regulations as to the proceedings in the charge room require no amendment?—I am not prepared to suggest any amendment, at any rate.

47641. It has been suggested also that having regard to the kind of work which the Inspector is to do, it would really be better to have a trained official, a lawyer, probably, of some kind appointed, say by the Home Office, in the charge room?—It seems to me that would hardly be practicable. I think there are over 500 Courts of summary jurisdiction throughout the Kingdom, and what you do for one you ought to do for another. It would not be easy to get 500 trained lawyers of any value who would always be prepared to sit up all night and take cases. I do not know how many thousands of pounds it would cost. Charges come in all night in all parts of the country. We are not dealing only with London, but dealing with the country at large in any alteration of procedure. Possibly you have in your mind the Scottish procedure.

47642. Yes, I was going to refer to that?—There you have, of course, everywhere—theoretically, at any rate—a Public Prosecutor who is a quasi judicial official. The Procurator Fiscal is rather like the Procureur de la Republique in France. His functions are quasi judicial and quasi advocatorial.

47643. We have been told that an Inspector does go through a certain amount of examination in knowledge of criminal law and allied topics?—As a condition of promotion.

47644. Yes. Do you know anything about that examination, and whether it is educational?—I am afraid I know nothing about it whatever, and I think much more would depend on his common sense than on his power of passing an examination. It is essentially a matter of discretion.

47645. Then I do not suppose you can give us any special information as to bail or as to medical attendance on prisoners?—No, that does not come before me in any way.

47646. Will you kindly look at the statutory provisions dealing with cases of disorder, drunkenness, and solicitation, that have been referred to by the Chief Commissioner. Sir Edward Henry was good enough to refer us to the sections of various Acts of Parliament under which in the class of cases referred to us he usually acts. Do you think in your experience, examining from time to time cases in which there have been convictions under those sections, there is any real difficulty arising from the language of the sections in applying them to particular cases. Instead of asking a general question perhaps I had better tell you what I was going to refer to. I was going to refer more especially to solicitation cases. Under the Vagrancy Act and under sub-section 11 of section 54 of the Police Act, the offence of solicitation has three elements. It appears the prosecution must prove first that the defendant belongs to a particular class—a common prostitute or night walker. Secondly, that the defendant was loitering or was in a thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of solicitation, and thirdly, that the act of loitering and so on must be done to the annoyance of inhabitants or passengers?—Yes.

47647. What evidence do you think ought to be required as amounting to a prima facie case that the defendant is a common prostitute?—I should think that there ought to be evidence that that woman has been seen on previous occasions walking that part of the town and soliciting and accosting people. That would be evidence that she was a common prostitute. It must be something which would amount to a custom. The mere fact that a woman speaks to people is no evidence whatever that she is a prostitute. There must be evidence of an habitual accosting I should say, speaking as a lawyer.

47648. With regard to loitering and so on there appears to be no difficulty at all or ambiguity as to what amounts to a prima facie case or some evidence, but the words "to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers" seem to give rise to a little difference of opinion?—They create a great difficulty because it is a question of what the individual Magistrate would take as evidence on that point. Speaking for myself, I should say that there ought to be a complaint by some person, or evidence, at any rate, that the woman not merely spoke, but caught hold of people. I should think it would not be necessary for the complainant himself to appear, but if he complained to a constable, and the constable testified and swore, and was believed that he had received a complaint, that would be evidence of annoyance. But the mere fact that a woman accosts a man is no proof of annoyance to my mind.

47649. Not even if he gives a little gesture of negation?—No, I should think not. It would be very dangerous to admit that as evidence of annoyance. The mere fact that a woman spoke to a man is one thing, but if she catches hold of him and continues to worry him, it is a different thing.

47650. (Chairman.) Will you look at sub-section 13 of Section 54 of the Police Act, 1839: "Every person who shall use any threatening, abusive, or insulting words or behaviour, with intent to provoke a breach of the peace, or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned." We have been informed—in fact, we know from our inquiry into some cases—that a practice has arisen of charging a woman who is found soliciting under that section. In one Police Court, namely, Marlborough Street Police Court, the Magistrates have convicted in a good many cases where the evidence suggests that it is a case of solicitation by a common prostitute or night walker who has been loitering and accosting, and where there appears to be little or no evidence of any conduct tending to provoke a breach of the peace or whereby a breach of the peace may be occasioned. What is your view about the propriety of bringing such charges under that section?—It is a question of fact in each case, but I should have said that the words of the section are pretty clear. There must be some annoyance or insulting behaviour which might possibly lead the man accosted to retaliate in some way—as, for instance, catching hold of the man and hanging on to him. I should have thought mere solicitation did not come under that. I should have been rather strengthened in that view by the fact that solicitation is dealt with by an independent sub-section.

4 June 1907.

47651. Of course, you see, the main distinction between the two sub-sections is that in Sub-section 11 the prosecution have to prove that the defendant is a common prostitute or night walker?—And also some annoyance to passengers.

47652. With regard to the annoyance, I think from what you have said that you would accept some gesture on the part of a person on whom a woman had laid hands at all as some evidence of annoyance?—Yes.

47653. And you certainly accept a complaint made to the person accosted as some evidence of annoyance?—Certainly.

47655. It appears that formerly at Leeds, and I think now in some other places, under local statutes mere importunity or soliciting is treated as an offence. Do you think that an amendment of the law in that direction would be an advantage on the whole or not?—Of course, it would ease the duties of the police in clearing the streets. On the other hand, it gives a very, very dangerous discretion to constables who may not be experienced men. People may accost each other in the street, and do continually, without any reference to prostitution. There is a large class of the population who make their friends and their acquaintances in the streets. Their manners are not quite the manners of other classes, but there is nothing whatever criminal or in any way connected with prostitution in their greetings—I would call them greetings—in the street. You throw the onus on the policeman of determining not only the fact that A speaks to B, but that A has a further and evil intent. Of course, if a woman is known to be a prostitute, the presumption is that when she accosts she accosts prima facie for the purpose of her profession. May I add this also, that a woman who is a prostitute may speak to a great many people, and it may have nothing to do with following up her trade.

47656. Have you, apart from the D'Angely case, had any recent complaints of improper use by the police of their powers of arrest for solicitation?—I think there were two cases in which defence was alleged that the woman was a respectable married woman, and, if I remember right, in both cases it turned out that the man purporting to be the husband was not her husband at all.

47657. And in both cases you came to the conclusion that the convictions were proper ones?—Yes, certainly. I think in one case proceedings for perjury were taken against the man. I am not quite sure, but perhaps Mr. Troup will be able to tell you about that.

47658. Has drunkenness diminished in the streets during recent years?—That I cannot say. It would not come before me directly in any way.

47659. Has solicitation in the streets or the number of prostitutes frequenting the streets diminished of late years?—I should say an enormous improvement has taken place in the state of things now to what they were thirty years ago, when I lived in Pall Mall. One could hardly go back late at night to one's lodgings without being not only accosted, but caught hold of.

47660. You notice a great improvement?—I notice a most extraordinary improvement in that part of the town.

47661. Do you attribute the improvement to any extent to the action of the police?—The action of the police, and, further, the action of the Magistrates. I think they have enforced the law very much more.

47662. I think you probably know what we have been told, that there have been in Soho and the neighbourhood prosecutions on a considerable scale for the suppression of disorderly houses during the last three or four years?—Yes, I have heard of it, but it would not come before me, of course. That would be on the complaint of the Vestry, or whatever is substituted for the Vestry.

47663. Can you tell us anything as to the effect of the suppression of these disorderly houses on the state of the streets?—Nothing, from my own knowledge. I have discussed the matter with Sir Albert de Rutzen, and perhaps he could give you evidence about it.

47664. Have you received any complaints from women of solicitation by men, or have any cases in which allegations have been made that ladies have been molested by men come under your notice?—Not officially. I have heard of one or two cases in private life where ladies have complained of being spoken to on the Underground Railway or in railway stations.

47665. Of being accosted by men?—Of being accosted by men. I have heard of such cases, but no case has been officially brought before me. I remember a lady who is a lady in a good position telling me she was rather annoyed because a man in Charing Cross station handed to her a leaflet with the heading "Why were you drunk last night?"

47666. That was hardly solicitation for an improper purpose?—No.

47667. Under what statutory provisions, or at common law, do you think a constable could act in the case of solicitation of a woman by a man?—I should say it would be under the very provision you called my attention to. It would be insulting behaviour.

47668. One or two of the learned Magistrates who have come before us have told us that they think that section properly construed and applied is quite sufficient to put down the evil?—I should think so. I should think if a respectable woman were accosted under circumstances which showed the nature of the accosting, I should think clearly it would come under that sub-section. I can imagine nothing more insulting to a respectable woman. Of course, a mere greeting is neither here nor there, but it is a question of intent.

47669. We have had one gentleman who has come and told us that this solicitation by men was a real grievance in Regent Street, and that it prejudicially affected his business, and that ladies looking in shop windows were accosted by men, and that in one or two instances ladies have taken refuge in the shop. More frequently they go away, and may perhaps not buy articles that they would have bought if they had a longer time to look at them?—That may possibly be so.

47670. I am only making that statement for the purpose of asking you this question: Do you think that if a man, while a lady was looking in at Messrs. Swan and Edgar's window, came up to her and said "Good afternoon, will you come and take tea with me—won't you," or made overtures of a kind that would lead anybody to suppose he wished to make her acquaintance for for an improper purpose, and that she went to a constable and complained, would the constable be justified in doing anything upon that, even if the man were pointed out to him?—If she made the charge herself?

47671. The particular form of words does not matter, but supposing a perfectly respectable woman is looking in a shop, and while she is there a man comes up, and I assume he does it in the most polite way—he takes off his hat and seeks to enter into conversation?—Then it is a question of motive and intention, of course. It is no offence at law to try and make a person's acquaintance, but to indicate to a respectable woman that you regard her as a prostitute is an offence I should say under this section.

47672. You would say that would be insulting behaviour?—It depends entirely on the facts of the case.

47673. Naturally?—I should say that the law was adequate to deal with a real case of insulting a woman by treating her as though she was a prostitute.

47674. It has been alleged against the police that many of them accept bribes from prostitutes and bookmakers, apparently with the object of inducing them not to enforce the law against solicitation and bookmaking. Has anything come under your notice during your time of service at the Home Office or before that leads you to think that such bribery is common or widespread?—Nothing has come before me. We get a good many letters at the Home Office about various matters, some signed, and some anonymous, but certainly while I have been there I have never seen a letter from a woman alleging that the police have been bribed, and as far as I remember I do not think the police have ever told me of their having received any such letter. Of course, a good deal of information is conveyed to the police about crimes by anonymous letters, and the police are the one authority which pays any attention to anonymous letters; but I have never heard of any such case as regards solicitation. I have seen statements in the papers about bookmakers. I think one of the magistrates gave some evidence with regard to West Ham, but it has not come before me personally.

47675. Has any circumstance come to your notice from which you would infer that there was any ground for that kind of allegation?—Nothing has come before me. When you have a force of 16,000 men you do not expect to find them all honourable and straightforward men. Such a thing might happen, but all one can say is one does not hear of it. One knows in all other branches of life there is a great deal of bribery. One's experience in County Courts shows that there is an enormous amount of secret commission going on in the lower grades of commerce, at any rate, but I have never heard this allegation against the police.

47677. What view did you form generally as to the value of the police evidence and as to the honesty of the police in general?—In civil cases they were far and away the best witnesses of that class. I mainly had to deal with the Birmingham police, and I found them in the running down cases very fair and honest witnesses. Of course, the character of the police force very largely depends on the sort of hand the Chief Constable keeps over them. At the time I was at Birmingham—the man is dead now—we had a most excellent Chief Constable there, and he kept up a very good tone throughout the force. He was a strict disciplinarian, and a very efficient Chief Constable.

47679. Then with regard to the duties of constables with regard to prosecuting charges, I take it in this country the constable who arrests and makes the charge at the police station is the prosecutor, and he appears to prosecute the charge at the police court?—Yes.

47680. He is the prosecutor?—Yes.

47681. Even in those cases the King is the real prosecutor, I suppose?—I do not know that in the police court the King's name appears; but it appears in an indictment, of course.

47683. If it is a serious case the Justice may be asked to give a warrant at once, and I think there is no doubt from what the learned Magistrates have told us there is no possible ambiguity about the character of the proceedings. There the summons is issued by the instructions of the Justice of the Peace, and he orders the defendant to appear at Petty Sessions on a given day?—Yes.

47684. That is the process. The summons upon information is the process that gives the Justice of the Peace at Petty Sessions, or in London the individual Magistrate, the jurisdiction to hear the case?—That is so.

47686. What is your view about the charge sheet? Is it part of the process upon which the jurisdiction of the Magistrate is based, or is it simply a document prepared for the information of the police authorities?—I think the charge sheet is merely this: it is to show the Magistrate what the constable believed he was acting on when he effected the arrest. I do not think it is of any legal validity whatever. The man is produced before the Magistrate, and the Magistrate says, "Why?" to the constable. The charge sheet shows him the answer. The Magistrate then deals with the case on the evidence. I do not think the charge sheet is anything more than an executive document.

47687. Then in that case what gives the Magistrate jurisdiction is the fact that the constable on his oath says that the defendant did commit a certain offence on a certain day?—Or, rather, he did certain acts, and it is for the Magistrate to determine whether they amount to an offence.

47688. I quite accept the correction, but I was only generalising. It is the sworn evidence of the constable against the defendant that gives the Police Magistrate power to deal with the case?—Yes, certainly.

47689. The reason I am asking that question is this, that we have gathered from the learned Magistrates that in some cases the constable who has arrested the prisoner deposes to facts which prove not the offence mentioned in the charge sheet, but some other offence. The Magistrate exercises, and I have not the slightest doubt properly exercises, his jurisdiction, notwithstanding that, and in some cases orders the charge sheet to be marked, or to be altered. In other cases we are told the man is sent back to the station to be recharged. What comment have you to make upon that practice?—I think that is absolutely right. The constable is not a lawyer, and he is not preferring a legal charge. He brings the man before the Magistrate, and he alleges certain facts. If the man being before the Magistrate, certain facts are shown which prove an offence, the Magistrate ought to deal with it. It is rather analogous to another class of cases, where it has been held that it does not matter how you get a man within the jurisdiction if he is properly charged with an offence when he is within the jurisdiction. Of course, extradition is an exception. You may only try a man for the exact offence for which he was extradited.

47690. There was a case inquired into before us, and I think this is the only one on which we wish to ask you any specific questions, and that was the case of a complaint by Mr. Wilson against P.C. Worsley. In that case the complaint made before us was that Worsley had improperly, and even brutally, used his truncheon, and greatly injured the complainant. Now it appeared that an action had been brought in the County Court against P.C. Worsley, and judgment had passed, and evidently properly passed, for £25. It then came out that the Chief Commissioner had dealt with P.C. Worsley, notwithstanding the case was a case of very, very severe illtreatment, by simply removing the police constable from one district to another district. What do you say to that as a punishment?—It depends, of course, what view the Commissioner took on the information before him of the whole facts of the case. The judge in court can only deal with the facts proved before him on the evidence, but the Commissioner may know a good deal more about the case. He may know about the district, and he may know about the actual danger the man was in. In dealing with the man by way of discipline he has a good many facts in addition to the judgment of the County Court.

47691. The fact, for instance, that he may be a respectable, efficient, and good officer who had behaved wrongly on that occasion, and on that occasion only, but apart from that case he was a highly respectable member of the Force. That would be a consideration, I take it, that the Chief Commissioner would take into account?—Certainly.

47692. Then it further came out that only £5 of the £25 was paid by the policeman, and that the balance of the damages was paid out of the Police Fund by the order of the Chief Commissioner, sanctioned by the Home Office?—Sanctioned by the Secretary of State.

47693. I think you have had the shorthand notes of the proceedings dealing with that case before you?—Yes.

47694. Will you kindly explain to us what was done in the case, and why that action was taken?—In reference to this case, what happened was this: The Chief Commissioner thought the man was not very much to blame. I think he recommended that the Secretary of State should order the whole of the damages to be paid out of the Police Fund. The matter came up to the Home Office, and eventually it was referred to the Secretary of State himself. He decided that, having regard to the finding of the court, the man ought to bear a certain amount of the damages, at any rate, and he directed that £5 should be stopped out of the man's pay, or that, at any rate, the man should have to pay £5 of the damages. He considered that that was sufficient to give effect to the finding of the court as against the man, taking into consideration the whole of the circumstances. Then, of course, there is another matter which he had to consider. A court of justice had awarded certain damages to the complainant. I do not suppose the complainant could ever have got his damages at all from the policeman himself. The court had found the plaintiff to be entitled to compensation, and entitled to compensation in respect of the action of the constable, and I think to some extent that would be taken into consideration in making the order.

47695. Under what statute did the Chief Commissioner and the Home Office act?—The Chief Commissioner had no power in the matter at all. It was the Secretary of State. The Chief Commissioner only made a recommendation. The administration of the Police Fund is in the hands of the Secretary of State. If I remember, there was some little discussion about the case, and the matter was referred to the Secretary of State himself, and I suppose his statutory power would mainly rest on the final words of Section 12 of the Police Act, 1829. "He shall also pay all other charges and expenses which such Principal Secretary of State shall direct to be paid for carrying this Act into execution." I imagine that would be the sanction.

47696. The general words at the end of the section seem to be the only words that would justify the position?—Of course the Secretary of State administers the Police Fund subject to audit. There is a provision for audit.

47697. The next head on which I have a question or two to ask is with regard to complaints which come before you in your capacity as Under Secretary of State. Supposing a person complains that he has been unjustly convicted by a Police Magistrate of one of these street offences, and writes to the Home Secretary, what course does the complaint follow in your office? How do you deal with it?—First of all, the letter would be opened by somebody in the office, and it would be sent up to the Registry to be registered; then it would go through the ordinary department which deals with those complaints—the Criminal Department. Eventually any complaint would not be disposed of till it had reached an Assistant Secretary. If it was of sufficient importance it would be referred on to the Under Secretary, who would exercise his discretion as to whether he should bring it before the Secretary of State himself.

47698. That is, of course, where the person simply complains that he was wrongly convicted, but I was thinking more particularly of a case where the proceedings had started with a summary arrest by the constable, and where the complaint was not simply that there had been a wrong conviction in the court, but where, if the complaint is justified, there had been misconduct on the part of the police constable as well. Do you then communicate with the Chief Commissioner?—No, we should ask for a report from the Commissioner. It would go over to him for a report.

47699. Do you ever see the person who complains under such circumstances?—I should not. He might see somebody in the office. The instructions certainly would be that he should put his complaint in writing, because it would be perfectly hopeless if you had verbal communications. Any complaint to the Home Office is directed to be in writing, so that we may have a record, and also have no dispute as to the facts.

47700. You do not, in any case, open an inquiry yourself in the office. You would not see, for instance, the person complaining of the police constable?—No, we have no legal department, and we have no judicial department. We are an executive office.

47701. And no power to administer an oath?—No power to administer an oath. We have no power to compel the attendance of anyone, and it is a purely executive department of the State.

47702. I was asking that question particularly, because I find that Dr. Gerothwohl, whose case was inquired into by us, wrote on the 24th April to you, I think?—Very likely, but I was abroad at the time.

47703. "Referring to my previous letter of the 12th instant, I should feel much indebted if an interview could be arranged at an early date between the Home Office Authorities on one side, and Mr. Lavalette, myself, and our legal adviser on the other, to enable us to state our grievances in detail, and discuss the case." You did not comply with that request?—Certainly not.

47704. In not complying you were not deviating from the ordinary practice, but you were actually carrying out the ordinary practice?—We were carrying out the ordinary practice.

47705. Have you in any case ever had that kind of interview at the Home Office?—No, never. I have seen people by request of the Secretary of State. Occasionally a Member of Parliament has come to see me about a case, and I have discussed it with him, but I have never had anything in the nature of an inquiry held before me.

47706. Then the practice is when a constable, or two or three constables, are definitely alleged to have been guilty of misconduct, to write to the Chief Commissioner?—The practice is to write to the Commissioner, and it is his duty to inquire into the same and report to the Secretary of State. We have no machinery at the Home Office for doing anything of that kind. If the matter has been before a Magistrate we should also write to him and get his views. There is nothing to compel a Magistrate to give his views, but, as a matter of fact, they always give them most freely and generously.

47707. Then these questions of complaints by persons who have been dealing with a London police court are simply dealt with in the same way as any other case, as far as that is concerned?—Yes. There is this difference. In London the Secretary of State is the Police Authority, and he therefore can order the Commissioner of Police to report to him. In country cases he can only request a report from the Chief of Police. He has no authority to order it.

47708. Then the relationship between the Home Office and the Chief Commissioner is very much that of the Watch Committee in a borough to the Chief Constable?—Very much so, subject to certain statutory provisions—or to the Standing Joint Committee in a county.

47709. Do you accept the report of the Chief Commissioner as a matter of course?—Not as a matter of course, but it is a responsible report from a responsible officer. If we have information the other way we should consider it, of course. For instance, in the very case you have mentioned of the police constable Worsley we did not accept the recommendation of the Commissioner of Police. The Secretary of State modified it.

47711. Do you never ask any of the constables whose reports are appended to the Chief Commissioner's report to come before you?—I should not. If I wanted further information I should get it through the Commissioner. He may get further information, or put some other man on to make inquiries.

47712. What kind of man?—One of the inspectors from another district. In one case I remember we expressly asked him to put on a particular officer to make inquiries into a particular case, because we thought he was the best man to do it.

47713. (Mr. Whitmore.) I suppose in all these cases the complainant has his remedy at law?—We only deal with discipline. The complainant has his remedy at law by action, or by prosecution for perjury, if the constable has given untrue evidence. If a man is wrongly arrested or wrongly imprisoned he has his remedy, and juries are not slow to give it.

47714. (Chairman.) As I understand it, the Principal Secretary of State could not dismiss an inspector of his own motion?—I am not sure about that. He never would do it except on the report of the Commissioner, I imagine; but I do not know what he could do. Mr. Troup informs me it is the Commissioner who dismisses under the statute.

47715. Has a member of the Force no kind of appeal from the decision of the Chief Commissioner to the Principal Secretary of State?—They appeal on many points. There often are appeals.

47716. Should you deal with them at the office?—They would be dealt with.

47718. (Mr. Dickinson.) A few more questions with regard to the inquiries that you make. I understand that your view is that the Home Office has no responsibility for itself making any inquiry into any cases of bad behaviour or neglect of duty on the part of constables?—It has no machinery.

47719. First of all, you have no responsibility for it?—No.

47720. The responsibility is in the hands of the Commissioner?—He is responsible to the Secretary of State. It is what you call a transferred responsibility or delegated responsibility. The Secretary of State no doubt could dismiss a Commissioner who was not up to his duties.

47721. Therefore, when you say, as no doubt you often say, the Home Office has caused enquiry to be made into the case, that enquiry is an enquiry which has been made by the Chief Commissioner, and not by anybody in the Home Office?—Made by the Commissioner or made through the Magistrate. In certain cases we have asked the assistance of the Director of Public Prosecutions in making enquiries. I am thinking of one case where he lent us a man to go down and make a local enquiry. That was a case of a wrong conviction.

47723. I would rather like to follow that up. You did on one occasion think that the Home Office should take the responsibility of making an independent enquiry?—It has been done in one case certainly. That was a case which the Public Prosecutor was already interested in to some extent, and we asked him if one of his officers would kindly make a local inquiry, and we have in two or three cases asked a Police Magistrate in country towns to make a local enquiry into a case. I can give you one instance. A doctor, a man of some position, was charged with going about in a crowd and assaulting women. I think he was convicted. Of course, it was a very serious matter indeed to him. A good deal of information was given to the Secretary of State from various people on one side or another, and the country Stipendiary Magistrate was asked if he would kindly collect statements of people on the spot.

47724. For the purpose of informing the Home Office?—For the purpose of getting information for the Home Office, and the statements that he collected were sent up. That was a very exceptional case. There was no legal provision for it, of course.

47725. An exceptional case, and perhaps one that would not apply to the questions we are now considering with reference to the Metropolitan Police?—No, I think not.

47726. In the case of the Metropolitan Police, although the police are theoretically under the Home Office, you would never make any enquiry independent of the enquiry that was made by the Commissioner of Police?—In certain cases we might send the whole of the facts to the Public Prosecutor. I am thinking, for instance, of the Lewis case. That was a case where a prisoner was wrongly identified by a woman at the Middlesex Sessions.

47727. (Mr. Whitmore.) Quite recently?—Yes, it was also known as the Millie Marsh case. There we handed over the papers to the Public Prosecutor.

47728. (Mr. Dickinson.) Was the question there as to whether a member of the Metropolitan Police Force had done anything wrong?—Oh, no.

47729. Then wherever there is a question as to the action of a constable in bringing a false charge, may I take it that the Home Office would not of itself make an enquiry apart from the Commissioner of Police?—I think so generally. They have no machinery, and could not do it.

47730. You would depend entirely upon the Commissioner of Police?—Certainly. The Home Office is not a legal office, and it has no legal department.

47731. I only wondered then what your position is. Do you depend entirely on enquiries that have been made by the Commissioner or the Assistant Commissioner of Police?—For one side of the case, yes. You have the statements, of course, of anybody interested on the other side, and you have the remarks of the Magistrate.

47732. That is what I particularly want to get at. You say you have the statement of the other side, but does the Home Office ever place the reports of the Commissioner on the one hand and the statements of the other persons on the other side on the other, and then adjudicate?—Certainly. You could not do it without. You must have both sides. Practically what happens is this. One gets a complaint. You see what the complaint is, and you get a report from the police, and then if that is not satisfactory you direct further enquiries by the police. You have to test the complaint, and the only means you have to test the complaint is through the machinery of the police.

47733. But then do you, or do any of your officers, weigh the statements of the police as against the statements of those who bring the accusations and try to get at the bottom of the truth?—Certainly. Invariably.

47734. May I put it to you that that was not what was done in the Gerothwohl case?—I think that was what was done, and I came to a conclusion, but I would rather not state it. It is exactly what was done.

47735. In what way did you test the statements that were made by Dr. Gerothwohl except by the reports of the Chief Commissioner?—I had his statements. I had either one or two consultations with the Magistrate himself, and we had the reports of the police, and we directed certain specific statements to be again and again tested.

47736. But we have a different meaning of the word "enquiry" in your mind and in my mind?—There is no enquiry; there is no judicial enquiry; there is no confronting of witnesses; but, again and again we ask for further reports from the police—a report on that and a report on that—how do you explain this, and how do you explain that? Will you put on a particular man to make this enquiry for us?

4 June 1907.

47737. But you have no opportunity of testing the other side?—Yes; it is to test the statements of the other side that we direct the enquiry. A case comes before us in this way. Somebody makes a complaint, and a complaint, perhaps, against a specific constable. Then we have that tested, and an enquiry made by a whole different set of police.

47738. But that enquiry must from its very nature be a one-sided enquiry?—There are two sides to it. I think, perhaps, we hardly understand each other. You have the statement made, and you test it as best you can. You have to test it by means of the police, and that is the only machinery we have got.

47739. The enquiry in that particular case of Dr. Gerothwohl which came before us was an enquiry in which both sides were sifted thoroughly. I do not suppose you would say that the enquiry made by the Home Office was anything approaching that kind of enquiry?—No, we made what enquiry we could, of course.

47740. That comes back to the same thing, does it not really, that you called for reports from the Commissioner of Police?—And from the Magistrate, and discussed the case with him. Those are our two sources of information, except, of course, the statements of anybody who likes to write to us on the other side.

47741. But, of course, you have no opportunity of hearing the explanation which the complainants would make of any statements which are made in these reports?—No.

47742. They, of course, do not know of them?—They are confidential reports, and they do not see them. We might ask a complainant—we should hardly like to do it—"How do you explain this part of your conduct, and how do you explain that part of your conduct?" but we should rather leave that to him to state his case.

47743. But you do not do that, do you. You would not say to a complainant, "We have had these reports from the police, now what do you say to that"?—No.

47744. Therefore, that opportunity is never offered to the complainant, so far as your office is concerned, of thoroughly sifting the matter?—No.

47745. Your only answer to that is that your only course is to say, "You must take your own course and bring an action"?—Yes, because we are dealing with the question of the discipline of the police. The complainant's remedy, of course, is an action at law or prosecution. Dr. Gerothwohl was told that his proper course was to bring an action.

47746. Yes, that is quite true. Therefore it comes back to this, does it not, that there are no means of having a proper inquiry by the Home Office?—Except the constitutional one of an action.

47747. But none by the Home Office?—No, it is a purely executive office.

47748. It is a purely executive office in which you can only hear one side, plus what the Magistrate tells you?—No, because we have the statement, and as many statements as the man likes to send in. But the people are not confronted, and cannot be confronted.

47749. Nor is the complainant told what the other side says?—No.

47750. But of course the other side is told what he says. You submit all his letters to the Commissioner of Police?—We usually should.

47751. I am not complaining of it in the least?—We should send over his letters whatever they were for inquiry and report.

47752. But you never would hear any answer that he would make to the replies that you receive from the Commissioner?—No. We certainly could not interrogate a man. We should have no right to interrogate a man.

47753. I am not quarrelling with what you are doing, but I want to see how far there is any possibility of a thorough inquiry, except, as you say, before a Court of Law by a person bringing an action?—But I think the Commissioner of Police very often is willing to see people.

47754. I was going on to that because I suppose in these inquiries you depend very largely on what the Commissioner of Police does in his inquiry?—Very largely, necessarily. He is, so to speak, our eyes and hands.

47755. You have his report, and you have before you the reports on which he bases his report?—Yes.

47756. In that case, too, is there any opportunity offered to the complainant to test the accuracy of the statements made in the police reports?—Very often, indeed, the police inquiry would include a further inquiry from the man who made the complaint.

47757. Could you give me an instance, because we have not come across that?—The Commissioner of Police could tell you, I think, better than I could. Take the D'Angely case, for instance, there were certainly communications between the D'Angelys and the police.

47758. I am taking the case of an accusation brought against the police by an individual into which the Commissioner is inquiring, and that accusation is inquired into by means of receiving reports and asking questions of the individual policemen?—Much more than that.

47759. Is there more than that in your inquiry of the police?—Yes, the police would take the evidence of any witness they could get. It is not merely an explanation from the individual policemen, but the police make inquiries from all the witnesses they can get hold of.

47760. When Sir Edward Henry comes I shall have to ask him about that, but I am rather anxious to know what the Home Office view is. I have before me the actual inquiry that was made by the Commissioner in the Gerothwohl case?—That is one particular case.

47761. Yes. Now in a case like that there was no taking of evidence from anybody else but the police. There was no opportunity for checking the statements of the police?—I do not think there was any opportunity of getting any independent evidence there, but in many cases the police examine a dozen witnesses. I was thinking of the case of a man named Flynn the other day. Certainly I have cases before me in which the police take what you may call a proof of all kinds of independent people—anybody they can get at to throw any light on the case.

47762. In the Gerothwohl case there was a very important witness, an independent respectable man, who the police did not ask any questions of, and I took it as part of the system. I am rather astonished to hear from what you say, and I am very glad to hear it, that it is a recognised thing that on any inquiry brought about by a complaint made by a member of the public against the police the police authorities would hear both sides, and investigate the matter in the same way as a Court would investigate it?—Not in the same way that a Court would investigate it. They would take statements. They have no power to administer an oath, or summon people in those cases, but I think I have had cases before me where I have had the proofs of a great many people.

(Chairman.) I may remind my honourable colleague that we had in the Braham case evidence showing that in that case the Superintendent or the Sub-divisional Inspector, I am not sure which, did hear, when he was directed to inquire into the matter, not the police only, but Mr. and Mrs. Braham as well, so that Sir Mackenzie is quite right in saying that.

(Witness.) I do not know that case, but the case that was in my mind was a case in which constables were directly blamed. In the ordinary case where there is a statement to us, the police take the evidence of every kind of person, and we have statements from all kinds of people submitted to us.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) May I say, Sir, that ex-Inspector Macarthy's case was one in which a lot of independent witnesses were heard before the Commissioner before he dismissed the Inspector.

(Witness.) And without their being heard by the Commissioner their statements are taken and forwarded through the Commissioner to the Home Office.

(Chairman.) The papers in that case of ex-Inspector Macarthy's were sent to us, but we did not inquire into it.

47763. (Mr. Dickinson.) I remember Mrs. Braham's case, and that was so?—Mr. Troup calls my attention to page 33 of the White Book, which deals specifically with complaints against police officers: "Rule 56. Complaints against police officers by private persons are, if possible, to be made and recorded in the presence of the accused officer, who will then have an opportunity of questioning the witnesses if he desires. Rule 57. The statements made by the complainants and witnesses are to be reduced to writing by the police officer dealing with the case, and the persons complaining are to be required to sign their statements."

47764. How was it then that in the Gerothwohl case there was no such inquiry?—That I cannot tell you. The Commissioner could tell you, I daresay. Perhaps Dr. Gerothwohl did not tender himself.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think the answer is that the officer was not made a defaulter. As a rule, where a complaint is considered to be serious and is entertained, the police officer is suspended, and he is put on the defaulters' sheet. Then follows an inquiry of the kind which is mentioned in those regulations in which the accused is confronted with his accuser, but if the complaint is not so regarded by the Superintendent or other officer dealing with it as sufficient to put the officer upon the default sheet, then the inquiry dealt with in those regulations does not take place.

47765. (Mr. Dickinson.) Yes, I quite see that, and probably that is the explanation. I am not quite sure whether you gave us the number of complaints of this kind that would come to the Home Office in the course of a year?—No, I think Mr. Troup can give that. I have not seen more than two or three in the course of a year, but Mr. Troup could tell you exactly, I think.

47766. (Chairman.) Just following what my honourable colleague has been putting to you, I should like to ask a few more questions. The course that the proceedings consequent upon Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette's complaint took appears to have been this: he wrote to you first of all two or three letters?—I was abroad.

47767. That was explained, and we understand that. We see how that occurred?—Instead of writing officially he wrote to me privately.

47768. There seems to have been no delay in dealing with the case, although you were abroad. It appears that the letter which was addressed to you privately reached you when you were not far from London?—It reached me down in the Riviera, and I forwarded it back to the office to have it dealt with officially in my absence.

47769. Nothing turns upon that, but the office did in consequence of Dr. Gerothwohl's complaint call for a report from the Chief Commissioner?—Yes.

47770. The report of the Chief Commissioner is dated the 25th April, 1906, and is primâ facie a confidential document?—Yes.

47771. That document has not, in fact, been published, but the document contains a reference to certain inquiries. It appears from the Chief Commissioner's report that what he did was to call for a report from a subordinate?—Yes.

47772. The subordinate was Inspector Berry, and the enclosure which has been used for the purposes of the cross-examination of the witnesses is headed: "Report by Inspector Berry submitted by Sub-Divisional Mackay and Superintendent Mann." Then follows the report of Inspector Berry, which was handed you by the Chief Commissioner. Then his report also enclosed reports from the police constables?—Yes.

47773. He calls them in his document "Reports." The constables themselves call them statements—"Statement by P.C. Isaacson, statement by P.C. Wallington, and statement by P.C. Divers"?—Yes.

47774. Then the only materials the Chief Commissioner had when he wrote his report to you was first a report from Inspector Berry and three statements made by police constables?—Yes.

47775. Then all those documents, the report of Inspector Berry, and the three statements or reports of the police constables were reports of officers against whom charges of misconduct were made?—They were their explanations, I suppose.

47776. No, it is a report. The Office had called upon the Chief Commissioner to report upon this matter, and he bases his report upon a report by Inspector Berry and upon statements by three constables?—Yes.

47778. The suggestion is this, that the Chief Commissioner, or one of the Assistant Commissioners, ought to have summoned Inspector Berry and all the other officers mentioned before him, and to have examined them, whereas what the Chief Commissioner did was simply to call for a report from Inspector Berry, who was the very person whose conduct in the charge room was complained of. That is the suggestion?—No, I do not think that was done. I think they were summoned to Scotland Yard and made the statements.

47779. (Mr. Dickinson.) That was later?—It may have been later, but there was an investigation in Scotland Yard.

47780. Yes, on the 25th April?—There were various stages of the case. I was not in England myself at the time, and I cannot tell you the details of it. What happened as regards myself was I thought on my return there were difficulties in the case, and I afterwards had two personal interviews with the Magistrate and got his personal views.

47781. (Chairman.) It is not that aspect of the matter that we are concerned with. What we understand is this—that the Home Office called upon the Chief Commissioner to make an inquiry into certain allegations made by Dr. Gerothwohl?—Not necessarily an inquiry—a report.

47782. And he had presumably before him (I understand he did have before him) a copy of Dr. Gerothwohl's letter of the 12th April?—Yes, that is so.

47783. One of the allegations made by Dr. Gerothwohl is that Inspector Berry was guilty of culpable negligence?—Yes.

47784. That document of the 12th April was before the Chief Commissioner after your letter asking the Chief Commissioner to make inquiry into the matter?—Yes.

47785. The Commissioner thereupon simply, as far as we can understand, calls upon Inspector Berry to make the report?—I think you will find there was more than that, but I am not quite sure. Perhaps the Commissioner himself will tell you. I think you will find a good deal more than that was done, but I may be mistaken.

47786. We know in the case of Mr. and Mrs. Braham that a most careful inquiry was made by a Superintendent on the spot, and the Brahams were asked to be present, and the whole matter gone into.

(Mr. Troup.) The Assistant Commissioner examined the officers at Scotland Yard.

(Mr. Dickinson.) My point was that that inquiry was merely asking questions of these officers. There was no possibility of checking the accuracy of them.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think you will find from the dates that those reports were obtained before the Home Office had asked for an inquiry.

47787. (Mr. Dickinson.) The inquiry is not referred to in the Commissioner's letter to the Home Office, although they are of the same date?—There were also personal interviews with the Commissioner and the Secretary of State with regard to the case.

47788. But no personal interviews with the persons who knew most about it?—No. But, of course, the Secretary of State is concerned only with the discipline of the police, and not with the party's remedy.

47789. (Chairman.) Then I do find that following upon that the Chief Commissioner appears to have directed an inquiry by Major Wodehouse, and he does not take evidence, but he does personally interrogate the constables mentioned?—I am not sure what happened. Did Dr. Gerothwohl wish to give evidence, or make any statement before Major Wodehouse or not? I do not remember the details of the case.

4 June 1907.

47790. The course taken appears to me to be pretty plain. The Chief Commissioner upon receipt of your application and the letter of Dr. Gerothwohl called upon Inspector Berry first of all to make a report, and he did so, and enclosed the statements of three constables?—Yes.

47791. Then the inquiry is held by Assistant-Commissioner Wodehouse, in which he hears the men and interrogates them himself. Do you think that was a satisfactory method of proceeding?—I cannot say without knowing more about the facts of the particular case. As I tell you, I was abroad at that time.

47792. It looks to me as though the first step the Chief Commissioner would in the natural course of things have taken would be to ask the Assistant-Commissioner to make an inquiry?—I think you would ask a man first for his explanation, and if you thought the explanation was not satisfactory you would then have an inquiry. I should think that was the natural course to take. The substantial question before the Commissioner is, is the man to be punished or not as a matter of discipline? If Dr. Gerothwohl had a grievance his remedy is clearly open to him.

47793. Quite so, but Major Tarry said that at Leeds the only inquiries he made were made with a view to discipline, but he told us that in any case except the most trivial cases he himself sent for the constables against whom misconduct was alleged, and heard any of the witnesses, the complainant, and so on?—Of course you may be able to do a good deal with a small force that you cannot do with a force of 16,000 men.

47794. We could not expect the Chief Commissioner to do that in London, but there is an Assistant-Commissioner, and, in fact, I was leading up to a suggestion I should like to put to you—that is, that one of the Assistant-Commissioners should be charged with the duty of making these inquiries and going about London. For instance, we found in the Braham case, in which an inquiry did take place, it was done locally. The Assistant-Commissioner did not intervene. Do you think it would be an advantage if there were an Assistant-Commissioner specially qualified for that kind of work, whose principal duty it should be to conduct these inquiries?—I can hardly answer that off-hand. I do not know whether there would be sufficient work for a man of that kind.

47795. There are three Assistant-Commissioners?—The present Assistant-Commissioners have their hands pretty full. They are overworked.

47796. But this is part of their work as we know, because Assistant-Commissioner Wodehouse did hold an inquiry in this case?—Yes, but if you had to have those inquiries very often you would have to have another Assistant-Commissioner. That is a question of expense mainly.

47797. Would it be an advantage, in your judgment, to have an Assistant-Commissioner whose qualifications were some special qualifications—say legal qualifications?—All I can say is the complaints that come before me are so very few and far between that I think for a single, what I may call accidental, case it would not be worth while.

47798. (Mr. Whitmore.) Is not there generally an Assistant-Commissioner who is a barrister?—One is a barrister, Assistant-Commissioner Bruce is a barrister, and I am not quite sure about Mr. Macnaghten.

47799. (Mr. Dickinson.) What do you mean by saying if you had to have an inquiry into all these cases you would have to have additional Assistants?—They have all their hands full at present.

47800. But you say the inquiries are so few?—The complaints that I have had are very few, but I rather thought Sir David Brynmor Jones thought the inquiries should be multipied, and that the ordinary inquiries which go on before Inspectors should be superseded by these much more formal inquiries held locally, and that instead of getting statements from the Superintendent an Assistant-Commissioner should be detailed to do it.

47801. (Chairman.) There is one matter that I omitted to ask about, and that is about a certain entry which we have found made in the charge-sheets. There was a case, I think it was Mrs. Braham's case, in which the Magistrate said, "Case dismissed—nothing against defendant at all." Then when we looked at the charge-sheet it was found that the clerk of the court had entered "Not sufficient evidence" underneath the word "discharged"?—A non-suit, in effect.

47802. A police inquiry was evidently threatened in that case, and was in fact held, and it suggested to my learned colleague and myself at once that that was an entry put in by the clerk of a rather friendly character towards the constable, because what one would infer from that was that if there had been a little more evidence the Magistrate would have convicted, whereas what happened was that he thought there was absolutely nothing in the case, and not a word against the defendant. Mr. Titterton, the clerk of the court, however, has come before us to explain that has nothing on earth to do as far as he knows with any friendly feeling towards the police, but is simply done by order of the Home Office, with a view to certain statistical information. That is what he suggested to us. Perhaps we can ask Mr. Troup about that?—As regards statistics, Mr. Troup will be able to explain it. I do not understand it myself.

47803. It is done in consequence of a letter from the Home Office of the 8th August, 1893, when Mr. Asquith was Home Secretary.

(Mr. Troup.) The object is to distinguish between cases which are dismissed on the merits and cases which are disposed of under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

47804. (Chairman.) But it appears that this is their way of dealing with it. It is quite misleading, because this was a case of dismissal in which the person was innocent?—That I know nothing about. I have not seen the letter, and I am afraid I could give you no information upon it. I may say this. A vast number of cases are dealt with on the principle of "Not guilty, but don't do it again." As a county magistrate I have again and again been perfectly satisfied that an offence had been committed.

47805. (Mr. Dickinson.) In this case it was not so?—I know nothing about that case.

47806. (Chairman.) It is not fair to put "Not sufficient evidence" in a case where a Magistrate dismissed the case because he did not believe the constable?—Certainly not, but I know nothing about that particular case. I know in many cases when I have been sitting as a Magistrate one says "Not guilty, but don't do it again."

47807. I understand you do not know anything about these forms, but we have been told the forms have been sanctioned by the Home Office?—I cannot speak to that. That was before my time.

47808. (Mr. Whitmore.) I want to be quite clear, as I think I am, that in your opinion these inquiries held at Scotland Yard, whether they are inquiries under the Assistant Commissioner or not, have no further object than of a disciplinary kind?—Simply that, and also it informs the Secretary of State as to what the story of the police is.

47809. Its object is not to show that a complainant is innocent or guilty?—His proper way of establishing that is by his action in a court of law, where the evidence is on oath and tried by an independent Judge. We are concerned with punishing a constable who has done wrong.

47810. (Mr. Dickinson.) But for that purpose you may say it is not the duty of the private person to bring an action?—If he is aggrieved that is the best way, and it is the only possible way of publicly vindicating his character that I know of. A letter from the Home Office would not help him. In certain cases the Home Secretary naturally, if he thinks a mistake has been made and a private person complains, expresses his regret to the person that he has been inconvenienced through the action of the officers of the police, but that is no satisfaction to a man who has been injured.

47811. (Chairman.) But supposing a man says, "I will not bring the action because I do not believe the constables who arrested me are worth powder and shot, but I do ask you as Home Secretary to see that they are punished for the grievous wrong they have done me." He may take that view, which was the view taken in one of these cases that came before us?—Certainly; and then we have to make up our minds on the best material we have got as to whether a man deserves punishment or not.

47812. Then I understand the Home Office would have been content with the report made by the Chief Commissioner and by the inquiry made by the Assistant Commissioner in that case of Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette?—No, by no means. I personally had an interview with the Magistrate about it and got his opinion. The case had been investigated before a very experienced Magistrate, and I was very anxious to get his views, and I had a personal interview with that Magistrate, and the Secretary of State had one also.

47813. (Mr. Dickinson.) Of course the case is not tried then?—Yes, the case had been tried.

47814. Not the particular allegations of Dr. Gerothwohl?—Dr. Gerothwohl had been tried.

47815. He was discharged?—Yes, and I wanted to know what the Magistrate's impression was.

47816. Therefore the case against the police had not been tried in any way?—The case against the police was what happened before the Magistrate—the evidence given before the Magistrate.

47817. (Chairman.) What I meant was this. I see from the correspondence that some questions were asked in April, and then after that this Commission was appointed, but I take it if this Commission had not been appointed the Home Office would have rested content with the communication from the Magistrate, with the report of the Chief Commissioner, and the report of the inquiry held by the Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse?—We might or might not. I am not sure.

47818. Would you carry this opinion of yours, according to your practice, further than that?—What I meant was this: I do not know whether the Commissioner of Police, on the materials he had before him at that time, would have attached any blame to any constable or not. I cannot tell you that. He will tell you.

47819. (Mr. Dickinson.) You say you may or may not, but surely in that particular case, so far as the Home Office was concerned, it was concluded. You had stated to him that you had made an inquiry, and if he wanted to take any further steps he must bring an action?—Yes.

4 June 1907.

47820. Therefore you had concluded it. You would not have gone any further?—No, we should have gone no further. If he had brought his action we should have reconsidered the case, by the light of the evidence given in court.

47821. The exact words are these: "28th April, 1906. —Sir,—I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that he has caused careful inquiry to be made in the matter of your letters of the 12th and 22nd instant with regard to the conduct of certain Metropolitan Police officers on the night of the 7th-8th instant, and, while he fully accepts the decision of the Magistrate dismissing the charge of drunkenness, and is glad to believe that the police officers who were maintaining order in Piccadilly in circumstances of great difficulty were mistaken in this point, he finds himself unable to take action of the kind suggested in your letter." That was for further inquiry?—Yes.

47822. At that time, at any rate, you were satisfied with what had been done?—I think so.

47823. (Mr. Dickinson.) It goes on referring to the grave charges that were made.

47824. (Chairman.) Then you very properly point out the proper way is by proceeding in a court of law?—We should very much have liked that case to have gone to a court of law with regard to one particular aspect of it.

47825. (Chairman.) The Commissioners are very greatly indebted to you, Sir Mackenzie, for the evidence you have given to them?—If we can give you any further information we shall be glad to do so.

Mr. Charles Edward Troup, c.b., sworn.

47826. (Chairman.) You are an Assistant Secretary of State in the Home Office?—Yes.

47827. You have also been called to the Bar, I understand?—Yes.

47828. Have you ever practised?—No, I was in the Home Office before I was called.

47829. How long have you been in the Home Office?—Since 1881. I have held my present position for four years, since 1903.

47830. The information that you have given us in regard to the police is founded upon your experience in the Home Office?—Yes.

47831. I think I may pass over the more general part of the evidence given by Sir Mackenzie Chalmers, based on similar but also other experience in this way. You have heard what Sir Mackenzie Chalmers has told us?—Yes.

47832. Do you agree with the opinions he expressed?—Yes, generally. There are one or two things I should like to add to what he has said. For instance, as regards the power of arrest. The question was asked of him whether further power of arrest was required. I think I may say there are certain cases in which the police certainly require further powers of arrest. The case which has most prominently come before us has been bye-laws made by the London County Council, where there is no power to arrest even an offender who does not give his name and address.

47833. What kind of bye-law are you thinking of?—There are various bye-laws. The bye-law that touches on the subject of this Commission is the bye-law as to indecent behaviour, but there are other bye-laws where the same difficulty arises.

47834. We had a case in which a Mr. Baker was asked for his name and address in the first instance with a view of proceedings under the bye-law apparently. You think the constable ought to have power of summary arrest in a case of that kind?—In certain cases certainly.

47835. That is a very broad and general bye-law, is it not?—It is aimed at a very definite class of cases.

47836. Then I am afraid we are not thinking of the same indecent behaviour. Indecent behaviour is about as vague a term as you could have in the law. "Indecent" simply means unaccustomed, does it not?—It is aimed at something much more definite than that.

Mr. C. E Troup, C.B.

47837. If the law is aimed at something definite, I should think the bye-law ought to be made definite itself, and be put in a concrete form?—The point is there is a great number of County Council bye-laws under which the police are very often unable to take effective proceedings, because they have no power to arrest even a defendant whose name and address they cannot obtain.

47838. (Mr. Dickinson.) Is that the case with all bye-laws throughout the country?—It is the case with all bye-laws for "good rule and government."

47839. Is that a provision of the law, or is it because in very many bye-laws the Home Office has not given the power of arrest?—The Home Office has no power to include such a provision in the bye-laws.

47841. You heard the questions I put to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers as regards the proceedings in the charge room. Have you any remarks to make about that?—I agree that it would be very undesirable to have any sort of preliminary judicial hearing in the charge room. The duty of the officer in charge of the charge room is to see that no mistake has been made, so far as possible, but he is an executive and not a judicial officer. He has a very serious responsibility in seeing that an arrest has not been made in a case where there is no power to arrest or where there is no reasonable ground for arresting, but it is not his business to weigh the evidence and to say whether the charge can be substantiated or not.

which can be brought against the person arrested. I do not know that very much practical difficulty arises from that.

47843. Will you explain that answer a little more?—The police have power to arrest any "disorderly, loose, or idle person," but, of course, that person, when brought before the Magistrate, cannot be convicted on a charge of being disorderly, loose and idle. When the case comes before the Magistrate, the thing must be formulated into some more definite criminal charge under one of the criminal sections in the Act.

47844. (Mr. Dickinson.) You mean the power to arrest any disorderly person, although he is not disorderly?—There may be a case which does not come under any penal provision. The charge is left to the decision of the Magistrate afterwards, or he may bind the person over to keep the peace.

47845. (Chairman.) As I understand it, in order that we may get it clear upon the notes, a constable is given a certain power of arrest by the Act you are referring to, and the words are "Loose, idle, and disorderly persons." A constable having arrested a loose and disorderly person brings him before a justice of the peace, and before the justice of the peace he may charge him with any offence, if there is any sufficient evidence of it?—Later on the particular offence must be formulated.

47846. He must specify his offence?—Yes, before the person can be convicted, but the power of arrest is very wide indeed.

47847. (Mr. Dickinson.) You can arrest a disorderly person, but if all you can prove is he was disorderly he must be discharged?—Or be bound over.

47848. What is the section?—Section 64 of the Metropolitan Police Act of 1839, and there is also a section in the Act of 1829.

47849. The constable may arrest all loose, idle, or disorderly persons who he may find disturbing the public peace, or who he may have occasion to suspect of having committed, and so forth. Do you mean to say he could not be convicted of that?—He could not be convicted under that section. There is no penalty imposed by that section; there is only a power of arrest. I do not think any practical difficulty arises out of it.

47850. (Chairman.) Then, with regard to the third head of our inquiry, solicitation, have you any remark to make?—With regard to solicitation, one has a state of things where it would seem that the Magistrates, in order to deal with solicitation in the streets, have either to accept very slight evidence of annoyance, or perhaps to strain the law as regards indecent or insulting behaviour. It seems to me this state of things rather points to the necessity of some amendment of the law on that point. I should say, from the police point of view, it would certainly be desirable that they should be able to deal with solicitation by prostitutes in England without the necessity of proving annoyance. It would enormously simplify the work of the police if the qualification as regards annoyance were repealed. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, but it seems to me the fact that the Magistrates are rather pressed into the position of convicting on slight evidence as regards annoyance indicates that public opinion demands a strengthening of the law on that point.

47851. (Mr. Dickinson.) The Magistrates are now willing to infer annoyance?—Most Magistrates, not all Magistrates, are willing to infer annoyance from what was seen by the constable, and sometimes, apparently, on rather slight evidence.

47852. (Mr. Whitmore.) When both sections are made use of, they may or may not be applicable to the particular way in which the solicitation is carried out in the streets. That is what it comes to?—Yes.

47853. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do you think if those words were struck out, then the Acts would be sufficient?—Yes, I think so. I should only fear that it might almost go too far if those words were struck out.

47854. (Chairman.) If those words were struck out, even if the gentleman agreed to go when solicited, the lady would be guilty of an offence?—That would be so—it would be treating solicitation in the streets as an improper thing. The view of the law would then be that the street is not the place where such a thing is to be allowed. There is a great deal to be said on both sides, but I am certain, from the police point of view, as making their position straight and free from doubt that would be an improvement. This is the law now in Edinburgh and Glasgow, and a Committee of the House of Lords recommended this amendment of the law.

47855. (Mr. Dickinson.) When you say some of the Magistrates, or most Magistrates, are there Magistrates in London who definitely take the other view. I know there are some in the country?—I think there are Magistrates who very very much prefer to convict under another section. There are some Courts where they do not bring charges under the section relating to annoyance.

47856. They bring them under the Vagrancy Act?—Yes, in some of the Courts it is always under the Vagrancy Act or under Sub-section 11 of Section 54 of the Metropolitan Police Act, 1839.

47857. "Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets and behaving in a riotous and indecent manner." You mean they take the charge under that section?—There are some Magistrates who certainly prefer to do it. I forget whether any of the Metropolitan Police Magistrates actually do.

(Chairman.) You mean that one of the learned Magistrates did use that section of the Vagrancy Act.

(Mr. Dickinson.) Then you must prove she is behaving in a riotous or indecent manner.

47858. (Chairman.) One Magistrate told us that besides the soliciting or importuning a very slight thing is enough?—Yes, putting the hand on the man's arm is regarded as indecent behaviour.

47859. But the same Magistrate also added that in most of the cases he deals with under the Act, having regard to the class of persons, there was undoubtedly conduct which anybody would call indecent, and as to the indecency of which there was no doubt?—There is a decision of the High Court which shows it is entirely a question of fact for the Magistrate as to what constitutes indecency.

47860. What do you say as to the alleged bribery of the police? Has anything ever come before you in your official capacity which leads you to think that that kind of thing takes place?—No, I think nothing. We have had one or two complaints of bribery. I got someone to go through the complaints against the Metropolitan Police, which we have received in the Home Office during the last three years, 1904, 1905, and 1906, and amongst them there are three or four complaints of bribery. One or two of them were perfectly trivial representations, without any sort of ground on which one could make an inquiry. Then there was Platt's case—his complaint to the Home Office was made after an officer had been dismissed. Then there was another which was anonymous and apparently insane, and then there was a complaint from a man named Stevens, who had been convicted of coining. He brought a very definite charge against a particular police-sergeant of being in the pay of certain clubs which had been raided by the police. Inquiry was made into that statement by the Commissioner, and it was found that this sergeant had been removed from the district where those clubs were before the clubs were even opened. The man who made the charge did not know of his transfer, and he charged this sergeant with being in the pay of the clubs at a time when he had already been removed to another district and could not possibly have come into contact with the two clubs. It was simply a malicious charge, made without any foundation whatever.

47861. (Mr. Dickinson.) Were any further steps taken in a case like that, or did you at once accept that as settling the question?—That was the result of the Commissioner's report. I do not know the exact nature of the inquiries he made.

47862. Would that information be communicated to this man Stevens?—This man Stevens, as a matter of fact, was and still is in prison, and I do not think it was communicated to him.

47863. May we have the list of complaints?—I will have the figures prepared and hand them in on the next occasion.

FIFTY-FIFTH DAY.

Captain JOHN WILLIAM NOTT BOWER, sworn.

Captain J. W. N. Bower.

6 June 1907.

47864. (Chairman.) You were educated at Sandhurst, and went into the Army?—Yes.

47865. Which regiment were you in?—I served in the 33rd Regiment and the 8th King's, and subsequently in the 5th West York Militia.

47866. Then you joined the Irish Constabulary?—Yes.

47867. And then you became Chief Constable of Leeds, and then Chief Constable of Liverpool?—Yes, I was appointed Chief Constable of Liverpool in 1881.

47868. Afterwards you were appointed Chief Commissioner of Police for the City of London?—Yes, in 1902.

47869. You have had from our Secretary a memorandum or syllabus of heads of evidence?—Yes.

47870. You have been good enough to send us a statement of your evidence, and I think perhaps the best way of proceeding will be for me to read the general head and then ask you to make your statement?—Certainly.

47871. As to the general manner in which the Metropolitan Police discharge their duty in regard to the three classes of cases referred to the Commission, what have you to say?—I have had a knowledge of their work generally, and I have naturally felt a strong interest in observing it for the last 25 years, and for the last five, during the time I have been Commissioner in the City, of course I have had a very intimate and constant knowledge. I am convinced that the duties generally of the Metropolitan Police are performed with intelligence, discretion, consideration, and trustworthiness. In saying this of course I admit there have been errors of judgment and some black sheep occasionally. If that were not so the police force would be more than human, but I do not hesitate to say that if you take any other class of the community—even the higher professions, such as the Army, the Navy, the Law, or the Church—I do not believe you could find any body of 16,000 men and subject their actions to close scrutiny over a very large number of years who would come out of that scrutiny with a better record than the Metropolitan Police do. I have seen them under all sorts of circumstances, their tempers often very severely tried, and I must say I have the greatest admiration for the way in which they perform their duty, and I have an absolute faith in their honesty and trustworthiness.

47872. Then, as to the duty of the City Police in similar cases, and the manner in which their duties are discharged, do you wish to make some kind of comparison?—The duties of the City Police are practically identical with those of the Metropolitan Police, but necessarily, owing to the condition of the City of London, their duties in connection with the three classes of cases that are being specially considered are less onerous than those of the Metropolitan Police.

47873. Can you tell us how the City Police is organised in the City of London?—The City Police is organised under the City of London Police Act, 1839, 2 and 3 Victoria, cap. 94. I do not know whether you would wish me to quote the different sections.

47874. I should think that is not necessary, but you may tell us the system of grading the officers?—The strength of the City Police Force is 1,006, which consists of one Commissioner, one Assistant-Commissioner, one Chief Clerk (who is also Chief Superintendent), two Assistant-Clerks (graded as Chief Inspector and Inspector), one Superintendent of the Detective Department, one Superintendent of the Executive Department, three Chief Inspectors of Districts, one Chief Detective Inspector, fifteen District Inspectors, nine Detective Inspectors, twenty Station Inspectors, seventy-four sergeants in uniform, twelve sergeants (detective), and 865 constables, and in addition to those men there is one sergeant and fifty-nine constables employed on private service.

47875. That is 1,006 plus sixty for the City of London?—Yes.

47876. Can you tell me what the resident population of the City of London is. By residents I mean the night occupiers?—About 26,923 (last census).

47877. And then, of course, by day there is an enormous influx from all parts?—Yes, an enormous influx.

47878. Has any estimate ever been formed of the total number of persons actually within the limits of the City of London, say, at 12 o'clock on a week day?—There was some years ago, and, speaking from recollection only, I think it was estimated at between 300,000 and 400,000.

47879. But it must vary constantly, I suppose?—I think it is steadily increasing, because we find that the resident population of the City is steadily decreasing. Any houses there are are being gradually turned into offices, and that necessarily increases the day population pro rata with the decrease of night population.

47880. Then a force of nearly 1,100 to a resident population of, say, 26,923, would be a large one?—Yes, it would be excessive, no doubt, for the night population, and I think that is shown clearly by the way our duties are distributed. Whereas in most police forces there would be nearly twice as many men on duty at night as there are in the day time, in the City we have three times as many men on duty in the day time as we have at night.

47881. You find that the 1,066 men you have are ample for your purposes?—They are sufficient, I think.

47882. (Mr. Whitmore.) Has there been any increase of recent years?—I think there was an increase about seven years ago—that was about two years before I came to the City.

47883. (Chairman.) You might perhaps tell us what are the duties of each grade, so that we may compare them with the duties of the Metropolitan Police?—The Chief Superintendent and Chief Clerk has charge of the clerical department at my office, and he exercises jurisdiction over matters connected with the force generally. The Superintendent of the Detective Department has charge of all criminal matters, and is responsible for the conduct of the officers and constables attached to the detective department. The Executive Superintendent supervises generally the outside work of the police and the work at the various stations. He visits the men and the stations at uncertain periods. He also attends the Courts during the hearing of important cases, particularly when it is likely that the conduct of the police may be called in question. He assists by making and carrying out the arrangements for pubic functions; he is responsible for the due performance of the duties of the officers in charge of recruits and other staff officers. The Chief Inspector of the District is responsible for the discipline and proper performance of the police duties in his district—in fact, his duties are those which are performed elsewhere by a Divisional Superintendent. He personally investigates as far as possible all matters of complaint arising in his district. He has immediate charge of two police divisions, and is expected to have a personal knowledge of all officers and constables in his district, so as to be able at any time to give such information in that direction as I might require.

47884. Upon that, may I ask you how many officers there are in a district?—Roughly speaking, there would be about 300 officers.

47885. So that the Chief Inspector of the District is practically Superintendent of the district, and is personally acquainted with all the officers?—Yes. I am of opinion that that is the largest number of men who ought to be under a Superintendent, because it is impossible for a man to have that personal knowledge either of men or of their work if he has a number in excess of that.

47886. In the case of the Metropolitan Police Force, the corresponding officer seems to have a very much larger number of men?—I believe up to 1,000 in many cases, which seems to me quite unwieldy.

47887. At any rate, the fact is that your Chief Inspector has under his care and supervision only some 300 men?—Yes.

47888. Whereas the corresponding officer in the Metropolitan Police Force has about 1,000 men?—That is so, and I may say with reference to that, when I was in Liverpool we found that the divisions were getting to an unwieldy size, running up to 600 or 700 men, and we increased the number of the divisions and Superintendents, so as to bring them down again to 250 or 300 men, which, in my opinion, and in the opinion of the authorities at that time in Liverpool, was quite as many as one man could effectively supervise.

47889. 1,000 men would be a complete regiment according to our Army theory, I suppose?—It seems to me at the present moment, comparing it with the Army, that you have a very strong regiment commanded by one sergeant-major.

47890. In the Army, what is the average number of men directly under a sergeant-major?—A sergeant-major has no number of men directly under him. He is really a sort of staff officer, who acts under the adjutant, who again acts under the colonel.

47891. (Mr. Whitmore.) You mean that the Superintendent is not a commisioned officer?—No. I should like to say as the question has been put that I am not at all suggesting he should be. I am suggesting that his command should be brought down to a reasonable number.

47892. (Chairman.) Then I suppose in the Army a Sergeant-Major has sergeants under him?—Yes. The Sergeant-Major in the Army is practically the assistant of the Adjutant, who is a commissioned officer, and who is staff-officer to the Lieutenant-Colonel Commanding the battalion. The next rank is that of District Inspector, and they have two classes of duty. First, reserve at the station. The Inspector on that duty assists the Chief Inspector in all matters connected with the general work of the station. He investigates charges, complaints, etc., and admits prisoners to bail in accordance with the provisions of the City Police Act. He is responsible that all such matters are properly entered in the books kept for the purpose, and that reports are submitted of any matter requiring to be dealt with. The other Inspectors are employed on patrol duties. They exercise direct supervision over the sergeants and constables on duty in the streets, and take charge generally of all matters occurring in the streets in the absence of a superior officer. They visit and supervise the work at the stations during the time the reserve Inspector is not on duty. Then the Station Inspector is responsible for the general clerical work of the station, and, in the absence of the Chief Inspector or Inspector, investigates charges, complaints, and so forth, and generally deals with such matters as those officers would do if present. He is responsible that all prisoners are visited at least once every hour, and that necessary refreshment is supplied to them.

47893. When you say that in the absence of the Chief Inspector or Inspector he investigates charges, complaints, etc., you mean that he is the officer at the station to whom a Constable who has arrested a prisoner makes the charge?—That is so. If the reserve Inspector is present the reserve Inspector himself would take the charge. If he is absent the Station Inspector, who is doing clerical duty always at the station, would do it.

47894. Then as to the sergeants?—The sergeants are in charge of a section, and are responsible that the constables under their immediate control do their duty properly. The sergeant receives reports from constables of all occurrences that they are called upon to take action in except as regards charges, and submits them to the officer in charge of the station. I may say that in addition to the Inspectors and Station Inspectors there is always a constable on duty at the station for the purpose of attending to the prisoners and other duties. That really is a short description of the duties of the officers. Of course the constable is in charge of the beat.

47895. Again for the purpose of comparison you might tell us what the hours of duty are of the various grades?—With regard to the Superintendent and the Chief Inspectors there is no limit. The District Inspector goes on reserve to do duty from 9 in the morning till 6 in the evening. Those, of course, are the busy hours in the City. We have not much work after 6 o'clock, as there would be in the Metropolitan district. The patrolling Inspectors do duty in different reliefs from 6.30 to 2.30, and from 2.30 to 10.30, and from 10.30 to 6.30. Those are the three reliefs. The Station Inspectors always do duty in three reliefs, from 7 to 3, from 3 to 11, and from 11 to 7. Then with regard to sergeants and constables on beat duty, the first relief does duty from 6 to 10, and from 2 to 6. The second relief does duty from 10 to 2 and from 6 to 10. The night duty work from 10 to 6, with half an hour's allowance for refreshment. Then sergeants and constables regulating traffic do duty from 8 to 5, from 9 to 6, and from 10 to 7, and have a time allowance of at least an hour for refreshment. Then we have patrol duty, and in the day time these men muster with the men on beat duty or with those regulating traffic as required. When the traffic man goes off for refreshment his work is taken up by one of the men on patrol. Then with regard to the night duty patrols they are on duty from 5 to 1, and from 6 to 2 a.m., with half an hour for refreshment. The total number of constables employed in the streets on beat duty are 121 each relief by day, and 181 by night. Then there are 214 regulating traffic. The day patrols are 58, and the night patrols 35.

47896. Then with regard to the promotion of officers, what have you to say?—Promotion from the rank of constable to that of sergeant is upon a general system. About once a year all men of from six to twelve years' service, who desire to be considered for promotion, are told to send in their names. These names are then considered by a Board consisting of the Assistant Commissioner, the Executive Superintendent, and the three Chief Inspectors of districts, who, acting upon their general knowledge of the men, and upon careful inquiry made with regard to their conduct and fitness, allot marks not exceeding 50 to each man according to the degree of "Efficiency in practical police duty," and "Fitness for higher rank," which they consider him to possess. Those men who receive 25 (half) marks or upwards, are nominated by the Board for examination. The examination is held by the Assistant Commissioner, assisted by the Chief Clerk, and the Detective and Executive Superintendents. Subjects and marks are:—Efficiency 50, allotted by Board already alluded to. Theory of police duty (including the writing of a report), 50. Spelling, 35. Handwriting, 35. Arithmetic, 30. Total, 200. From those obtaining the highest number of marks a sufficient number of men (at the last examination 12) to fill the probable vacancies during the coming year, are placed upon what may be termed the "Waiting list." Those unsuccessful in getting upon this list are again allowed to apply to be considered so long as they remain within the limits of service, 6 and 12 years. Promotions to Station Inspector and to higher ranks, are made by the personal selection of the Commissioner, who acts on his own knowledge of the man's general qualifications, the information obtained from his immediate superiors, his education, and (so far as possible) weight is given to the length of his service.

47897. As to the filling up of vacancies to the office as Station Inspector and higher grades, do you think it would be expedient to have the power to nominate men from outside—men who have never been, say, in a Police Force?—I should not like to suggest any appointment of men from outside to any grade in the Police Force up to that of Superintendent. I think they are the men who are best qualified in every way to fulfil the duties, but if you put the question to me as to whether I consider that any change ought to be made with regard to the appointment of officers or the inauguration of a system of officering above the rank of Superintendent I think a change might be made beneficially.

47898. (Mr. Whitmore.) Not including Superintendents?—Not including Superintendents. With regard to that I should say I think there is a double reason for not touching on the promotion to the rank of Superintendents by appointing them from outside. I think in the first place the duties are such as require a very long and intimate association with the police conditions of the place where the man is serving, and for that reason that no man who has not had practical experience in the streets is really well fitted to discharge those duties. Another reason I think is this, that if you want to get a really suitable class of man as a constable there must be a certain number of prizes held out to induce that right class of man to enter the Police Force, and I think that the prizes which are held out by promotion up to the rank of Superintendent are none too high to induce the right class of man to join the police. I have already said that I consider the divisions that the Superintendents have to control are too large, but that does not affect, to my mind, the question of promotion, or the question of pay.

47899. (Chairman.) Then the higher offices are the Commissioner, the Assistant Commissioners and the Chief Constable?—Yes. With reference to that point, of course, I do not think my views probably coincide with those of many other officers of the Police Force. I think the present system is entirely wrong, and I have held that view for very many years. In fact, more than 25 years ago, at the request of Sir Edmund Jenkinson, who at that time was attached to the Home Office, I submitted a memorandum that possibly is in the Home Office up to the present day, giving my views very strongly upon the point. I think that if you want to have the Police Force managed as intelligently and as well as is possible you want to have a class of officers who have had good preliminary education. I do not hesitate to say that I should prefer a man who has had a University education or something similar to it, and who, in addition to that, has had a training in police work from his early years. At the present time the appointments of chief constables and the higher ranks (I am not speaking only of the Metropolis, but of the whole country) are filled up really from two classes, either promotion from the ranks or by the bringing in of Army officers who have probably not had any administrative experience in the Army, and who have all their experience in work in civil life to learn after they have taken up a responsible position. I think either of those two classes do not give the officers that are required to get the most efficient possible work out of the police of the country. My idea, generally, would be that you should open up a career for officers of police, that you should take men of the class and education that you at present get to fill the positions of the higher divisions of the Civil Service. You would take men in that way, as a rule, who have had a good public school and University education, who consequently take a wider view of life generally than a man who has not had those advantages, and you take him into the police at a time when he is young and capable of learning, and I should suggest he should not be at once put into a responsible position, but he should be put in a position where he would gradually learn his work and qualify himself for filling a higher office. I believe a system of that sort would work; it would no doubt be expensive at first, but whether ultimately it might not lead to a reduction of expenditure is a question which would have to solve itself.

47900. Your reference to the Home Office suggests to me this question: by whom are you, as Commissioner, appointed?—I hold my appointment from the Corporation of the City of London, subject to His Majesty's approval. The Home Office approve my appointment, and I hold it subject to the approval, in the first place, of the Court of Aldermen, and, in the second place, of the Home Office.

47901. Do the Home Office ever communicate to you in reference to complaints in regard to cases that have been heard in the City of London?—I constantly have communications from the Home Office.

47902. Do you make any report straight to the Home Office when such a communication reaches you?—Yes. I should say with regard to the Police Committee of the City of London their control is purely financial. The position I hold is quite independent in that sense. I rather think myself that the City Police system is probably the best of the very many police systems that exist in the country at present. I do not think that if you take the provinces, for example, it is at all desirable to have bodies such as Watch Committees usually are in the provinces, interfering with either police duty or police discipline. I think those really ought to be under the control of the Home Office, who would see that both duties and discipline are carried out in the same way all over the country. To take the class of cases that this Commission is dealing with, the three classes of cases are cases where the duties are carried out in very dissimilar manner in various towns in the country. You find Watch Committees giving orders on subjects of dealing with prostitution or dealing with the Licensing Acts. You find in one case a Watch Committee that is dominated by publicans, and in another case you find a Committee dominated by the extreme temperance party, and the duties necessarily carried out by the police are entirely under the control of these Watch Committees in different ways in these different places, as they are bound to be, and I think that in the public interest is very undesirable. I think that the body who have to pay the police should have certainly the power of the purse, financial control, and that they have in the City of London. The Police Committee exercises that control, but they have no power in the City of London to interfere with either duty or with discipline, and I think that that ought to be so.

47904. I suppose they have?—I can speak from experience. For instance, in Liverpool, I was not really interfered with very considerably, and I was not interfered with at all on questions of discipline, but on questions of prostitution and on questions of licensing we were constantly being interfered with, not only by the Watch Committee, but by the public opinion in the working of it.

47905. Perhaps my recollection is not quite accurate as to what Major Tarry said, and his observations may have been limited to the proposition that he was not interfered with as to questions of discipline.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think that was so. That was his evidence.

(Witness.) He was not interfered with, but there is the power to interfere.

47906. (Chairman.) But as I understand it the City Committee would have no power to interfere with you at all?—They have no power.

47907. Then with regard to the general regulations, I suppose you issue general regulations or your predecessors issued general regulations for the guidance of the police?—Yes, we have this book. (Producing book.) I am afraid it is very much out of date at the present time, and it is in course of being revised, but I should like to put this book in, if the Commission cares to have it.

47908. Yes, we should like to have it before us. What is it called?—"Orders and Regulations and Acts of Parliament." You will find some of the alterations that have been made have been marked in these books that I put in, and of course there are various alterations, and the whole book is now being rewritten and remodelled.

Captain J. W. N. Bower.

6 June 1907.

47909. I see that the book you have handed in is entitled "Orders and Regulations and Acts of Parliament relative to the Police of the City of London," and this was reprinted in the year 1894?—That is so.

47910. Do you know when it was first compiled?—I could not say that.

47911. A good many years ago, I suppose?—Yes, very many years ago. I could not say the date.

47912. It is now being revised?—Yes. The Orders and Regulations, I should say, are made by the Commissioner, subject to the approval of the Court of Aldermen and the Secretary of State.

47913. I see that this book purports to be "Orders and Regulations formally made." Is there something that is less formal than the Orders or the Regulations made by you?—Yes. I constantly issue orders on different points as they arise from time to time. Those are statements in writing signed by the Chief Clerk by order of the Commissioner.

47914. I rather meant this—that seeing a good deal of discretionary power is allowed to constables, it might be expedient for a Chief Commissioner to give some advice as to their exercising their discretion?—We often do that, both by our written orders and by verbal communication. Very frequently we should see the Chief Inspector and tell him verbally what ought to be done in particular cases, and ask him to convey it to the men concerned.

47915. Do you know the White Book, or the Instruction Book, as it is called, of the Metropolitan Police Force?—Yes.

47916. That contains a good deal which would hardly come under the head of "Orders and Regulations." A good deal of it is advice to constables?—No doubt.

47918. That is the kind of instruction I was thinking of. I see it goes on to state: "It is intended here to state such parts of the law relating to the office of a police constable as may be sufficient for the general instruction of every member of the Force. Each individual will bear in mind the extreme importance of making himself perfectly acquainted with this subject, to enable him, with a due regard to his own responsibility, to act efficiently for the protection of the public." Do you find that the constables do make themselves acquainted with the Acts of Parliament and with the Orders?—Yes, I think they do. I have no reason to find fault with the way in which they generally do their duty.

47919. Then we come to the heading of "Statutes under which proceedings for drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation are taken"?—In the case of drunkenness the proceedings are taken under the Licensing Act of 1872 or the Licensing Act of 1902. There are powers under the City Police Act of 1839, but we really never use that Act now.

47920. In the City Police Act, 1839, are there any special provisions as to solicitation?—Yes, there are. There is, first of all, Section 35, Sub-section II., and the clause runs: "That every common prostitute or night-walker loitering or being in any thoroughfare or public place for the purpose of prostitution or solicitation to the annoyance of the inhabitants or passengers." That is the clause that might be used; but we find that for practical utility it cannot be used, because neither the inhabitants nor the passengers will ever come forward to prove annoyance, and the Magistrates will not convict without that evidence.

47921. There is the Vagrancy Act of 1824?—There is the Vagrancy Act, Section 3, which says: "Every common prostitute wandering in the public streets or public highways, or in any place of public resort, behaving in a riotous and indecent manner." That, again, we find is of very little use, because, as a rule, these women do not behave in either a riotous or indecent manner.

47922. Then under what section of what statute does the constable usually act when there is persistent importunity?—I really may say that we cannot act at all. Our hands are so tied that there is nothing to be done. When I was in Liverpool we did deal with solicitation in the streets under the Vagrancy Act to a very great extent, but it was due to the Magistrate who dealt with those cases holding that the mere fact of a prostitute walking up and down in the streets and accosting would in itself constitute indecent conduct. In that way we were enabled to deal with them, but we do not find the justices in the City will hold that.

47923. There are no bye-laws in the City relating to that matter, are there?—No, there are no bye-laws.

47924. Then with regard to arrest, what have you to say?—We have no special regulations with regard to summary arrest. The men deal with it under the powers conferred by these various Acts of Parliament.

47925. Have there been any complaints recently by any prisoners that they were arrested with too great violence?—No, none.

47926. Or improperly handcuffed, or anything of that kind?—No.

47927. Have there been any complaints as to the improper use of the truncheon during your time?—No. With regard to the truncheon I can find no record of its having been used at all for five years, and I believe not for a very much longer period.

47928. Then as to taking prisoners to the station, have you recently introduced a system of self-defence according to which constables may be able to discharge their duties better?—Yes, I consider the system of self-defence which we have initiated in the City is of very great service, both in protecting constables from violence and in securing the removal of violent prisoners without injury to themselves.

47929. Has any complaint come under your notice from any person that he was improperly treated while being taken to the station?—No, we have nad no complaint. There was one prisoner who told the Magistrate the following morning that the police had hurt him a good deal, but there was nothing to show he had been hurt. He was certainly not injured, and he was an extremely violent prisoner. But beyond that mere statement in court we have not had a complaint of any kind, and we have had no injury recorded that has occurred through it.

47930. As to the management of the charge room, what have you to say?—The charge room is the office in which the general business connected with the division is conducted, and an officer is always on duty there. In every station the dock is placed conveniently near to the desk at which the officer sits who takes the charge. With regard to his powers and duties, the officer in charge has full discretionary power as to taking or refusing a charge. In the one case he enters the particulars in the charge sheet, and in the charge book, and in the other case in the refused charge book. Section 50 of the City Police Act appears to imply that all prisoners arrested by the police should appear before a Magistrate, but the officer in charge of a City police station has always exercised a discretion and refused charges where he thinks it necessary.

47931. That is to say he does refuse charges?—He does refuse charges.

47932. Are any special instructions given to the Inspector as to what he is to do in regard to taking or refusing charges?—No; there are no special instructions given to him. He has to use his own discretion in the matter. The only thing he is instructed to do, and invariably does, is that if there is a charge brought in and refused in which he considers that a constable has behaved improperly, in that case he has to make a full report for my information.

47933. Suppose a prisoner wishes to call witnesses. Supposing a prisoner has been arrested for being drunk and disorderly, and is taken to the station, and says: "I have got some friends of mine, and I should like them to be heard as to whether I was disorderly or not," would the Inspector listen to that?—The Inspector would not take that evidence. He would take care that the friends were warned so as to attend before the Magistrate the following morning, but of course he would not hear the case in a complete sense.

47934. He could not hear the case because he has no power to administer an oath?—No.

47935. That is clear enough, but the instructions to the Metropolitan Police contemplate that witnesses should be heard at the station?—If a witness came with a prisoner to the station the Inspector would hear what he had to say, but he would not send for a witness, or anything of that kind.

47936. Would he make a note of what the witnesses said?—Undoubtedly he would use his own discretion. It might possibly influence his own discretion even.

47937. Then your view is, I take it, that the duty of the police Inspector is a duty of an executive kind, but one as to which he has a discretion which he ought to exercise in a fair way?—Yes, I should say, speaking broadly, his duties are simply to ascertain that there is a good prima facie case.

47938. I understand, however, that access by intended witnesses to the charge room is permissible?—Invariably. We do not allow the public generally in, but any man who is an intending witness, and who comes with the prisoner, we should admit to the charge room, and the Inspector would hear what he had to say.

47939. It is not directly relevant to this head of evidence, but I may ask the question here—do you have constables outside the police station on duty?—There would be one. The reserve men, I think, would be outside when a charge is brought on. We always have a man to keep order outside.

47940. I do not mean when a charge is brought on, but supposing I went to one of the police stations should I find a man standing outside like a sentinel?—You would, as a rule.

47941. He is what you call the reserve man?—He is what we call the reserve man.

47942. Do you ever have occasion to put two men outside a station?—No, I think not.

47944. Has he a complete discretion as to whether he would allow a man to come in when a charge has been taken?—I do not think he would stop anyone coming in unless there was any disorder, or anything of that sort, or a crowd there, or the officers were likely to be interfered with. We never refuse access of the people to the station. I have said already that even if there was a crowd if a man said he was a witness we should admit him.

47945. But supposing I went, say at 11 o'clock at night, to one of your police stations, should I be allowed to go in unchallenged?—Certainly. If you walked in you would simply walk into the charge room where a man would be.

47946. The doors are kept open?—The doors are kept open. They would only be closed in case of a disorderly crowd, or anything of that sort outside.

47947. The reserve man has a right to close the door if he likes?—He might close the door at his own discretion if he found it necessary.

47948. Would the reserve man be guilty of any impropriety if at 11 o'clock at night I walked into the station, and he said "Stop; what is your business"?—No, I think not. He would very likely ask your business if you were to stroll in.

47949. That is what I rather thought. I asked you a moment or two ago whether I should pass in quite unchallenged?—I beg your pardon. I did not quite understand your question. If the man was at the door he would ask what your business was, and would take you to the inspector.

47950. That seems to be the case with regard to the stations of the Metropolitan Police Force?—I think so.

47951. What have you to say as to the treatment of prisoners in the charge room?—I think prisoners are treated with every consideration. They are placed in the dock when they are brought in, and they remain there while the charge is being investigated. If prisoners are drunk when they are brought in, and unable to give any intelligible account of themselves, they are placed at once in the cells, and brought out of the cells, and the charge investigated as soon as they are able to understand it.

47952. I think you have been good enough to investigate for us the number of charges refused?—I have. You will find a detailed statement at the end of my proof, which I have marked "Return A," which gives details of the charges. (The return was handed in, and will be found at the end of the witness' evidence.)

Captain J. W. N. Bower.

6 June 1907.

47953. Without going into the details will you give me the total?—In 1904 7 per cent. were refused—that is dealing with these classes of cases. In 1905 8 per cent. were refused, and in 1906 11 per cent.

47954. Now, as to the cells; what have you to say?—Prisoners who can walk are simply escorted by the constable down to the cells, and drunken prisoners unable to walk are carried down on stretchers. The cells are heated according to the state of the weather, and each prisoner is supplied with a pillow and rug. The constable on reserve duty visits them at least once an hour. The officer in charge of the station is held responsible that this is done—that is, he is given orders in the instruction book. He visits prisoners himself also at irregular hours, and so also does the District Inspector.

47955. Then with regard to bail?—Bail is taken under the City Police Act, 1851.

47956. And as to the facilities afforded?—All facilities possible are given. The police inform friends and relatives at the prisoner's request. That is invariably done through the police of the district in which the prisoner lives, but a direct wire would be sent if a prisoner desired it, and was willing to pay the expense.

47957. Does that mean throughout the area of the City or throughout the whole of the metropolis?—Throughout the whole of the metropolis. If a prisoner told us he was living in Walworth we should send a wire direct to the police at Walworth asking them to inform his friends.

47958. And they would help you?—They would help us. They help us, and we help them. We always work together.

47959. Would the same remark apply in a case where the prisoner gives an address outside the metropolitan area?—Yes.

47960. There are many populous places outside the metropolitan area?—Yes, and the same thing would apply. We send to the nearest police station wherever it may be.

47961. Supposing a man lives at Romford, and he comes up to London, and gets into trouble, and he gives his Romford address, you would communicate to the Romford Police Station?—Yes.

47962. And they would assist you in the same way as if it was a Metropolitan Police station?—Yes.

47963. Now, as to the failure to obtain bail?—In case of failure to obtain bail the prisoner remains in custody except in cases of simple drunkenness, when prisoner is released on his own bail on becoming sober.

47964. The bail is taken, I suppose, to appear at the police court at 10 o'clock the next morning?—That is so.

47965. Then with regard to medical attendance on prisoners?—Constables who find a doubtful case of drunkenness or illness in the streets would send for the ambulance and take the person to the hospital. Of course, if there the doctor certified that the case was a case of drunkenness he might be taken back to the station and charged. The prisoner's own medical attendant is not sent for in such cases as are under consideration unless the prisoner specially requests it, and the medical attendant could be readily got at. Officers in charge of stations have full discretionary power to send for a surgeon whenever they think it necessary. There are four surgeons who attend the various City Police stations when their services are required. They are either on the telephone or live so near the station as to be available at almost any moment. Should one, however, be unavailable the next nearest is immediately sent for. There is no regular appointment of the surgeons. They are approved by me as the surgeons to be sent for, and they are paid by fee. For ordinary cases between 7 in the morning and 7 in the evening 5s., and from 7 in the evening to 7 in the morning 7s. 6d. All cases of drunkenness at any time they receive a fee of 7s. 6d. for. That is the scale approved by the Police Committee by whom their accounts are paid.

47966. Where do the fees paid by the prisoner, say at the police court go. They would, of course, be handed to the Clerk of the Court?—Yes, and he pays them over to the Police Fund, which pays the fee. The doctor's fees are paid out of the Police Fund.

Captain J. W. N. Bower.
6 June 1907.

47967. Then the fines imposed for these statutory offences go to the Police Fund?—They go to the Police Pension Fund. I have not the Act before me at the moment, but I daresay I can look it up.

47968. You say in your statement "In cases of drunkenness, if the prisoner pays the fee at the station it is handed direct to the surgeon"?—If the prisoner pays the fee at the police station he practically pays the surgeon himself. If he does not pay the surgeon himself it is reported when he comes before the Magistrates that this expense has been incurred, and the Magistrates are asked to include it in the costs of the case. As a matter of fact they do. I find the fines go to the Pension Fund under Section 11 of the City Police Act.

47969. Have any complaints made by members of the public against individual constables, or complaints of general misconduct on the part of the police come before you?—We have very few complaints.

47970. Could you tell us the procedure as to complaints made at stations?—All complaints are dealt with by myself. The procedure is given in the Instruction Book, at page 19, paragraph 7.

47971. "Complaints made by the public against members of the Force should have particular attention. If made in person the particulars should be taken down in writing"?—That is so, and that written report is submitted to me.

47972. Supposing I came to the police station and complained that a constable had attempted to blackmail me—I will not take the case of an assault, but I complain that I had seen a constable behaving improperly. What would the Inspector in charge do?—The Inpector in charge would take that complaint down in writing, and the complaint would then be submitted to me the following morning, and I should give such instructions as I thought necessary. If the case were one of sufficient importance I should fix a day to hear the case personally, and send for you and ask you to be good enough to attend.

47973. The first thing you would do would be to ask for a report from the constable himself, I suppose?—Undoubtedly.

47974. You would tell him what the nature of the complaint was?—I should tell him what the nature of the complaint was and get his reply to it, and see what he says.

47975. And then if I came again and asked what had been done you would make a more formal inquiry yourself?—I should make a formal inquiry in any case on the writing, unless I was satisfied that the complaint was so trivial that it was unnecessary. Of course, as you know, in police work we very frequently get complaints that almost answer themselves.

47976. I am not thinking of some obviously trivial complaints due to ill-temper?—If it was a serious case I should go into a full investigation of it, and when the report came to me with the constable's explanation upon it I should refer it to another officer, if necessary the Superintendent of the Detective Department, or possibly the Chief Inspector of the district, and I should order him to investigate it. He would see all the witnesses who were necessary, or would take down their statements in writing, and then the report would be resubmitted to me.

47977. Would you allow me, as the complainant in the case, to ask questions of the constable?—Oh, no. I should expect those questions to be put through me if there were any questions to be put to the accused person. I should allow the complainant to cross-examine any witnesses that were brought on behalf of the constable, but I should not allow him to question the accused party direct.

47979. Would you permit the constable to ask questions of me as the complainant?—Undoubtedly.

47980. In other words, you would conduct your inquiry as nearly as possible as a Magistrate would conduct an inquiry if it was a case in court?—That is so.

47981. Have you ever had a communication from the Home Office saying that somebody had complained to the Principal Secretary of State that he had been improperly arrested by a constable, say, for being drunk and disorderly?—I do not think we ever have. There is none in my recollection.

47982. No communication of the kind has come to you from the Home Office?—No.

47983. If such a communication came to you, would you direct an inquiry?—Oh, yes; I should deal with it exactly in the same way as if it came from the private individual. I should have the matter inquired into and report to the Secretary of State when it was complete.

47984. Would you deal with the case exactly as if it were a case of a complaint coming straight to you or coming straight to the police station?—Certainly.

47985. And then the kind of inquiry you make would be the kind of informal trial of the case that you have mentioned?—Yes.

47986. How many police stations are there in the City?—We have six police stations, that is exclusive of the headquarters.

47987. I suppose the first thing on receiving a complaint that you would do, would be to communicate to one of the stations at which it was made?—To the Chief Inspector of the district.

47988. And the Chief Inspector would forward reports?—Yes.

47989. Then I come to the next head: Special difficulties (if any) in dealing with the three classes of cases that are referred to us?—With regard to drunkenness and disorder, we have no special difficulty. With regard to solicitation, I have already mentioned the difficulties that we labour under. The Magistrates will not convict prostitutes charged with solicitation unless the person solicited attends the court, and that makes it practically impossible for the police to deal with the offence, as the persons solicited invariably decline to attend.

47990. Am I to understand the Magistrates in the City require the attendance of the persons solicited?—That is so, or of the inhabitants of the district. We must prove annoyance on the part of one or the other, and they require evidence to be given prima facie that the persons have been annoyed.

47991. What is the attitude of the public towards your Police Force?—Most friendly.

47992. You say say you are unable to prevent solicitation as the inhabitants decline to attend the court?—That is so. Of course, solicitation in the City is a very small matter compared to what it is in the Metropolitan district. In fact, with the exception of just in the neighbourhood of Liverpool Street, Houndsditch and Aldgate there is practically no solicitation.

47993. Are the women chiefly foreign women?—They are chiefly foreign women in that neighbourhood.

47994. Has any complaint of solicitation by men come under your notice?—No, none.

47995. Then I come to the head of bribery and blackmailing?—There has only been one case since I have been in the City, and I am not aware of any previously. It was the case of an ex-police-constable, and the particulars of the case, shortly, are these: It occurred in 1905. Information was received by a Dectective-Inspector that a constable had informed a street bookmaker that he must be at a certain place at a given time for the purpose of being arrested. The Inspector, with a sergeant, kept observation, saw the arrest made at the time and place given by the informant—without anything having occurred to justify it—followed to the station, and informed the officer in charge of the above particulars, with the result that he refused to take the charge. The bookmaker, on being questioned, did not admit that any arrangement had been made for his arrest, but said he had given the constable money on several occasions. The constable, on being questioned, admitted that, and I dismissed him.

47996. That is the only case?—That is the only case. I may say that I have never even heard of any other case, or had it suggested to me that the thing occurs.

47997. You have no ground for thinking that the practice is widespread?—I am quite sure it is not widespread, and with regard to the other suggestion of bribery that was made, that is, with regard to prostitutes, I go further and I say I do not believe it exists.

and I do not believe the constables themselves would tolerate it. I believe that if constables knew that their comrades were guilty of any conduct of that kind they would be the first to bring it under notice.

47998. Is there a good deal of street bookmaking in the area of the City that you have come across?—Yes, there is a good deal.

47999. Has it been pretty drastically dealt with by the Magistrates?—Yes, it has been as strongly dealt with as the Acts of Parliament allow.

48000. And now the new Act is in force?—The new Act is in force, and no doubt it has had the effect of, to a great extent, clearing the streets. Whether it has stopped the amount of that class of betting I am rather doubtful.

48001. Then with regard to the duties of officers as to proceedings in the police courts?—An Inspector attends each police court to represent me on all general matters, and is responsible for reporting to me all favourable or unfavourable comments on the police by Magistrates, and any other matter coming under his personal notice that he thinks should be the subject of inquiry or report.

48002. What is the duty of a constable who has made a charge which has been taken?—He attends the court in the morning to substantiate the charge, and in the meantime he makes all necessary inquiries for the information of the Magistrate as to the character and so forth of the person charged under the supervision of his own officers.

48003. Is it his duty to bring any circumstances that he discovers subsequently to the arrest that tell in favour of the prisoner to the attention of the Magistrate?—Yes, they frequently do.

48004. You have known them to do that?—I have known them to do that on very many occasions. I may say with regard to that that only within the last few weeks there was a case where that was done and done with such effect that a very lenient penalty was imposed and the Magistrate especially commended the constable for the way in which he had dealt with the case, and it was brought under my notice in that way.

48005. Then I gather that you do not necessarily take much notice of the fact that the Magistrate dismisses a case?—Certainly not.

48006. Unless there is some reflection in the matter?—Unless there is some reflection on the constable. I must not be taken as admitting for a moment that the dismissal of a case is a reflection on a constable.

48007. I may here ask you as following from that answer that with regard to promotion within the force the number of cases a man has been concerned in is not an element taken into your consideration?—Certainly not. I have not the faintest idea. I have not it under my notice at all.

48008. You have been good enough to put down something about this system of self-defence. It has an indirect bearing on our inquiry, but I should like you to read what you have said on that subject?—"Self-defence" is the name we have given to the subject. The public seem to have designated it "Ju-Jitsu," which we rather object to. It is a method I introduced in November, 1904, by means of which violent prisoners can be taken to the police stations in the most humane manner possible with the least risk of damage being done to them, and assaults being committed on the constables in whose custody they are. By having a knowledge of "Self-defence," constables are able to protect themselves from violent assaults, even assaults with the knife and other weapons used by the rough element in various parts of the City. I claim that its advantages are that, first, it has given greater confidence to the police in dealing with violent characters. Secondly, shaken the confidence of the roughs. Thirdly, reduced the number of assaults on the police, as will be seen by the following return of the number of persons charged with that offence during the past six years:—1901, 161; 1902, 162; 1903, 167; 1904, 175; 1905, 123; 1906, 106. In the fourth place it has minimised the number of police required to arrest violent characters, from one to two constables being now generally sufficient, whereas formerly from four to six were often required in similar cases. I have put in the books that we have which give a number of photographs. There are also other photographs, of which I have only one copy, and which I should like to have back.

48009. If it is the original we had better not take it?—I will leave the copies of the books with you, but those photographs I should not like to go out of my own hands, because they are rather detailed, and there might be too much learnt from them.

48010. We will look at them and then return them to you?—You can retain them as long as you like as long as I know they are in the hands of the Commission. I can mention one or two cases to illustrate what has been done. They are only illustrations.

48011. I should like to ask you this question first. Have you, in your experience, found that the police do have great difficulty in arresting violent prisoners at great danger to themselves?—Enormous difficulty. They are very frequently badly injured, and have great difficulty in getting these violent prisoners to the station.

48012. The only weapon allowed is the truncheon, so that constables have been in your experience in very great danger, even of their lives?—Certainly. There are just two cases which I can mention as illustrating the way this system of self-defence has come in useful. The first one was in May, 1906. A Metropolitan constable was assaulted and two City constables went to his assistance, and after one of them had been thrown they obtained the double coat and arm hold, and took the prisoner to the station without difficulty. You will find that coat and arm hold illustrated in one of those photographs. The prisoner is a most violent character, and has been convicted many times for assaults on the police, and he had hardly ever previously been taken to the station without it taking at least five or six men to do it. On this occasion he was sentenced to three months' hard labour. The second case I mention is in the Metropolitan Police District, in March of this year, 1907. A City constable when off duty in plain clothes in the Metropolitan Police District, went to the assistance of a constable of that force who had been kicked in the abdomen by a man whom he was arresting. Before he could get a "Self-Defence" hold the prisoner again kicked the Metropolitan constable, and all three fell to the ground. The City constable was then able to apply the "over arm" hold, and stood the prisoner on his feet, pinning him against the wall till the arrival of two other constables, to whom he handed him over. He was then able to attend to the injured constable, who had become sick from the assault, and was therefore unable to help in restraining the prisoner. The accused was sentenced to 15 months' hard labour. "Self-Defence" is a compound principally of English wrestling, common-sense, and a knowledge of anatomy. Ju-Jitsu is also introduced into it, but to as small degree as possible, and although the instructors have a good knowledge of the latter, only the recognised holds of "Self-Defence" are taught for police use. Most of these holds are fully explained and illustrated in Sergeant Wheeldon's book, which I have put before you, and which is largely used as a guide by the instructors. Several other useful holds have, however, been introduced since the book was written, and the whole now form part of the course of instruction through which every man is put on joining the Force. All ranks, from Inspector downwards, have also been through a course of this method of "Self-Defence." I produce four photographs which illustrate seven different holds, etc., in "Self-Defence." I could describe those from the photographs, if you wish. The first one, No. 1, shows a release from a hold. But the constable in that case had been seized round the neck. You will find his finger under the nose of a man. That method was adopted from the system of life-saving in the water, when the rescuer is seized by the drowning person, and it is found a very effective one, because when the finger is placed under the nose in that way the man is rendered almost helpless, besides it being very painful. No. 2 photograph shows a violent prisoner being held down by one constable with the use of one hand, the other hand being available for use to blow his whistle to summon assistance. No. 3 shows the use of a hold called the single hammerlock, by means of which a violent prisoner may be made to walk on tip-toe to the station in rather a ridiculous manner. He is quite helpless to avoid it. Then, No. 4 shows a variety of holds; and the last photograph shows four different ways—there is the half nelson, the overarm, the double coat and arm, and the double long arm. I may say that during the two and a half years in which the system of "Self-Defence" has been in practice there has been no case of injury to a prisoner, and I have had no complaints from either the Magistrates or public. The only complaint is the somewhat trivial one that I have mentioned, where one man said the police hurt him. It is the general opinion of my officers that a knowledge of "Self-Defence" is most useful and beneficial to the police as a means, when handling violent prisoners, of both preventing injury to those handled and also assaults on the police. Specially selected men from the following Forces have, upon the application of their authorities, been put through a course by the City Police instructors, in order to qualify them in giving instruction in "Self Defence" in their own Forces: Kent County Constabulary, Herts County Constabulary, Essex County Constabulary, Bradford Borough Police, Kilmarnock Borough Police, Inspector Baker, British Guiana Police, at request of Colonial Office.

48013. Looking at the table which you have marked "Return A," showing the percentages of charges of drunkenness and so on refused by officers in charge of police stations during three years, 1904, 1905, and 1906, could you without difficulty give us the statistics as to the total number of cases coming before the City Police Courts?—I have not them here, but I could give you them without any difficulty at all.

48014. Would you mind letting us have a return showing the cases of drunkenness and disorder in the streets?—Certainly. My annual report for last year would show it.

48015. We shall be much obliged if you will send us a copy of it?—This table shows the whole number of those particular cases.

48016. It does not show what was the result in the Police Court?—No. I will get that for you.

48017. The statistics seem to be here?—We have got the statistics so far as dealing with them by the police is concerned, that is to say, whether the charges are accepted or refused, but we have not got the ultimate result.

48018. That is what I mean—charges made, or charges taken to the station and refused. Take 1905 with regard to drunkenness?—There were 1,241 charges taken to the station, and seventy-seven were refused. That leaves 1,164 to go before the Magistrate.

48019. They all went before the Police Court?—They all went before the Police Court.

48020. I should like to know the result if I can?—I can get that for you, certainly.

48021. (Mr. Dickinson.) What regulations have you got with reference to the police receiving tips from the public?—We have no regulation except this, that no man is allowed to receive a tip of any kind without reporting it to me and getting my approval for its acceptance.

48022. Is that in the regulations?—It is at page 5, No. 10.

48023. "No member of the force shall solicit any reward or gratuity whatever, nor shall he retain any reward or gratuity without the Commissioner's sanction." Is that latter part of it efficacious?—I think it is. I have a large number of these rewards reported to me constantly for approval. Of course, I cannot say that there are no cases where men may take a tip without reporting it, but I do not think the practice is followed to any extent.

48024. When you say you have a large number of rewards reported to you, what kind of rewards would those be?—The greatest number would, of course, be in criminal cases where rewards are sent in by the solicitors, or by the parties who have been concerned in the case, for the services rendered. Of course, others come in sometimes for services, such as opening carriage doors at some function, or something of that sort. People are attended to in illness sometimes. There may be one or two cases where I have refused to the constable permission to retain a reward.

48025. When they are reported, do you allow them to keep them?—I allow them to keep them so long as I think it is proper. I have very rarely had a case where I have not allowed it to be received. I think there may be one or two cases where I have refused permission.

48026. Then you do not discountenance individual tips, so to speak?—No. Probably, as a general rule, it would be preferable that nothing of the kind should be done, but, as people will give tips, we feel it is better to know exactly how the matter stands than to have them possibly received surreptitiously.

48027. Of course, there would be no temptation for a constable to refrain from informing you of that?—No. That is really the object we have in view. I do not think there is any temptation. A man who has received a gratuity, and knows he has received it properly, feels no hesitation in reporting it, because he knows as a matter of fact that there will be no objection to its being received.

48028. I suppose those rewards would be given more in connection with civil work, if I may say so?—Yes. Of course, especially in the case of detectives, there are very frequently substantial rewards given by persons when the cases are completed; I mean to say I have had quite large rewards, amounting to £20 and £25, sent for services rendered by an officer in detecting a fraud.

48029. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Is it given direct to the officer?—No. The large rewards are generally sent to me, and I am asked that they may be allowed to receive it. The smaller rewards (cases of 5s., and that sort of thing) very often are given direct to the officer, and he reports the receiving of it to his Inspector, and it comes through to me for approval.

48030. (Mr. Dickinson.) May I take it from you that you approve the system of the police receiving money from private individuals—quite properly, I mean?—That is rather a difficult question to answer. If one could see a practical way of preventing it ever being done, I think I would rather it were not done. I would rather there was nothing of the kind, but I do not thing that is practicable, and I think we do the best thing practicable in making it an open and above board system in getting it reported.

48031. Of course, it rests to a certain extent with a policeman as to where he draws the line if he is reporting a proper payment, or who is failing to report it?—We should deal severely with a man who did not report it if we subsequently found it out.

48032. You would except his reporting little tips?—He must report any "tip" he receives.

48033. What would be about the amount of the tip?—I think half-a-crown is about the smallest he gets. I do not remember any lower sum reported.

48034. One is rather asking you as to this because you said you are convinced there is no blackmailing by police of prostitutes?—I am quite certain of it.

48035. You have a positive assurance that no money passes by way of tips between prostitutes and constables?—I do not believe there is anything of the kind. From what I know of the men and their feeling, I do not think the men themselves would tolerate it.

48036. There is a great difference between blackmailing a prostitute and voluntarily giving him money and his accepting it?—Clearly; but I do not think the average constable would demean himself by taking money from a prostitute. I think the feeling and tone of the force is too high for that. Of course, one cannot say what one individual black sheep may do in a large number of men, but I am perfectly convinced that the system is not general.

48037. You think the general tone of the Force would prevent his accepting it?—I think the general tone of the Force is too high for them to accept money from prostitutes.

48038. You have not very much prostitution in the City?—We have not. I had a great amount of it in Liverpool. I had twenty years there before I came to the City, and there prostitution was very rampant. I can say the same thing there. I never had but one complaint all the time I was there, and that complaint was not substantiated.

48039. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) In all the twenty years you were at Liverpool?—In all the twenty years I was at Liverpool.

48040. (Mr. Dickinson.) You have told us of the case of a bookmaker. When did that happen?—April, 1905.

48041. That was a case in which a detective in the Force discovered that a bookmaker was going to deliver himself up to a police officer at a certain time for the purpose of being brought before the Magistrate?—Yes.

48042. And you said that was the only case you have had?—That is the only case.

48043. Of course you cannot say that that sort of thing never happens?—No.

48044. But this was a case in which you were satisfied that there was some arrangement between the two?—Undoubtedly. The arrangement for arrest was clearly proved, and although the bribery, as it stood, would have been on the evidence of the bookmaker alone, still the constable did not really deny that he had received money from him.

48045. Did you investigate that case at all?—I investigated it personally.

48046. Did you find out whether that particular constable and that particular bookmaker had been in the habit of doing that periodically?—I had not that absolutely proved, but I was equally satisfied that that had been so. I was able to trace that they had been constantly meeting in public-houses and other places.

48047. But, so far as those two men were concerned, there did appear to be a system?—I think, between those two men, there was a system by which the constable was bribed on some occasions, and where undoubtedly there was an arrangement to arrest him at convenient times and places.

48048. And, of course, to avoid arresting him at other times?—Yes.

48049. Did you find whether that was a periodical process?—Yes; it was not at regular periods. The conclusion I came to really was this: This man was a very well-known bookmaker, and if the constable on duty in that neighbourhood had not arrested him at all, his superior officer would very soon have wanted to know why, and by means of arresting him at arranged times he was able to show that he was taking action against this man, and consequently to avert suspicion both from himself and from the bookmaker.

48050. This case, I suppose, was made public?—No, it was not made public. The charge was refused at the station. I do not think it ever got before the Magistrate. It was not public at all.

48051. It was not made public?—No.

48052. The facts were not known to the public?—No. Of course it was the property of a considerable number of persons, and no doubt it got spread about to some extent.

48053. One question I want to ask you with regard to promotion. You told us your system is to invite applications every year from those who thought they were entitled to promotion, and then you, I suppose, refer those applications to some subordinate?—I refer it to a board as I have mentioned, consisting of the Assistant Commissioner, the Executive Superintendent, and the three Chief Inspectors of Districts.

48054. What do they inquire into?—They investigate simply the man's conduct and fitness for promotion without regard to his education or anything else.

48055. Do they have regard to his superior officers?—The three Inspectors are his immediate superior officers. Each one of them would have a personal knowledge of him, and the other two, the Assistant Commissioner and the Executive Superintendent, would act as sort of moderators.

48056. There is no one between the Inspectors and the constable then?—The sergeant and others. The Chief Inspector of the district would make inquiries from the sergeants, no doubt, before they brought the man up.

48057. When that board has satisfied itself that he is a suitable canditdate for promotion then you make an examination?—Yes, the board have fifty marks for the examination placed at their disposal, if one may say so, and they allot marks to what they consider the man's practical efficiency is, and all those men who obtain 25 per cent. of those marks are nominated by the board for examination, and the marks are carried forward to be credited in the examination.

48058. And it is compeitive?—And it is competitive.

48059. You find that system the best?—It think it is.

48060. Of course you are dealing with a comparatively small force?—We are dealing with a small force.

48061. Would that system be of any use in a much larger force?—I do not see why it should not.

48062. Are you personally acquainted with the constables?—No, I cannot say so. I do not think it is possible to be personally acquainted with over one thousand men. I personally select the higher officers because I am acquainted with them personally. I do not think I could do it with one thousand men.

48063. The personal factor comes in with the Inspectors?—It comes in with the Inspectors, the Executive Superintendent, and the Assistant Commissioner; they all talk it over together.

48064. How long has it been the habit for Magistrates to inquire into charges against prostitutes when a person is annoyed?—I think from time immemorial. Mr. Francis can speak for many years. I think it has always been the habit.

48065. And for that reason you sometimes get convictions?—We get none.

48066. You do not often prosecute?—Not very often; it is not much use taking a case to the court to be dismissed.

48067. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I should like to understand a little more from you about the inquiry into the conduct of the police. First of all, you may have a complaint made by an individual as to the conduct of some constable or officer?—Yes.

48068. Or you may have a complaint made by a Magistrate or Judge who thought that the conduct of a certain officer ought to be inquired into?—Yes.

48069. That would be brought to your notice either directly or it would be brought to the notice of some of your officers, who would call your attention to it, which, in your view, would necessitate an inquiry into the conduct of the policeman?—Yes.

48070. Or, equally, it might be that the Home Office would ask you to make an inquiry?—Yes.

48071. I understand that has not taken place in your time?—There have been instances, but I cannot recall details.

48072. I mean the last instance which I put to you?—It seems to me we may have had inquiries from the Home Office, but I cannot recall a case to my mind at the moment.

48073. I put to you four different cases?—I think we deal with them in an identical manner.

48074. That is what I want to know. You do not make any distinction?—Not the least.

48075. I suppose complaints are made by individuals?—Yes, and by Magistrates.

48076. And then you hold an inquiry?—Then I personally hold an inquiry. What we do in all cases is this, whenever a report of a case has to be made in consequence of some remarks made by a Magistrate, the Inspector in court is responsible for taking it down in writing and submitting it to me. If a complaint is made at the station in like manner by a private individual, the Inspector at the station is responsible for taking it down in writing and sending it to me. A complaint may come direct in writing from a private individual to me, or to an officer, who sends it on to me, and in every case I take the same action. I direct a full inquiry to be made first of all by the Chief Inspector of the district, or possibly by the Detective-Superintendent; he takes the evidence of the witnesses he sees the witnesses, and takes down all the statements in writing; and he submits his full report on the occurrence to me.

48077. When you say he takes down the statement in writing, would that include the statement of the police-constables or constables?—Yes. As far as possible we give the police-constable who is charged the statement made against him, so as to enable him to reply to it, and he then sees all the witnesses called, either on behalf of the constable or on behalf of the prosecution, if one may say so, and he makes his statement also in writing; then they are submitted to me, and I then decide what action I shall take. If the case is one that demands it, I make it convenient to arrange a day for hearing the case, and I investigate it, as I have already said, as nearly as possible, except that I cannot take evidence on oath, in the same way as a Magistrate investigates a charge in the police court. I deal with it as an offence against discipline on the part of the constable, and I deal with him on those grounds. If the case is one where any criminal proceedings are involved, I always adjourn my hearing of the case until the conclusion of the criminal proceedings.

48078. I daresay you have told us this already, but

Captain J. W. N. Bower.
June 1907.

I do not know. Do you allow a person who is making a charge to appear before you, and to question the constable at all?—I do not allow him to question the constable who is charged, but I do allow him to cross-examine the constable's witnesses. I deal with the constable charged much in the same way as a Magistrate would deal with a prisoner. I should look upon him in much the same sort of way as a Magistrate would look upon a prisoner. I should allow the constable's witnesses to be cross-examined, and I should, in the same way, allow a constable to cross-examine the witnesses brought against him.

48079. With regard to the constable, do you still treat the constable in the same way as you have said, or would you examine the constable yourself?—I should probably ask the constable for his explanation.

48081. That really seems to point to this, that your objection is not so much to the police-constable being cross-examined as that the method of cross-examination might lead to altercation?—I suppose one learns by experience, and my view has somewhat changed. I did not deal with them quite so strictly at one time, but I find I can get the facts better and in a more simple way by dealing with them really as a Magistrate does in court.

48082. I do not quite follow why there should be an objection to the cross-examination of a constable if there is a conflict between him and the person complaining?—Perhaps I do not make myself quite clear. I should allow questions to be put to the constable through me.

48083. You would?—Yes. If a man bringing a complaint put to me that he wished the constable to be asked so-and-so, I should put the question myself. I should not allow him to cross-examine the constable personally.

48084. But you did at one time?—I used at one time to allow questions to be put direct.

48085. Within what time?—Within the last fifteen years. I have never done it in the City of London.

48086. That was when you were at Liverpool?—When I went to Liverpool.

48087. When you gave that up you allowed questions to be put to a constable, but instead of the person asking questions direct they have to go through you?—Yes.

48088. The effect is the same, I suppose, with regard to eliciting the facts?—The effect is the same with regard to eliciting the facts, but it saves what I have already suggested—persons squabbling very frequently.

48089. I will tell you why I put the question to you. I understood from one answer you gave you were suggesting that a constable was to be treated in a different manner because he was on his trial, so to speak, and therefore he was not to be cross-examined?—I would not quite go so far as that. I think a man charged is always entitled to a certain amount of protection, but I would not go to the extreme extent suggested that he is not to be asked questions at all by anybody.

48090. According to the evidence you gave at first (we have had something about it before in this inquiry, and that is why I was anxious to ascertain your view), when a constable is charged there seems to be an idea that it is not right that he should have any questions put to him by the person who is making the charge?—I do not go so far as that.

48091. You do not hold with that?—I do not go so far as that.

48092. As a result of your experience you think it better that the questions should go through you because order is better maintained?—Yes.

48093. And you think you get better at the facts?—Yes.

48094. It was suggested during the course of this inquiry at one time that he might have to be put upon his trial?—Of course if that were the case, and if it pointed to that, I should be very much more careful in what I did. If it were a question which possibly might involve a criminal charge I should not allow a man to incriminate himself.

48095. You cannot always tell, of course?—No.

48096. But in a case which you knew would or might lead to a criminal charge being preferred against him you would be more careful in the questions which you would allow to be put or which you would put yourself?—Clearly.

48097. It would have to be a charge which assumed a rather serious aspect before you took that view, would it not?—Quite.

48098. Otherwise I do not see how you could inquire into any charge which involved a charge of misconduct against the constable?—Yes, but of course those are cases in which if a charge had to be laid it would have to be laid by the police. Take the case I have referred to of taking money from a bookmaker That might possibly have led to a charge against the constable in court, and it was proved almost entirely on the man's own statement in reply to questions put to him by me. If I had dealt with a man for an offence against discipline I should not have dreamed of dealing with him in court after that.

48099. You had dealt with it?—I dealt with it and dismissed him.

48100. In Liverpool, during your twenty years there, did you hold many inquiries?—Many; every week I was holding them.

48101. Cases of complaint there are rather more frequent than in the City?—Yes.

48102. I suppose one reason is that there is a good deal more night work?—Yes, the night work there is very heavy.

48103. Are more complaints made by individuals than by Magistrates?—Yes, I should say there are more complaints by individuals than by Magistrates. We do not get many complaints from Magistrates.

48104. Except what you have told us in the evidence already given. You have said what you used to do fifteen years ago. Except for your altered view since that fifteen years ago you have conducted your inquiries in the same way?—Yes.

48105. That means, I understand, that you presided at the inquiry?—Yes. Of course there is this difference between the position in Liverpool and the position in the City of London. In the City of London, as Commissioner, I am entirely responsible for dealing with all those cases. In Liverpool all my inquiries were subject to be overruled. Any decision I arrived at was subject to be overruled by the Watch Committee, who in some cases conducted the inquiries themselves.

48106. When an inquiry was held, as I understand it, you presided over it yourself?—Yes, in the first instance.

48107. Do you know the system that is, I will not say always, followed, but is at times followed, in the Metropolitan Police Force with regard to these inquiries?—I know generally what the system is.

48108. Does it strike you as satisfactory?—Yes, I think, on the whole, it is. It would be very difficult in a Force of that very large size to suggest any better system except by an alteration of the whole system of officering the police which I have already referred to.

48109. Does it strike you as satisfactory, with regard to the holding of inquiries on charges made, where there may be a conflict of evidence, to send it to the Inspector to make inquiry and then to report?—I do not think the Inspector decides it; he only inquires for the purpose of getting evidence to enable his superior officrs to decide it.

48110. But he reports?—Yes, he reports.

48111. Then the trial that takes place is to some extent a trial before the Inspector?—Is that so?

48112. I have no doubt the Commissioner will do exactly as he pleases with regard to it, but there may be some cases in which all the trial that takes place is before the Inspector, and then a report is made to the Commissioner?—I take it that the Assistant Commissioner would decide whether the evidence was such as to require an inquiry to be made, would he not?

48113. The report may be in favour of one side or the other. It is not a question of evidence?—That is what my reports are; my reports are practically a collection of evidence.

48114. I do not want to put specific cases to you, but what is pressing me with reference to what you were saying is this. Suppose a person complains that a constable in some way misconducts himself, and that is heard by the Superintendent who is not going to deal with the case, if the Superintendent conducts the inquiry he then reports upon the facts to the Commissioner. In that case the Commissioner must take the facts from the report of the Superintendent or conduct another inquiry himself?—Certainly. It seems to me that otherwise the inquiry is practically conducted and concluded by the Superintendent.

48115. Exactly?—I think that rather leads to what I suggested with regard to the need for more superior officers in the police. The very fact of the size of the Force and the immensity of its duties are such that it is impossible personally for the Commissioner or the Assistant Commissioner to deal with all these cases, and therefore they must be more or less dealt with by subordinates.

48116. Because of the number?—Because of the number.

48117. Your view seems to be very definite. If it were possible to find some way of doing it the inquiry ought to be conducted by the man who will deal with the matter?—Undoubtedly by the man who is responsible for finally dealing with it.

48118. And you would agree that in any event it would be desirable to have an inquiry of this character where there is a conflict of evidence between the constable and the individual by the highest officer?—So far as it is possible to do it, having regard to the large nature of the duty.

48119. If you found an officer giving evidence, and you came to the conclusion that it was exaggerated for the purpose of bolstering up a case in which he was in danger of failing, what would you do?—I should consider that a very serious offence.

48120. Would you think it right to dismiss a man for that?—As a rule I should. Of course it is rather difficult to answer hypothetical questions of that sort.

48121. But in cross-examination he might say a little more when pressed than he would have done if left alone?—Yes.

48122. That would be rather a different case. I was rather thinking of a case of a constable who had preferred a charge, and then, finding himself in a difficulty with regard to it, exaggerates and makes untrue statements?—That is a case for dismissal, if I am satisfied of that. I take very great pains to impress that on men on joining the Force. Of course I have a small Force, and I personally see every recruit on joining, and that is one of the subjects I specially refer to in addressing them—the necessity for absolute fairness. I also point out to them that we never give a man credit for winning cases, but we do give a man credit for absolute fairness towards the prisoners as well as towards the public in any cases they have.

48123. So that you make it clear to a constable that no blame will be attributed to him if a conviction is not secured?—Certainly.

48124. As long as he has behaved fairly?—I think it would be a most dangerous thing to suggest, as I have already said, that a constable is to be blamed for the mere dismissal of a charge which he has brought.

48125. How do you impress this upon a constable when he joins the Force?—I have the recruits brought before me, generally about four at a time, and I talk to them about their duties. I refer specially to the drink question, which is, of course, always a rather dangerous thing to young constables, and I refer specially to the necessity for truuthfulness; I generally have a long talk to them on that subject. I point out to them the enormous importance of their understanding that it is the very first qualification of a policeman to be able to trust every word he says, and I draw their attention specially to the necessity for truthfulness in giving evidence in court. Then I go further than that, and say that not only must they give their evidence truthfully in court, and be absolutely fair to prisoners, but that they must never say anything that they do not absolutely know themselves, and not to refer to what they have heard, or to what they think may have happened. Then I go from that to impress upon them the necessity for truthfulness in any matter that is inquired about by their officers. Then I go on to point out to them that even if they have committed an error, such as violence, for instance, at a moment when they have been under excitement, if they only make a clean breast and tell us exactly what the truth is, as far as I am concerned, and I believe, as far as all the officers are concerned, we will do all we can to help them, and even if punishment is necessary it will not necessarily be so severe as the punishment for want of truthfulness. I go a great length in that sort of way.

48126. Then officers in your Force have it impressed upon them at the start that they will be severely dealt with if they do not tell the truth?—Yes. I am sure all the Magistrates in the City will give our men credit for being extremely fair, and I do not think they ever hesitate to tell a Magistrate everything they know that tells in favour of the prisoner.

48127. (Mr. Dickinson.) You were speaking of the Chief Inspectors of the districts?—Yes. They are really Divisional Superintendents, only with a smaller number of men under them. Our Chief Inspector of a district has about 300 men under him; a Metropolitan Superintendent has a larger number, ranging to 1,000, under him; but his duties are equivalent to those of our Chief Inspector of a District.

48128. What sort of pay do the District Chief Inspectors get?—£5 a week—£260 a year.

48129. Would they be inferior to the Divisional Superintendents in the Metropolitan?—I should say they are superior to the Divisional Inspectors in the Metropolitan, but inferior in the sense of having fewer men under them to the Divisional Superintendents in the Metropolitan.

48130. Could you give us the rates of pay?—I could. I can send that forward to you.

48131. I mean the rates of pay of all officers?—Of course our rate of pay is very high, especially in the rank of constable.

48132. (Chairman.) You have been telling us about a system of "Self-Defence" which the constables are taught when they join the Force?—Yes.

48133. I rather assume from the necessity of introducing that system that constables are sometimes knocked about by persons of violent character?—Yes.

48134. But have you any record kept of the number of constables that have been injured in taking prisoners to the station?—We should have a record. I can get that out for you.

48135. Thank you, if you kindly will. We do not want you to give the details only for 1904, 1905 and 1906?—I have already given you the number of assaults on constables during those years showing that the number of assaults has decreased since this system of "Self-Defence" has been introduced.

48136. That is on Return A, is it?—No, it is in the précis of the evidence at page 13. It shows that the number prior to the "Self-defence" system being brought in was 175, and it went to 123 in the following year, and then to 106. Of course I cannot say that that was entirely owing to the "Self-Defence" system being introduced, but it seems to point to the fact that it has had influence in the matter.

48138. My point is not so much directed to ascertain the number of charges made by the police at the police station, but as to the number of cases in which constables have sustained injury in the course of their duty?—I can get that out from the hospital return.

48138. It is quite possible that in taking a drunken violent person to the station, for instance, a constable might receive an injury, and that there might be no prosecution for assault on the constable?—That is so. Of course the general statement I have from our men is that they have been much less knocked about than they were before they were able to use this system.

48139. My object was not directed to testing the efficiency of this new system of self-defence, but it was rather with a view of comparing the proportion of cases of injury to constables with the number of cases in which members of the Metropolitan Police Force have been injured?—I can get that out for you, but, of course, you see the conditions are very different. There is nothing like the number of assaults on the police, or cases of serious injury to the police, in a locality like the City, where there is really no drunkenness, and no night work, to what there would be in a rough district in the Metropolitan area. I shall be very glad to give the figures, but there can be no comparison between the two.

48140. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Most of the offences are offences against property, I suppose?—Yes, against property.

48141. (Chairman.) Of course you know our terms of reference include the question how the police discharge their duties, and that incidentally involves the question of the character of those duties and the difficulties and dangers to which the police are exposed in the discharge of their duty. All I wanted was some idea as to what in that regard is the position of your Force?—Certainly, I will get that for you.

48142. You do say that this new system of "Self-defence" has shaken the confidence of the roughs?—Yes.

48143. I assume from that there are some roughs in the City?—Yes.

48144. They are of the hooligan element?—No doubt.

48145. In fact in one of the cases we have had before us we were told that in a certain part of the City which impinges on the district of the Metropolitan police there is a good deal of rough conduct, and that the men escape from one jurisdiction, if I may use the term, to another?—Yes.

48146. There is a corner of the City where that happens?—Yes, that is so.

48147. You have told us with regard to staffing the Force in the higher grades of the service when vacancies occur, they are filled up from outside?—Yes.

48148. You limit that suggestion to the very highest grade of all?—To all grades above that of Superintendent, and I go further than that. I think what is required is the introduction of a new grade.

48149. You stated very clearly what your views on that question are, but it was that part of your evidence which suggests my putting the question I am going to put. I suppose you would agree that the duties of the Inspector in charge of the station as to taking or refusing a charge are duties of a responsible kind?—Yes.

48150. You have given us your views as to the way in which he has to discharge those duties?—I have.

48151. Do you think it expedient to get for the discharge of those duties a class of person other than the present police Inspector?—No, I do not.

48152. Do you think it would be well to fill up the vacancies from the class you have been referring to?—No.

48153. Then you do not think it would be well to fill up vacancies from the class I am referring to?—No, I do not think so. I think the duties are extremely well performed as a rule. As you are aware, in Scotland there is a system of that kind, but I should be sorry to see it introduced here. I think the duties extremely well done by the Inspector at the station, and I should not at all like the question of the acceptance or refusal of the charge turned into a kind of informal trial of the prisoner before he comes before the Magistrate.

48154. (Chairman.) Thank you. The Commissioners are greatly indebted to you for your evidence?—Thank you.

The following is the Return handed in by the Witness in the course of his evidence:—

Mr. CHARLES EDWARD TROUP, C.B., recalled.

Mr. C. E. Troup, C.B.

48155. (Chairman.) Have you the list of complaints to the Home Office that you referred to on the last occasion?—Yes. (Producing document.) Those are the figures of all complaints on whatever subjects relating to the Metropolitan police that were received by the Home Office during the three years 1904 to 1906.

48156. In 1904 fourteen complaints were received?—Yes.

48157. And three of those related to complaints of wrongful arrest?—Yes.

48158. In 1905 there were 20 complaints, and five of those 20 are complaints of wrongful arrest?—Yes.

48159. And in 1906 there were 34 complaints, ten of which were complaints of wrongful arrest?—Yes, but as you will see, the great majority of those complaints related to matters altogether outside this inquiry. I have picked out the number of cases relating to the three subjects of this inquiry.

48160. In 1904 there were three complaints as to arrests for drunkenness?—Those are the numbers of complaints relating to drunkenness for the three years.

48161. (Mr. Dickinson.) Is that the whole of the three years?—Yes, the whole number of complaints relating to drunkenness in the three years were four, the complaints relating to disorderly conduct two, and there were none relating to solicitation in the three years. In considering these figures it ought to be borne in mind that ordinarily persons bringing complaints against the Metropolitan Police would be referred by the Home Office to the Chief Commissioner. We do not consider that complaints relating to the discipline of the Force properly come in the first instance to the Home Office.

48162. (Mr. Dickinson.) Those are not included in these figures?—I have included all the complaints which we have on record during the three years.

48163. All the complaints which were made?—Yes, but there might be verbal inquiries made which would result in the complainants being told to go on to the Commissioner of Police.

48164. (Chairman.) But take the 34 complaints in the year 1906, have you included any complaints against the police for some act amounting to a breach of discipline?—Oh, yes, everything of which we have got any paper or record in the Home Office, but I only wish to make it clear that we do not consider the Home Office the disciplinary authority, and that if anybody came to the Home Office and said "I have a complaint against a police-constable" the natural or ordinary thing would be to tell him to go on to Scotland Yard.

48165. But I understand that if a man complains he was wrongfully arrested for being drunk and disorderly, for instance, you simply send it on to the Commissioner of Police?—Any of those complaints relating to drunkenness, as soon as they are received, would be referred in the first instance to the Commissioner of Police.

48166. Then I do not quite see what the distinction is in your treatment between a complaint which relates to an act of indiscipline on the part of a policeman and a complaint of some given misconduct?—I was not making any distinction. I was only pointing out that we were not the disciplinary authority, and that therefore those figures were not nearly so large as possibly they might be if we considered the Home Office the proper authority to receive those complaints.

48167. But with regard to complaints of wrongful arrest, you do think you are an authority, I understand?—I do not think we are an authority as regards wrongful arrest. That stands in the same position as anything else. If it is a complaint relating to the discipline of the police the proper authority to deal with it in the first instance, at any rate, is the Commissioner.

48168. Let me suggest to you what the distinction is as to the power of the Home Office to do anything at all in regard to the matter. You, I understand, do not affect to dismiss an individual policeman in any circumstances?—No, not in any circumstances. The power of dismissal rests entirely with the Chief Commissioner.

48169. Quite so. But supposing there to be a complaint of wrongful arrest, leading to a wrongful conviction of the complainant, the Home Office has some authority?—Clearly, when it is a question of conviction or penalty, then the Home Office comes in as administering the prerogative of mercy, and some of those complaints arise in connection with convictions. Others do not. There are 18 cases altogether in connection with wrongful arrest, and six of those relate to actual convictions.

48170. Supposing there has been a conviction which a defendant says was a wrongful conviction, and he appeals to the Home Office, you, I understand, would then communicate with the Chief Commissioner?—Not necessarily with the Chief Commissioner on the question of whether the conviction was wrong. On the question of the conviction we should in most cases communicate in the first instance with the Magistrate. We should not communicate with the Commissioner unless in connection with the application some question arose as to the conduct of the constable. Of the complaints relating to convictions which we receive, only a small number involve any question of the conduct of the police.

48171. Is that quite so? Just let us see what takes place at the police court in the three classes of cases referred to us. The constable has arrested the defendant summarily; the defendant is taken to the charge room and charged. The charge is taken, and then the constable in the majority of cases is the only witness, and himself gives evidence before the Magistrate. The Magistrate then, we will say, convicts. Supposing a defendant then appeals to the Home Office and says that the constable's evidence was false?—We should refer it in the first instance to the Magistrate, I take it, in that case. There is a conviction and not a mere dismissal.

48172. He is a man asking for a pardon or the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, I suppose?—Yes, and very probably the Magistrate's answer might dispose altogether of the question of perjury on the part of the policeman.

48173. It is not simply a question of perjury?—A question either of perjury or mistake.

48174. You would not, in the ordinary course of things, at all consult or communicate with the Chief Commissioner in a case of that kind?—Not if the Magistrate's report enables us to dispose of the case, but I do not think, as regards drunkenness or disorderly conduct there is any case of that sort on the list.

48175. Supposing a complainant writes to you to say that he had been wrongfully arrested, and the charge taken against him, and that the Magistrate had dismissed the charge and complained about the constable arresting him, what action would the Home Office take?—There, I think, we should refer in the first instance to the Commissioner. We might go to the Magistrate, or we might go to the Commissioner, but it no longer comes before us as a question of the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, because there is no conviction. It comes merely as a question of the conduct of the police, and therefore naturally the first person to be referred to in the matter would be the Commissioner. But it might also be useful to consult the Magistrate.

48176. Then, as I understand it, you do think it is part of the duty of the Home Office to inquire into complaints made as to misconduct on the part of police constables?—No, I do not think so, except, of course, so far as the Home Secretary is the official superior of the Commissioner.

48177. We know he is the official superior of the Commissioner?—But the primary authority in all these matters certainly is the Commissioner, and we should refer those subjects to him for inquiry and, generally speaking, for his decision.

48178. Then am I to understand that the duty of the Home Office, according to the practice, is simply to transmit the complaint to the Chief Commissioner for him to deal as he likes with it?—Yes, I think you might say that, in ordinary cases, would be the proper procedure, but of course in cases where there is a probability of questions being raised in Parliament or of public attention being called to them, the Home Secretary naturally expects to have a report from the Commissioner, which he may consider. But if it is a question of mere discipline of the police, then it is for the Commissioner to decide. If there is a question of crime it comes into rather a different category.

48179. I can quite see that distinction, but there is a sense in which all misconduct on the part of a constable is a breach of discipline?—Yes, but if there is a criminal charge it puts it on rather a different footing.

48180. You mean a criminal charge against a police-constable?—Yes, if the complaint amounts to a criminal charge. There is a point I wish to mention to the Commission, and that is that there is a very old standing rule laid down by a Home Secretary many years ago, that when a complaint is made against a constable which amounts to a criminal charge, and when there is conflicting evidence on the subject, the Commissioner ought not to decide the matter, but it ought to be brought before a Magistrate who can take evidence on oath.

Mr. C. E. Troup, C.B.

6 June 1907.

48181. That amounts to a direction to the Chief Commissioner as to what his duty ought to be in a case?—Yes, that was the instruction laid down by the Home Secretary, in 1868 I think it was.

48182. (Mr. Dickinson.) What do you mean by ought to be brought? Who ought to bring it? I should rather like to see that rule?—The Commissioner might bring it if he thought there was a prima facie case against the constable, but, ordinarily, it would be for the parties who are complaining to bring the criminal charge, assuming it is a case where there is conflicting evidence. It was found to be very inconvenient that in a case where there was conflicting evidence, and where witnesses outside the police were concerned, that there should be an inquiry by the Commissioner into what is practically a criminal charge, and the rule was laid down—it is not a very rigid rule, and I think certainly exceptions to it would be found—that that case ought to be decided not by the Commissioner but by a properly-constituted court.

48183. (Chairman.) I think, perhaps, the best way of bringing out the distinction that is in my mind would be to take a concrete case. Supposing I, as a householder, were to write to the Home Office complaining I found there was no constable on the beat on a particular day or a particular night, and asked the Home Office to inquire why it was that my street or my square was not being patrolled and attended to as the other streets and squares are, what would the Home Office do then?—Certainly we should refer that to the Commissioner to deal with.

48184. That would be simply a complaint that some constable or other—of course I should not know his name—was neglecting his duty?—Yes.

48185. And had not necessarily been guilty of any criminal act?—Clearly so.

48186. You call that simply a complaint about a breach of discipline?—Yes, discipline or administration.

48187. And all the Home Office does in that case is to transmit the complaint to the Chief Commissioner?—Yes.

48188. Leaving it to him to deal with the case?—Yes. In some cases the reply might go through the Home Office, but it would be regarded as entirely a Commissioner's question.

48189. But if the complaint is against a particular constable, whether known or unknown, and it charges him with some misconduct which amounts to a breach of the law, the position of the Home Office is different, as I understand?—Yes, but in that case also it would be referred to the Commissioner.

48190. But the Home Office, then, as I gather, is charged with the duty of inquiring?—Oh, no. It would be for the Commissioner in the first place to make certain preliminary inquiries, and then if he found it was a case where there was an actual conflict of evidence—of course, if it was a clear case he might possibly be able to deal with it, but if it was a case where there was a conflict of evidence between the complainant and any witnesses he might bring up and the police officers concerned and any witnesses they might be able to produce, then the old instruction of the Home Office is that the Commissioner ought not himself to give a decision on that which is a criminal charge, but should take any steps he can to have the matter brought before a Magistrate for decision.

48191. You stated that to Mr. Dickinson. I will give you, then, another concrete case. Supposing that I complain that I was assaulted by a policeman on a certain night in some square, but that I could not get his number, what would the Home Office do on that complaint?—We should refer it to the Commissioner, who would make inquiries, and if he found there was a conflict of evidence——

48192. In the case put there is no conflict of evidence possible at that stage at all?—Of course, he would make inquiries to discover who the constable on the beat was.

48193. Supposing I said I have done my best, but I cannot find out who it was. I happed to live in Bryanstone Square, and I might say he ran away in the direction of John Street Police Station, and I went there, but nobody knew anything of it there?—The Commissioner would certainly do his best to discover who the man was.

48194. I have no doubt he would if he was asked, if I went to the Chief Commissioner, but I put the case that I go to the Home Office. What would you do then?—We should send on your letter to the Commissioner, who would deal with it exactly as he would deal with a direct communication from you. We do not assume any jurisdiction to deal with those questions, but the Secretary of State has the power to lay down a general direction to the Commissioner, and that is why I refer to the general direction given nearly forty years ago.

48195. Would not the Home Office write to me and say: "Your complaint is a charge of an assault against an unknown constable, and we are afraid we cannot help you at all; we have sent your letter on to the Chief Commissioner"?—The Chief Commissioner might possibly be able to help you—at any rate, he might be able to supply you with the name and number of the officer on the beat, and give you an opportunity of identifying that officer.

48196. Supposing a man writes and says: "I was falsely arrested by Constable So-and-so in a particular street on such-and-such a night, and I was charged at the police station, and the Magistrate the following day dismissed the case against me, and I ask you to deal with the constable"—giving his name. What would the Home Office do?—Refer it to the Commissioner certainly in the first instance, who would make inquiries into the matter.

48197. Not consult the Magistrate?—We might. I think that would depend on the case.

48198. I have given you a case, and a very simple one?—I think we should probably consult the Magistrate as well as refer it to the Commissioner, but it is the Commissioner who has power to dismiss or to punish the constable.

48199. The dismissal by the Magistrate would indicate either that he did not believe the constable or that the witness was not strong enough to warrant a conviction?—It would imply at least that he felt some doubt—it might be a very slight one—about the evidence of the officer. Of course, a Magistrate is bound to dismiss a charge if he feels any doubt, however slight.

48200. But you send on such a complaint as I have put to the Chief Commissioner?—Oh, yes.

48201. What for?—That he might make inquiries in the matter, and if it were a clear case against the officer, and the complainant did not wish to prosecute, no doubt he would deal with it in that case as a matter of discipline. But if it were not a clear case, if there were a conflict of evidence, he, under the direction that I have referred to, would have to refer the complainant to a Magistrate.

48202. Would you send on such a case to the Chief Commissioner as you would send on one of the other cases I have put to you, a charge of simply breach of discipline on the part of a constable, or do you ask the Chief Commissioner to report to you, or something of that kind?—There would be no distinction in theory between the two. If it were an important case, no doubt we should ask him to report, because we should wish to know what conclusion he arrived at.

48203. And if the Chief Commissioner reports that there was no misconduct in his judgment on the part of the constable, what would the Home Office do?—I take it we should accept his decision, and if the person complaining was not satisfied, I think the reply to him would be "Well, the Law Courts are open to you, and if you have any charge to bring against the constable you must take the necessary proceedings."

48204. Would you take any step to satisfy yourselves as to whether the Chief Commissioner had made any inquiry at all, or as to whether any inquiry was really perfunctory, or whether he had gone into the matter at all, and endeavour to find out all the facts?—I should not feel it necessary to inquire in every case whether the Commissioner had done his duty or not. It is quite possible on reading his report one might feel it was not altogether a satisfactory case, and in that case I have no doubt I should possibly myself, or the Secretary of State, would talk it over with the Commissioner, and one might ask him to make further inquiries, but I should certainly not take up the position that the Secretary of State is to go into the case independently of the Commissioner, and possibly overrule his decision.

48205. In such a case I gather, then, that the Home Secretary would treat the Chief Commissioner as having been his agent, or acting for him, in answering the complaint made?—Yes, in a certain sense that is so, but on the other hand the Commissioner also has a statutory position as the head of the Police Force, and as the authority to deal with complaints against his officers.

48206. Do you remember what letter was written by the Secretary of State with regard to the complaint made by Mr. Gerothwohl?—Yes.

48207. What was the letter that was written to the Chief Commissioner?—The papers were merely marked "Refer to Commissioner," and then they went over to Scotland Yard. There was no letter.

48208. What documents were sent to the Commissioner?—The letter of, I think it was, the 12th April, from Mr. Gerothwohl.

48209. The first letter was one of the 12th April, and that was directed to the Home Secretary, and also there was a letter of the 14th to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers, and a further letter from Mr. Gerothwohl to Mr. Secretary Gladstone?—As soon as the letter of the 12th April, which was the formal letter which enclosed a copy of the evidence taken at the Police Court, came in I referred it to the Commissioner. Then the letter to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers went out to the Riviera, and came back more than a week later, and that also was immediately referred to the Commissioner.

48210. Was the letter sent on to the Commissioner?—Yes, the letter was sent on in original. Then he reported on the 25th April, and we had his report on the 26th, and the Home Secretary had to answer a question in the House the same night about it.

48211. That enclosed a report by Inspector Berry, which was submitted by Sub-divisional Inspector Mackay and Superintendent Mann, and that report contained statements made by several of the police constables concerned?—Yes, that is so.

48212. Then I find a letter from Sir Mackenzie Chalmers of the 28th April, beginning: "I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that he has caused careful inquiry to be made in the matter of your letters of the 12th and 22nd instant"?—That refers to the inquiries made by the Commissioner. There was no separate inquiry made by the Home Office.

48213. And only to that inquiry?—To the inquiries made by the Commissioner. There were first the written reports that you have been referring to, and then the inquiry made by Major Wodehouse at Scotland Yard.

48214. The language of the letter is: "I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that he has caused careful inquiry to be made." What was the inquiry that the Secretary of State had caused to be made?—The inquiries made by the Commissioner. Those inquiries were made by the Commissioner at the instance of the Secretary of State.

48215. You only refer to one inquiry in the letter?—The word "inquiry" does not mean a formal inquiry.

48216. Probably not. I am only trying to find out exactly what the letter means?—It is a general word there.

48217. I find that inquiry was held by Major Wodehouse, Assistant-Commissioner, on the 25th April, at which he took—I cannot say oral evidence—but at which he took the statements of the constables orally?—Yes.

48218. Was it that part of the inquiry that you referred to?—That was covered by the Commissioner's letter, I think. The Commissioner's letter was written after he knew the result of that inquiry.

48219. (Mr. Dickinson.) Was that so?—Yes, I think so.

48220. (Chairman.) In the report of the Commissioner of Police of the 25th April I find no reference whatever to that inquiry which had been held on the very same day by the Assistant-Commissioner?—He had to make the report that day. We were in great haste to have the report made at once because the Secretary of State had to answer a question in the House of Commons on the 26th, so that things were rather hurried up at that moment.

48221. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you personally know of this inquiry by Assistant-Commissioner Wodehouse?—Yes, I knew that Major Wodehouse was making inquiries. We did not have the Minutes of Evidence taken by Major Wodehouse, or anything of that sort sent in.

48222. (Chairman.) Then you did know that Major Wodehouse had not examined anybody except the police constables?—Certainly, I did know that Mr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette had not been asked to appear, but then one also knew that their sworn statements were before the Commissioner in making that inquiry. He had the report before him of what they said in the Police Court, which was given on oath, and therefore he knew in effect what they had to say on the subject.

48223. So that when the letter of the 28th April was written, you knew that Mr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette had not been confronted with the constables?—Yes, we cerainly knew that. Perhaps I had better say we went rather carefully into the question.

48224. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The inquiry by Major Wodehouse is on the 25th, but the letter is not till the 28th?—Yes, but the Commissioner's letter was written on the 25th, and the Home Secretary answered the question in the House of Commons on the 26th.

48225. (Chairman.) That is why I asked you whether there was only one inquiry which was dealt with by you on the 28th April. How did you get to know when the letter of the 28th April was written that there had been this oral inquiry before Major Wodehouse?—I have no doubt the Commissioner told us. It is not mentioned in his letter, is it?

48226. No, there is no mention in his letter of the fact that it was being held?—However, I am quite sure we knew that Mr. Gerothwhol had not been asked to attend to make any statement when we wrote that letter.

48227. Did you know—I will not say it is the invariable practice—but did you know it is not uncommon for the Chief Commissioner or rather the Assistant-Commissioner or Superintendent who makes the inquiry to ask the complainant to come to the station or other place where the inquiry is held in order to be confronted with the constables?—Yes, we must have known that. But when that letter came in we had to go rather quickly into the question of what decision should be arrived at. It had to be arrived at on that particular day.

48228. What decision?—The decision of what reply was to be given to Mr. Gerothwohl. As a matter of fact, the first thing to be done was for the Home Secretary to decide what answer he would give to the question in the House of Commons, which was asked at the instance of Mr. Gerothwohl. It was quite clear, I think, that there was likely to be some complaint made, because Mr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette had not been asked by the Commissioner to attend, and a possible course would have been to have asked the Commissioner to go further into the matter and hear them, but in that connection we had to remember, first, that although he had not seen them personally, he had before him the evidence taken from them at the inquiry before the Magistrate, and that evidence was taken on oath, whereas any statement they might make before him would not be on oath. Then we had also to consider the rule which I have just mentioned, which laid it down that in a case of conflicting evidence involving a criminal charge against a policeman, the Commissioner should not decide the question, but should, if possible, endeavour to get the question decided by a Court. We had also to consider that in one case, one very important case, where that rule had been departed from, it had led to very great difficulties. I am referring to the Cass case. There an inquiry was held by the Commissioner, assisted by Mr. Horace Smith, who has given evidence here. The result of that inquiry, which was held in Scotland Yard, was most unsatisfactory. The evidence could not be taken on oath, and the inquiry itself was absolutely abortive. No conclusion was arrived at at all, and afterwards, when the case had to be brought before the Court on a charge of perjury, the Judge, Mr. Justice Stephen, commented very unfavourably on the action of the Home Office in holding this extra-judicial inquiry. All those things seemed to point to the fact that it was not desirable to ask the Commissioner to undertake any further inquiry in this case. The best course seemed to be, if any further inquiry was necessary or desirable, that it ought to be an inquiry on oath, with cross-examination of witnesses, and, if possible, with a definite charge against the incriminated officers. Personally, of course, the Secretary of State has no power to order an inquiry of that sort. It could only be done by authority of Parliament, and therefore the reply sent to Mr. Gerothwohl was to the effect that after the inquiries made by the Commissioner at the instance of the Secretary of State, the Secretary of State did not see his way to adopting his view as to the conduct of the officers, but if Mr. Gerothwohl desired to take any further proceedings no difficulty would be put in the way, but, on the contrary, any facility we could give should be given. The object of the whole thing was that if there was a further inquiry it should be an inquiry on oath, with proper cross-examination of witnesses, and with a definite decision at the end. Speaking for myself, I was perfectly satisfied when I advised the Secretary of State, that no further inquiry at Scotland Yard would lead to any satisfactory result.

48229. So much for that. I daresay some of the other Commissioners may like to ask you some further questions upon that. I have only one further topic on which I invite your evidence, and that is as to the matter arising out of the case of Police Constable Worsley. That was a case in which an action was brought against a constable in, I think, the Brentford County Court, for alleged assault by a constable in using the truncheon, and judgment was given for £25 damages. The judgment appears to have been entirely regular, and there has been no appeal from it, and we have not gone further into the details of the case, but we have assumed the judgment was right. Worsley was simply transferred from one division to another, and then, with regard to the payment of the damages, he appears to have been made chargeable by the Commissioner with £5, and the remaining damages, £20, were paid out of the Police Fund?—Yes.

48230. What have you to say with regard to that case?—Of course in that case the officer was defended with the authority of the Secretary of State—the Commissioner arranged for the officer to be defended by the police solicitors. It is a very difficult question to say in what cases officers should and in what cases they should not be defended at the expense of the Police Fund. The general rule is if the Commissioner is satisfied that the officer is not to blame in the matter then, if the officer wishes it, his defence may be undertaken at the expense of the Metropolitan Police Fund and by the solicitors appointed by the Commissioner. In this case that course was taken. The police-constable was defended by Messrs. Wontner at the expense of the Police Fund. That being so, the Police Fund having undertaken the defence, it seemed only a fair thing to the complainant that when the decision went against the police officer the Metropolitan Police Fund should secure his costs and the sum given in damages.

48231. I can understand the costs, but am I to understand that in that case the Chief Commissioner advised the Home Office that there was a good defence to the action?—Before the case came on he went into that question. He certainly thought that the officer was engaged in the execution of his duty, and was not to blame, or, at any rate, not seriously to blame in the matter.

48232. Has the Secretary of State got to certify or to approve of the defence being so undertaken?—He has got to approve in every case before the defence is undertaken by the police solicitors.

48233. As to the costs I quite understand, and I understand further that the Home Secretary thought there was a good defence to the action, otherwise he would not have sanctioned the undertaking of the defence?—Yes, there appeared to be a good prima facie case on behalf of the officer.

48234. But how about the damages? Did the Chief Commissioner represent to the Home Secretary that he was still of opinion that the constable was right and that the verdict was a wrong verdict?—You mean as regards not charging the officer with the damages?

48235. Yes?—What he represented to the Home Secretary was that clearly he must accept the finding of the court as right, that the officer must have used more violence than was necessary. The finding of the Judge was that the officer was justified in using his truncheon, but that he used it more than was necessary. The Commissioner said: "We must accept that, and no doubt that is right as a legal decision; but, having regard to all the circumstances in which this happened, to the fact that the officer was surrounded by a hostile crowd, and that this man had, at any rate, attempted to use great violence, there was a great deal of excuse for him if he did go somewhat beyond the strict rules," and therefore he suggested that he should be relieved of the costs, and that he, the Commissioner, should deal with it as a matter of discipline. There was a good deal of discussion on the subject, and finally the Commissioner's view was accepted, subject to the qualification that £5 should be paid by the officer himself.

48236. During your long experience at the Home Office do you remember any complaints or correspondence alleging bribery of the police by prostitutes or by street bookmakers?—There certainly have been one or two complaints about bribery by street bookmakers. One of those, at any rate, has come before this Commission. In the three years for which I gave you the figures there were two complaints of bribery by bookmakers. One was the case of Platt, which the Commissioners had before them, and the other case was a case of Barrow, I think. I do not know what happened in that case. It was referred to the Commissioner, and he dealt with it.

48237. Was that a case of bribery?—It was a case of alleged bribery. The other case I referred to last time was a case where a police sergeant was alleged to be in the pay of certain clubs, but there was no mention of betting in connection with that. That was disposed of altogether by the Commissioner's report. I do not remember ever having heard—of course one hears general complaints—but I do not remember any complaint of taking bribes from prostitutes that has ever been substantiated.

48238. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I want to get clear what you have been telling us about this Gerothwohl inquiry. First, was that treated in the ordinary way?—Yes, I think entirely in the ordinary way up to the time of the Home Secretary's letter of the 28th April.

48239. That closed the matter as far as the Home Secretary was concerned for the time being?—Yes. Perhaps I should qualify that by saying this, that if there had been more time one would probably have discussed with the Commissioner the question of whether Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette should not be seen and their oral statements taken. There was no time to go into that.

48240. Because you had to arrive at a decision which had to be announced to the House?—Yes.

48241. Then it amounted to this, did it not, a complaint made by Mr. Gerothwohl on the 12th April, and then that is referred by the Home Secretary to the Commissioner, and the Commissioner refers it to the Inspector apparently for report?—No; I think the reports of the Inspector had been made before he received this letter of the 12th April, which was forwarded to him by the Home Office.

48242. He had called for them?—He called for those reports as soon as he saw the case in the newspapers. Those reports were actually made on the 13th April before Mr. Gerothwohl's letter to the Home Office reached him.

48243. We have heard how that came to be made. That means that as the Commissioner had already got the reports he did not require to call for them?—Yes.

48244. If he had not had them he would have called for them?—Yes, clearly he would.

48245. If they had not been made they would have had to be made, but it so happens they were made, so that all that was required was to have those reports before him?—Yes.

48246. Then he sent the letter in answer on the 25th with the reports enclosed. As far as I can see from this, except the inquiry that takes place on the 25th, there is nothing else done except that the reports are sent by the Commissioner with the letter to the Home Office?—I can only say I am quite certain the Commissioner went most carefully into the whole matter. I saw him more than once before that report came in.

48247. That is what I wanted to get clear, because I am not quite sure that I understood you whether according to you he knew at the time he wrote the letter of the 25th April that Major Wodehouse had been holding that inquiry?—I take it he must have known that. I know the letter did not reach the Home Office till the 26th. I believe it must have been written very late on the 25th. I know he assured me he had been very carefully into every detail.

48248. I do not know whether you have the letter before you, but as far as I can see he does not say anything at all about it in that letter of the 25th. It looks to me, reading that letter, as if he had not the knowledge of the inquiry that was being held by Major Wodehouse?—I think it is quite impossible that he should not have known all about it.

48249. It does not refer to it in the letter which is at page 13 of the Appendix. He goes into it rather in detail and discusses the reports?—Yes, but Sir Edward Henry very frequently writes his own letters without sending us the reports on which they are based. In this case he sent certain reports, but I should say that his letter was written after Major Wodehouse made that inquiry and after discussing the whole case with Major Wodehouse. I do not think it is possible he could have sent in that letter without knowing all about Major Wodehouse's inquiry.

48250. That is what is puzzling me, because if you look at the letter he deals with it entirely upon the reports, does he not?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I do not know, Sir, whether it would help you at all if I stated that Mr. Edwards, who is sitting behind me, and who is Sir Edward Henry's secretary, says he knows as a fact that the inquiry was over before three o'clock, and Mr. Edwards was present when the letter was drafted, and the Commissioner had the result of the inquiry before him when the letter was drafted.

48251. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Then that does answer what I wanted to know. There is nothing to show you that it had taken place?—I think I must have known, because I am sure I saw him on that day or the day after.

48252. Then when you got that letter and the reports, if I followed correctly what you told us, the Home Office felt it could do nothing more on account of what happened at the time of the Cass case?—On account of the considerations which were suggested by that case.

48253. It was undesirable to hold any inquiry which was not a judicial inquiry?—Which would probably be abortive and would not be judicial.

48254. The result of that seems to be, if this was the ordinary system that was followed, that there would be no redress really to the public upon a complaint of that kind, except under a Magisterial or judicial inquiry, because you only get the reports from the police themselves; you had not the persons before the Assistant Commissioner who were making the complaints, and the inquiry which was held was based upon the reports which the police themselves sent in?—Taken along with the evidence given by Mr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette and their witnesses at the police court. I think that is a very material point.

48255. You had got their sworn testimony?—Yes.

48256. And as is pointed out by the Commissioner they were represented by counsel at the inquiry before the Magistrate?—Yes.

48257. But that does seem the result, that there must be a good deal which could be said, or which might be said, by them, which would be relevant to the inquiry, and which would not be relevant to the conduct of the proceedings before the Magistrate. I tell you what strikes me as the difficulty in the course which you suggest, founded upon what you have told us—the principle of not holding an extra judicial inquiry. The difficulty seems to be that unless some proceedings are subsequently taken that the inquiry which is held is one simply of examining the police?—Oh, no. I think in most cases the inquiry, if the matter is at all a serious one, even though it is not a final inquiry, would include taking statements from the complainant and his witnesses.

48258. Then I do not quite understand why it is said that nothing further could be done in this case. If I follow you Messrs. Lavalette and Gerothwohl had not been examined, and they had not had the opportunity of preferring their complaint against the police?—They had preferred their complaint against the police in Mr. Gerothwohl's letter, though they had not the opportunity of saying everything which possibly they might have said, and, knowing, as we did, the main points in their case, I think one was fairly certain that in this case no good would be got by asking the Commissioner merely to see them and hear what further statement they might make. I think it was very plain that it would still leave a case with conflicting evidence and that the matter would not be really advanced at all. It might bring out certain points in Mr. Gerothwohl's favour and against the police, but it would not enable the Commissioner to arrive at any definite decision.

48259. That must mean that he is not deciding it?—Yes, he would not be able to decide it.

48260. He would not be deciding who is right if that is the case, and it means he cannot, because of the difficulty of determining upon the conflict of evidence, give a decision one way or the other. That is what it must mean, must it not, if he does not arrive at a decision because of the conflict of evidence?—Yes.

48261. As I understand it, he does not come to the conclusion that the police are right?—The Commissioner came, I think, to a very decided opinion that the police were right in this case.

48262. That is the part of the matter that has troubled me—how he came to the conclusion that they are right without having heard Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette. I understand what you say that you could not conduct an inquiry, or it was thought inadvisable to conduct an inquiry with Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette there, but if that is the case, you are arriving at a decision without hearing what those two gentlemen had to say on the matter. You see they were complaining in that letter of the 12th of the brutal methods and of the treatment and procedure by the police, and the very grave state of affairs at the Vine Street Police Station?—Yes, that was the second head of the complaint, but the first and the far more serious one, was the charge of perjury against the two police officers, and clearly one could not proceed to deal with the complaint which was merely one as regards discipline until the far more serious one of perjury was disposed of.

48263. Then I could understand it being said that the Commissioner and the Home Office were unable to arrive at a conclusion pending a criminal charge being preferred or pending some judicial or Magisterial inquiry, but unless proceedings are then taken the matter must drop, and the member of the public who has made a complaint seems to have no redress unless he proceeds further and takes proceedings, or unless he institutes some action. That is right, is it not?—That is so, if the case proves one where there is a serious conflict of evidence. If a charge is brought against a police officer, and if there is a serious conflict of evidence, clearly you cannot decide that charge against the police officer.

48264. That is quite right, but that is a reason for saying you are not deciding it. But you cannot decide it one way without hearing what is to be said on the other side?—The intention of this letter was certainly that if Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette brought the criminal proceedings or civil proceedings which were suggested the case should then be opened for reconsideration. We do not in so many words say "If you bring those proceedings and bring them successfully then we will reopen the whole case," but clearly that is the intention of the letter.

48265. That does mean that unless he brings some criminal proceedings the matter is at an end?—I think so—yes.

48266. Then it follows from that, that, as I say, unless criminal proceedings are brought by the member of the public who is making the complaint I do not see how he is to get any further in his complaint against the police?—Not in a case where there is a grave conflict of evidence.

48267. Of course, in a great many cases there would not be proceedings?—If it was merely a question of discipline, then the Commissioner must decide it in the best way he can. This rule I have mentioned only applies to cases where there is a charge amounting to a criminal charge.

48268. Whereas in this case, according to the complaint that was made, there was a charge of perjury?—Yes. In so many words Mr. Gerothwohl says he charges the police officers with perjury and conspiracy. Of course it would be open to him to go to the Public Prosecutor and ask him to prosecute, but we did not suggest that.

48269. (Chairman.) Do you think the Commis-

Mr. C. E. Troup, C.B.

6 June 1907.

sioner's report dealt with the second head of Mr. Gerothwohl's complaint, the very grave state of affairs at Vine Street, as well as the actual charge of false arrest and perjury and conspiracy?—I think we looked upon the charge of perjury and conspiracy as the serious thing.

48270. That I quite understand?—We did not attempt to distinguish.

48271. But if Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette did not choose to prosecute or choose to bring a civil action then it would appear that there was no inquiry at all as to the state of things at Vine Street save what appears in the Chief Commissioner's report?—If Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette had said "We withdraw altogether our allegation of perjury and conspiracy against the two constables, but we still direct your attention to the grave state of things at Vine Street Police Station," then I think we would have had to reopen the case.

48272. You see the man who had made the report on the condition of things at Vine Street was Inspector Berry, the man himself who was incriminated rightly or wrongly?—That is so, but of course one must also remember that there would be any amount of evidence as to the grave state of things at Vine Street Police Station. That would be a distinct inquiry. Major Wodehouse was, I believe, himself at Vine Street that night, and the Police Surgeon was at Vine Street.

48273. Precisely so. The point I was putting to you is this, that supposing Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette, for reasons which were justifiable from their point of view, thought an action was not worth bringing, or that the prosecution might involve them in great expense, said at once "We will not prosecute any complaint against the constables for our own arrest, but still we call your attention to the state of affairs at Vine Street, and we do not think the proceedings in the charge-room are properly conducted, and Inspector Berry was guilty, in our judgment, of culpable negligence"?—I think if the charge of perjury and conspiracy were gone altogether then there might certainly, in theory, be a reason for reopening the other case.

48274. It is not reopening it. The complaint was made?—I should say there might be a reason for going further into that question.

48276. The document referred to in the report of the Chief Commissioner of Police, on which the Home Secretary acted, begins thus: "Report by Inspector Berry"—that is a report by the very person whose conduct of the proceedings in the charge room was challenged in the letter?—That is a report to the Commissioner on which he could found any further action he might think necessary.

48277. You see what my point is. I do not want to pursue the matter further?—Yes, I see your point.

48278. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As I understand what you say about it is, that the persons involved in the charge are the only persons from whom you could get the information; they are the persons from whom you would naturally seek to inquire?—In this case, the only witnesses to the proceedings were the persons involved on one side or the other. There were no really independent witnesses.

48279. From what I understand, and from what you have told us, the only means of getting at the facts was to get the reports and, if necessary, examine the police officers who were involved, and as you had not time to take the evidence of Messrs. Lavalette and Gerothwohl, to take the evidence which they had given at the police court?—Yes.

48280. I suppose from the question that was put to you by the Chairman about the complaint as to the state of things at Vine Street, you say that you did not go into that because of the graver charge which was made of perjury and conspiracy involving two of the constables?—Yes. In fact, I am not at all sure that if there were a charge of conspiracy it would not have more or less involved the officers at the police station too. The two things were so closely connected that you could not deal with the one thing without the other.

48281. That is what is occurring to me; that it would be very difficult for you to try the second point without going into a good many of the facts involved in the first?—Yes.

48282. I think that is a perfectly right observation. You could not very well try whether on that particular night there was that grave state of things at Vine Street unless you also went into the complaints which were being made, which would involve the facts on which the charge of perjury and conspiracy were being raised?—Yes.

48283. For that reason you thought it was not right to proceed further with it because of those charges?—Yes.

48284. That is what I understand is the reason for the Home Office action?—Yes.

48285. I quite appreciate the difficulty of the situation and the reason for the Home Office action in not proceeding further on account of these grave charges which were made, but that does seem to me to leave this rather difficult situation for the public, that if a complaint is made to the Home Office—I am not dealing with Mr. Gerothwohl's case, because I quite appreciate what you say with regard to that; but if a complaint is made by a member of the public to the Home Secretary it is referred to the Commissioner, and the Commissioner makes inquiry, which consists certainly in the vast majority of instances of calling for reports, then he may, if he thinks right, hold an inquiry upon those reports. Then if he comes to the conclusion upon that that there is no case made out for his interference, there is nothing left, of course, but the magisterial inquiry or a judicial inquiry?—Yes, but I think in the ordinary case he ought to hear, and would hear, both sides.

48286. I understand what you said with reference to that, that the only reason why they were not heard in this case was because of the pressing necessity of determining what was to be done in making the answer in the House of Commons, and because you had the sworn testimony already of Mr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette given at the police court. That is the reason why you did not follow the ordinary course?—Yes.

48287. But that must mean that the Home Office does not make an inquiry at all?—The Home Office, apart from the Commissioner, does not make any inquiry at all in complaints against police constables. I certainly say so.

48288. Do you know any case in which the Home Office has made an inquiry independent of the Commissioner?—There was one case, and that is the case on which this instruction was first given. In 1868 there was one case where the Under Secretary of State actually made the inquiry in the Home Office, and heard all the witnesses in the Home Office, and it was after making that inquiry, and on his recommendation, that it was made a definite rule that where there was conflicting evidence it ought to go before a Magistrate in some way or before a court in some way.

48289. The difficulty about that, as it seems to me, is that we are always travelling in a circle. If the person who is complaining—the member of the public—goes to the Magistrate, the Magistrate says, "Complain to the Commissioner" or "Complain to the Home Office." If he goes to the Home Office they say, "No, you can go no further unless you go to the Magistrate"?—If he goes to the Magistrate with a criminal charge the Magistrate cannot say, "Go to the Commissioner."

48290. He cannot refuse the summons. I do not mean on a charge of perjury or conspiracy, or anything of that kind, but he does continually when complaints are made against a constable, refer the complainant to the Commissioner?—If the Magistrate had done that then I think the Commissioner would take it that he ought to deal with the case.

48291. We have had cases before us in which that has happened?—I think the Commissioner would certainly deal with a case if the Magistrate had said, "This is not a case for me; you had better go to the Commissioner."

48292. There is no machinery at the Home Office for holding an inquiry independent of the Commissioner?—None whatever.

48293. Then it does seem that the Home Office must be dependent for its reports as regards the police on what the Commissioner reports?—Yes; subject to reports from the Magistrate on any case that comes before him.

48294. Those, of course, are outside?—We have certainly no machinery for revising or interfering with the Commissioner's decision.

48295. Any report which the Home Office makes with regard to the case is a report which really comes from the Commissioner?—Yes. I do not think you must take it that in a case of any difficulty or importance we would necessarily accept at once what the Commissioner says. That would be a matter of discussion between the Commissioner and the Home Office. If there were any weak points in the Commissioner's report they would be pointed out to him, and it would be a matter of discussion between the Secretary of State and the Commissioner.

48296. That would be, I presume, on what course might be pursued. That would hardly be with regard to the facts of the case?—It would be on the facts of the case I think.

48298. I am not suggesting it should be a duplicate inquiry, but what I am trying to ascertain from you is what the statements which have been made by the Home Office mean when they say that after careful inquiry a certain course is arrived at. That means it has been done through the Commissioner?—Yes. Almost without qualification I should say that means it is done through the Commissioner. There may sometimes be consultation with a Magistrate, but I do not think that qualifies the general statement that all inquiries into complaints against the police are made by the Commissioner.

48299. I quite see there is very great difficulty in dealing with a matter in an inquiry of this character, where you have a very serious conflict of evidence, which may mean that one side or the other are perjuring themselves; but you must be dependent on the report to you of the person who has made the actual inquiry?—Yes.

48300. It never does happen, as far as I follow, that the Home Office would itself, by means of anyone outside the Commissioner, examine the constables or police officers?—Oh, no; that we should never do.

48301. You may discuss it with the Commissioner?—Yes, but we should never go outside.

48302. We have had that reference to the Police Fund, and the amount that was paid in the case of Worsley. I only take that as an instance because the particular facts of the case do not matter for the purpose of the question I put to you. In Worsley's case the costs of the defence and the damages had to be paid out of the Police Fund except £5, which was deducted from the man's pay. Does that often happen?—No, not often. There have been a few such cases before, but I think only two or three.

48303. That was a case in which the use of the truncheon was justified, but the constable had gone on longer than was necessary?—That is what the County Court Judge held.

48304. I suppose, if I followed correctly what you were saying, the Commissioner had not the means of arriving at that conclusion, or, anyhow, he did not arrive at that conclusion when he determined to defend him?—Yes. When the case came before him he thought the man was in the right.

48305. He thought he had been placed in a position of great difficulty, and was right in using his truncheon?—I think that was his view.

48306. That is why he defended him?—Yes, and then afterwards his view was that he was in a position of great difficulty, and even if he went a little beyond, or a good deal beyond, what he ought to have done, still there was a good deal of excuse for him.

48307. It is a very difficult matter, and I quite understand you cannot be too strict with a man who is placed in a position of very great difficulty, and that is what was thought?—Yes.

48308. But he was punished by the deduction of the £5?—He was punished by the deduction of the £5, and he was transferred to another district.

48309. (Mr. Dickinson.) I want to ask you a question about the figures that you have given us, because they seem to me very important. You say the complaints as to arrests and drunkenness were only four in the last three years. Am I right in concluding that no more than four people in three years have attempted to bring any complaints before the Home Office?—With regard to arrests for drunkenness or charges of drunkenness that is so.

48310. And as far as the Home Office are concerned, charges against the police for drunkenness are practically nil in three years—only four in three years?—Yes, and that includes two of the cases which you have had before this Commission.

48311. Then I understood you to say something to the effect that there were many other cases that would be referred to the Commissioner?—I was only just warning you not to take the figures as meaning too much, because, for instance, if a man who had been charged with drunkenness called at the Home Office and made an oral complaint then probably he would be told "Your best course is to go over to Scotland Yard and make your complaint to the Commissioner."

48312. That is only oral, but as far as written complaints are concerned?—No more than four. It is a very difficult thing to search through a great mass of papers, and I should not like to be absolutely certain that one or two might not be omitted in getting out this list, but substantially that is correct.

48313. I want to get that perfectly clear, because it practically means that the Home Office had no complaints?—Very few complaints. Some of them may be rather important complaints. Those four included the Gerothwohl complaint, and the complaint of Mr. Davis.

48314. I suppose in the mind of the public the ordinary course is to complain to the Commissioner. Is that so?—I should think so. The Home Office mainly deal with questions of wrong convictions.

48315. Therefore it is only, so to speak, the more educated portion of the community who would appeal to the Home Office with regard to the police?—No; I do not think necessarily so.

48316. In the public mind is not the Home Office conceived to be the authority responsible for the police?—I should think the general idea is to attribute everything to the Home Office, whereas, strictly speaking, I think any complaints of that sort should be made to the Commissioner. As regards the police, the main function of the Home Office is to lay down the general regulations; and, as regards the administration of justice, our main function is to deal with convictions.

48317. Do you say these figures give a fair criterion of the extent to which the public complain of the police?—No. That is just exactly what I do not wish you to take me as saying.

48318. I rather want to get that more clearly?—I take it that four persons out of five who had a complaint to make about being wrongly arrested for drunkenness would go, not to the Home Office, but to the Commissioner. I think those figures do show that the number of complaints is not very great, but I think you ought not to take them without taking in connection with them the number of complaints that are made directly to the Commissioner.

48319. (Chairman.) I think you ought to know, although, perhaps, you do know, that Mr. Eldon Bankes did hand us in a document about the Worsley case. I think we sent you a copy of the shorthand notes?—You sent a copy to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers, but, as a matter of fact, I did not see the shorthand notes.

48320. The document is dated the 30th January, 1905: "P.C. Worsley, X Division, against whom a judgment for £20 and costs was awarded for unnecessarily using his truncheon when arresting a prisoner." The Assistant-Commissioner says to Worsley "I have sent for you to convey the decision of the Secretary of State in your case, and to deal with you myself. I think I need not go into the case at all. Of the decision of the County Court Judge you are quite well aware, and in accordance with this decision damages were given against you to the extent of £20 and costs. The case was laid before the Secretary of State, inasmuch as there were extenuating circumstances, and we have now got his decision, which is: 'That he cannot sanction the whole payment of damages and costs out of the Police Fund,' but he leaves it to the Commissioner for officer to pay a portion of it. I want you to understand quite clearly what the Commissioner's opinion is in this case. It is that you were justified in using your truncheon when attacked; that you were not to blame for having struck this man on the head; and, so far, there is nothing against you; but after having partially disabled this man, you were not justified in continuing to strike him as has been proved to the satisfaction of the Court you did; and, consequently, you were guilty of unnecessarily using your truncheon. For that offence you are now severely reprimanded and cautioned, and you will pay £5 towards the damages and costs. That £5 will be recovered from you by instalments such as the Superintendent thinks you can pay weekly"?—I think that agrees with what I said.

Mr. C. E. Troup, C.B.

48321. There is one other matter which I am sorry I did not bring to your notice before, and that is the forms prepared, as I understand, in the Home Office with regard to the directions for obtaining statistics?—Yes. You mentioned that to me.

48322. Can you tell us anything about those forms? I read to Sir Mackenzie Chalmers, or he read to me, the letter of the Home Secretary. The matter arose in, I think, Mrs. Braham's case, where we found under the word "Dismissed" in a certain column of the charge sheet "Not sufficient evidence," or words of that kind. The Magistrate had told the prisoner there was nothing against him, and then the clerk had written "Not sufficient evidence" under the word "Dismissed." Mr. Titterton came before us and handed us that bundle of papers. (Handing documents to witness.)—What the Home Office requires in the statistics is to know when a case has been dismissed whether it has been dismissed on the evidence or whether it is a case where the Magistrate is satisfied that the offence is proved but dismisses the case under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879 as being a trivial one. That is all we ask for: that the Magistrates, or their clerks, should clearly indicate in the charge sheets under which provision the decision is arrived at, in order that the police who collect those figures from the charge sheets may know under which head to put them.

48323. As far as the Home Office is concerned, to put "Not sufficient evidence" under the word "Discharged" in this case was meaningless or unnecessary?—It was necessary that there should be some indication as to whether the case was dismissed on the evidence or whether it was a case under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, but we are not responsible for the words "Not sufficient evidence." We have not suggested those words.

48324. In nine cases out of ten the word is "Discharged" only, and where there is a discharge under the section of the Summary Jurisdiction Act that you refer to, that section is referred to?—I think the people preparing the statistics would be in a difficulty if only the word "Discharged" appeared.

48325. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It must often be the case, must it not, that a Magistrate dismisses a case in which he thinks really there is an offence proved, and he simply discharges it because he comes to the conclusion that it is the best course to take with regard to it? That does happen, does it not, without his saying that he is proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Act?—I think he always indicates whether he is proceeding under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, Section 16.

48326. But sometimes he gives the benefit to the accused without saying that?—We take it in that case he discharges it on the evidence.

48327. (Chairman.) The case is either discharged on its merits or discharged under the Summary Jurisdiction Act of 1879?—Yes. If they put the words "On the merits," that would clearly meet it. We have not suggested those words.

48328. These forms from Scotland Yard seem to suggest a kind of tertium quid as far as I can make out?—I do not read it so. I take it that they regard all cases discharged, and not dealt with under Section 16, as cases discharged because of insufficiency of evidence. That is how I read it.

48329. There is the word "Discharged," and then underneath there is a note in this particular case, and we have noticed similar notes in other cases. In nine cases out of ten there is nothing but "Discharged"; but here there is the word "Discharged," and then underneath it "Not sufficient evidence." I thought at first that rather looked like an entry written favourably to the police: that whereas the Magistrate had not discharged as he did, but intimated that if there had been some more evidence he would have found the woman guilty, whereas there was nothing against her at all?—We do not want anything implied at all.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I suppose every case is discharged because there is not sufficient evidence to convict.

48330. (Mr. Dickinson.) Would that note have been made not under the heading of "Cases under Section 16"?—Yes.

48331. (Chairman.) I think Mr. Titterton explained that entry because of the Home Office instructions. Do you think the entry "Not sufficient evidence" would be suggested by your instructions?—I do not think we require those words to be used, but we do require some indication to be given as to how the charge is disposed of.

48332. Would you look at those forms and see if they are issued from Scotland Yard with your approval?—We are not responsible for the wording of the forms. They are issued for the purpose of preparing our statistics.

48333. This is what is handed to us by Mr. Titterton, "Executive statistics, No. 61 memorandum. Charge sheet number" so and so, "attached. Will you be good enough to state whether prisoner (blank), referred to in No. (blank) charge was discharged under Section 16, Sub-section 1, of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, or in consequence of the evidence being insufficient to support the charge." Are you responsible for those words?—I am not responsible for those words, but I do not see much harm in them.

48334. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) From one point of view either the man has committed the offence, and is discharged under Section 16 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, or else he is discharged because the evidence has not been sufficient to obtain the conviction. It is either one or the other?—Yes.

(Chairman.) Surely the words ought to be "Discharged under Section 16," or "On the merits," or "Discharged" simply. Those words about the evidence not being sufficient are ambiguous.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) May I suggest as an amendment "Section 16, or otherwise"?

(Chairman.) We are much obliged to you, Mr. Troup, for the trouble you have put yourself to in coming here and giving your evidence.

Mr. Clinton Thomas Dent, sworn.

Mr. C. T. Dent.

48335. (Chairman.) You are a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, England, and a Master of Surgery, Cambridge University?—Yes.

48336. You have been on the Surgical Staff of St. George's Hospital for nearly twenty-seven years, and have had a large experience in accidents and injuries?—Yes.

48337. You were appointed Chief Surgeon to the Metropolitan Police Force on the 26th July, 1904?—Yes.

48338. Perhaps you will kindly read what you have to say as to injuries to the police, and their after effects?—I desire to state that approximately 16 to 17 per cent. of the whole Force (a little less than one-sixth) are injured annually in the execution of their duty. I should premise perhaps that my figures are based on Returns for 1903, 1904, 1905, and 1906.

48339. I think you submit a Return?—I submit a return showing the numbers of police injured whilst in the execution of their duty for those years.

48340. You might perhaps tell us how you compile that return?—Those figures are taken from the Commissioner's reports for the three years; the report is usually published, I think, about August for the previous year; but the figures for the year 1906 have been extracted at the Commissioner's Office anticipating the publication of his Report.

48341. What inference do you draw from those statistics?—These statistics show that a remarkably small number of officers are wholly incapacitated from injuries. It will be noticed in the last column on the right of the Return that the number of officers actually placed on the sick list for injuries is not large; for example, in 1904 out of 2,807 police who were injured in the execution of their duty 109 were on the sick list for less than seven days, 277 were on the sick list for less than seven days or over, nine were incapacitated for further service from injuries received, and 2,421 were not placed on the sick list at all. I presume that those figures are gathered from reports, for a constable is bound to report any injury, however trivial, at the station. Reports are sent in, and I presume that the figures are arrived at in that way. The figures for 1903, 1904, and 1905 approximate very closely indeed, and the figures for 1906 show that there is a diminution of roughly 500 on the total. The average, taken over four years, works out to 2,611. Then, taking the figures for 1904 as a fair sample, of the 2,807 men injured, 1,754 were injured, in making arrests, by drunken prisoners, and 982 by other prisoners.

48342. You were saying the figures show that a large proportion of the injuries received are trivial?—Yes, that is to say the men do not go on the sick list at all. But figures like these appear to me to give a very imperfect measure of the effective loss, and for this reason: The duties of a police-constable require him, of course, to be thoroughly sound in body, and thoroughly stable as regards his nervous system, putting it in not too technical medical language. In that respect a police-constable is particular prone to break down as the result of injury. If a police officer has been seriously assaulted in the execution of his duty, even although the physical injuries may be apparently trivial, his value as an efficient constable, save in exceptional cases, is likely to be diminished; he will not, in other words, be likely to take such risks as he would have if he had never been assaulted in the execution of his duty, and, to use an ordinary phrase, he is a little more nervous about doing it. I think one can understand that that would be the case. Broadly speaking, a constable is usually worn out as regards the efficient performance of his duties at the age of 45; and if he has met with injuries sustained under trying conditions, and especially with those sustained in the execution of his duty, he is liable to break down earlier in life. If I may explain what I mean by "trying conditions," it is practically this: A small injury received by a man who falls, say, from a great height, so to speak, may do a man more harm than more extensive injury; for instance, a man might fall from a very great height, and he might receive very few injuries except a few bruises; another man might slip off the kerb and break his leg, thus sustaining a greater injury than a few bruises, but the man who has fallen from a great height will not get well like the other man, and he will be much more likely to be permanently affected. In the case of the police that applies especially. However willing, keen, and courageous an officer may be he is not, save in exceptional cases, quite as efficient after an injury as he was before. Initiative is more likely to be lacking, and the sense of responsibility will weigh on him a little more heavily. To a certain extent, therefore, the public suffer as his efficiency as a constable diminishes. Of men temporarily pensioned, perhaps half are content with the pension they have earned, and have little desire to rejoin the Service, but fully one-half are anxious to rejoin. They are very seldom fit to do so. With regard to temporary pension, if a man has been seriously injured, and his illness is likely to go on for, say a year, or something of that kind, if he has been injured in the execution of his duty he is recommended for a temporary pension, which, I think, is at the rate of full pay. I certify that there is a reasonable prospect of his being able to rejoin. If he does rejoin, he rejoins in the ordinary way; if he does not rejoin his pension is modified accordingly. I have to send in a special report with regard to any man who is on the sick list for six months to the Home Office. I do not know whether I might mention to the Commission, just very briefly, one or two very typical cases of the results of these injuries. The first is that of a man who had had 20 years' service. He was patrolling a northern beat in the neighbourhood of, I think, Caledonian Road, and he was set upon by three men and a woman and injured. His truncheon was wrested from him, and he was struck several blows on his head with the truncheon. I saw the man myself not very long after the accident. I desire to mention that case because he was a most admirable constable as I was given to believe, and a man who was extremely anxious to continue his work in the force. However, I advised him not to rejoin for some months. He was put on a temporary pension. He was injured in January, 1906, and he rejoined in October of that year. I confess I felt nervous as to the effect of his rejoining, but he was very anxious to do so. In one month he had broken down again altogether; he was sleepless, irritable, nervous and useless, and he had to be again returned as unfit for service.

48343. I think we need not trouble you to go into further special cases. That was a typical case?—Yes. A still more typical case was that of a man who had no head injury at all, but he had two of his fingers chopped off by somebody whom he was endeavouring to arrest. That man was very anxious to rejoin and rejoined, and he broke down; he had fits, and his mind broke down.

48344. We are quite content to take your general evidence?—Those are severe cases, and in a milder degree the same sort of effect is likely to happen as the result of a smaller injury.

48345. From our point of view you have given us an important fact. You say that most of his injuries are received in the course of arresting drunken persons?—Yes.

48346. What other class of persons do cause injuries to the police. Speaking from your experience, do you think that injuries are caused to the police by men who are endeavouring to evade arrest?—No, I think that that is comparatively rare.

48346*. We may take it then that it is in the comparatively trivial offences from one point of view of drunkenness and disorder in the streets that the police receive most of the injuries which they do sustain in the execution of their duty?—That certainly appears to be so.

48347. As to drunkenness I think there are some observations you wish to make for our guidance, and for the guidance of the police?—I think myself there is a general idea that it is very easy to decide whether a person is drunk or not. That is not the case, because alcoholic intoxication has its peculiarities which makes the diagnosis of drunkenness sometimes very, very difficult. The effects of the poison are progressive from the mildest excitement up to profound coma; but there are no definite stages, and in some cases classification is very arbitrary. Apart from profound coma, the state in which a person is said to be dead drunk, the main feature of alcoholic poison is not so much a loss of control as what we call an inhibition, that is to say that the power of control can be re-exercised by an effort of the will. Fear, excitement, shock, and other such like causes will produce very rapid changes in the symptoms. As an example, a person might be arrested and the officer who arrests him might very rightly consider him to be drunk—that is to say, in a stage in which if a medical man were at his elbow he would have no hesitation in saying that he was drunk. A divisional surgeon might be called to such a case a little while after, if the prisoner denied drunkenness, of course, and he might find him apparently pretty nearly sober; and again, after he had gone away, the person might have a relapse (this is everyday experience) into profound drunkenness again. I think anyone in our profession is very familiar with cases like that. A man can practically stand perfectly upright, and then fall down drunk. That is not uncommon, and it shows what difficulties there may be. Of course, the symptoms of intoxication vary very much according to the nature of the intoxicant. I cite in my statement three cases—beer, newly-made whisky, and absinthe; they produce very different symptoms. Beer would tend to produce sleep from the hops. New whisky contains a substance which chemists call amylic alcohol, which is very powerful, and tends rather to produce convulsions. Absinthe, owing to the essential ingredients, tends to produce a condition of convulsions, and, apparently, the most complete loss of control, and the most unreasoning state of mind for a short time. Absinthe drinkers, as far as I can learn from those who are familiar with the subject, and from what I have read about it, are from a criminal point of view the most dangerous people you could possibly have to deal with. Of course, the difficulty about drunkenness is in borderland cases—it is not difficult to decide when a person is profoundly poisoned by alcohol, or is not poisoned by alcohol at all. But a large proportion of cases are neither at one extreme nor the other. To decide the question in these borderland cases it would seem to me that the diagnosis of "drunk" must by someone be considered with reference to the offence with which a person is charged. That is not exactly a medical man's affair. The medical man has to make his diagnosis, and if he has it to some extent in mind I think he can make his diagnosis more clearly. Many endeavours have been made to suggest a definite test, or tests, of drunkenness, but in my opinion none of these can be satisfactory. You must in arriving at a diagnosis base your conclusion on all the symptoms. I think mistakes must be inevitably made in arriving at a medical diagnosis that is based on a single or two or three symptoms. As to whether a man is drunk or not there is a difference of opinion; opinions as to that among different medical men must vary; and divisional surgeons therefore must vary as to the standard of intoxication from which they would certify that a person is drunk. That is my experience for various reasons—one is that they do not see the person always immediately on arrest, and another is that a prisoner or accused person is very likely to be a little frightened by being confronted as a drunkard by a medical man, who sees him in a rather better state as a rule, than the police who arrest him; he is in a milder degree of intoxication, and it must be so; but they do form their opinion irrespective of the police. I have attended at police courts, I have watched these gentlemen at their work, and I speak from some experience of that, and I have discussed the matter with them many times.

Mr. C. T. Dent.

48348. Supposing a divisional surgeon saw a man four hours after he had been arrested, could he in any case positively state that the man had been drunk four hours before?—I think he could; I can quite conceive a case in which he could.

48349. It would be rather difficult in that case, would it not?—In most cases, yes.

48350. What sign would you expect to find about a person about an hour or two after he had been arrested? I am not referring to a case of hopeless intoxication or to a case where a man is in a dead drunk condition, but I am thinking of the typical case one hears of and observes where a man is arrested on a charge of being drunk and disorderly: a man behaves in a very disorderly and riotous fashion, his breath smells of whisky or some other alcohol, and he gets arrested. Supposing the Divisional Surgeon does not see him for, say, three hours after the arrest, what, if any, sign would you expect to find if the man had in fact been drunk when arrested?—They fall into two classes—mental and bodily; confusion of thought, incoherence, or, perhaps, rambling in talk, or thick in speech, and the bodily signs are staggering, which we call inco-ordination of gait, and so forth.

48351. But supposing you are perfectly certain when you look at a man that he is sober at that moment, would you expect, if he had been drinking three hours before, to find any symptoms of it on him?—Yes.

48352. What symptoms?—I should expect to note that in the condition of his tongue, and of his eyes, and very likely in the smell of his breath. That would depend very largely indeed whether he had vomited or not.

48353. Supposing he had not vomited?—If he had not vomited he would be more likely to have the smell in the breath, in my opinion, and you might find evidence of alcohol in the urine.

48354. I do not know; but supposing a man had taken a pretty good dinner, and, for aught I know, he might be able to stand a couple of glasses of whisky later on, and then he is arrested about midnight. The policeman says he is drunk, and he says he is not drunk. He might be in the right, might he not? and yet three hours afterwards his breath might smell after drinking the whisky. That seems to me to carry it very little further indeed?—The simple smell of the breath, to my mind, is not a matter of very great importance. You have to take into account the probable intoxicant. Sometimes old, well-matured whisky makes the breath smell very little, but new raw public-house whisky makes it smell very much.

48355. (Mr. Dickinson.) You mean you can tell by the smell that the person has drunk something?—Drunk something.

48356. But it is not evidence that he is drunk?—It is one of the factors to be taken into account.

48357. (Chairman.) Supposing a man is arrested at midnight, and you are called in to see him, say, at 3 o'clock in the morning, and you see at once he is sober; he walks up and down quite correctly, he pronounces his words correctly, and he spells correctly, but we will suppose that his breath is still smelling of whisky—what symptoms would you fix upon as entitling you to find that he had been drinking to excess in the course of the evening, or that he had been drunk in the course of the evening?—On those symptoms alone that you have mentioned I could not personally, I think, find it—being sober when I see him. He may have confusion of thought, which, again, must be discounted, because he may be nervous.

48358. This is the evidence in a case in which a prisoner who had been arrested about midnight for being drunk and disorderly went and saw a doctor—after he had been allowed to go on his own recognisances, which took place between 3 a.m., say three hours after. The doctor (Dr. Davis) told us that this must have taken place between 3 and 4 a.m. The Doctor said this: "I made a very exhaustive examination. I commenced with the eyes. I saw there was nothing unusual in the eyes. They acted to light, and they were not dilated. There was a little congestion of the mucous fibres, but you may have that at any time. I examined the eyes, and I found them quite normal, and also the pupils; in fact, the whole eye was normal—both eyes. Then I examined the breath, and I could detect no fumes of whisky or of any spirits. I inquired if he had been sick or if he had been feeling sick, and he told me no. I then examined his hands with a paper held between the fingers to see whether there was any tremor of the hand or of the arm. There was none. I also got him to put his two feet together, then close his eyes, and then turn round in a circle as on a pivot. He did that perfectly. I then got him to walk, and he walked perfectly straight. His pulse was normal. I think it was said in the police-court that he lisped, but that is likely to occur to anyone at any time who is excited. Again, there is a most important point, and that is this: I got him to repeat sentences after me, and also to pronounce very difficult words, which he did perfectly. All through I had conversational remarks with him, and I came to the conclusion that he was not under the influence of drink." You have no quarrel to find with that?—No; he was bound to arrive at that conclusion from what he saw.

48359. I do not think anybody could quarrel with the view that the Doctor took under those circumstances. He told us the gentleman he examined was quite sober. Those tests were satisfactory tests, were they? They were tests which a competent surgeon would apply?—Yes.

48360. I only like to get that confirmed, and I am not suggesting for a moment that Dr. Davis was not perfectly competent. The point to which I wish to direct your attention is this. The Doctor was asked this question: "I have only one question to put to you, and that is whether in your opinion he might have been drunk two hours before?—(A) No, it is impossible." Then Dr. Davis was subsequently asked by Mr. Rufus Isaacs: "You told us that there was no indication of their having been drunk two hours before. Take the time we have in this case, namely, from 11.30 to 12.10. Was it possible at the time you saw either of those gentlemen that they could have been drunk between 11.30 and 12.10?—(A) They could not possibly have been." Have you any comment to make upon that?—The Doctor sees him some four hours afterwards?

48361. It must have been, I should say. You may take it for the purposes of my question that it was between 3.30 and 4 a.m. The arrest had taken place at midnight, and the gentleman in question was charged a few minutes after midnight. He then saw this Doctor, having been released between 3.30 and 4 o'clock. I have read to you the test to which Dr. Davis submitted his patient, and there appears to be no doubt that he was perfectly sober then, and that is common ground. The question on which I invite your aid is whether Dr. Davis's judgment, that he could not possibly have been drunk at 12 o'clock, is a sound one?—Speaking for myself, I think it is too positive a statement.

48362. Why?—Because, as I mentioned earlier, the symptoms of intoxication may vary so very rapidly indeed.

48363. I do not quite follow that. Here the man was undoubtedly sober, but he had been put to very severe tests. The doctor got him to put his two feet together, then to close his eyes, then to turn round in a circle as on a pivot. That is rather a severe test, is it not? There are not many sober men who could do that?—Many.

48364. Taking the other severe test in account, do you not think Dr. Davis's statement is a reasonable one?—I think it is too strong a statement to say that that man could not have been drunk four hours before.

48365. He could not have been in a state of coma four hours before, I take it?—It is highly improbable that he was in a state of coma.

48366. Let me put the question to you in another way. If the man was dead drunk at 12 o'clock it is almost certain he would show some sign of having been drunk at 12 o'clock when examined at 3.30, 3½ hours afterwards?—If he was a very confirmed drunkard I am not sure that I could answer that question in the affirmative. The power of recovery is astonishing. I do not know who the accused person was to whom you are referring, but as a matter of fact I think in the case of a very confirmed drunkard——

Mr. C. T. Dent. 6 June 1907.

48368. Are you going so far as this—when you look at Mr. Dickinson or at me now at twenty minutes to five, would you say that it is quite possible either of us may have had too much at 1 p.m. to-day?—Of course that is a question put to me in a very personal manner.

48369. Admitting that Mr. Davis's opinion is perhaps too confident on the one side, are you not a little too doubtful on the other?—If a person has been through an exciting experience such as that of an arrest, and has been taken to the police station, and so forth, the conditions are wholly different to those of having sat in this court for three or four hours.

48370. (Mr. Dickinson.) In which direction?—The person who has been under trying conditions would change very much more rapidly.

48371. Would be more likely to have been sobered?—Sobered by fright, shock, falling into water, and so forth, whereas if a person is pursuing his ordinary daily avocation he is very much more likely to show the symptoms; they might depart almost suddenly in the one case, and they would be more likely to fade away gradually in the other.

48372-3. (Chairman.) That is otherwise expressed by saying that the shock sobers him, which is quite a common case?—Quite, and an accurate one up to a point.

48383. Where were you to meet her?—At the Pavilion.

Mr. Y. 11 June 1907.

48384. That is the London Pavilion Music Hall opposite the Criterion Theatre and Restaurant?—Yes.

48385. What was her name?— ———.

48386. Had you known her before?—Yes, I had known her for eight or nine months.

48387. What is ———?—At that time she was the mistress of a friend of mine.

48388. Will you tell your story in your own way?—On this Saturday night I had promised during the week to take out my friend, with the girl, for a ride on Sunday in a motor car, and being busy all day—I forget exactly where I had been now, but I had been somewhere in the country—I wired her to meet me on the corner of the Pavilion at 12 o'clock (the telegram I produced in court), to make the necessary appointment for the next day. When I got there she was accompanied by a friend of hers.

48389. By another young lady who was there?—Yes.

48390. Did you know the other lady?—I knew her by

Mr. Y.
11 June 1907.

sight. I had seen her, but she was nothing more or less than an acquaintance.

48391. You have learnt her name since then?—I know her Christian name. I could not tell you what her other name is.

48392. What is her Christian name?— ———.

48393. What happened when you met them?—I waited on the corner of the Pavilion about five minutes and they came up.

48394. Did they come out of the Pavilion?—I could not tell you where they came from.

48395. You saw them after waiting a few minutes?—Yes. They took hold of me by the arm and we started walking along and had got as far as the corner of Shafterbury Avenue and were waiting to cross.

48396. To cross to Piccadilly?—To cross opposite the Monico on Glasshouse Street side. Just as we were going to cross, a constable seized ——— and then turned round to one of his colleagues and said, "And take the other one as well." Then they started struggling, and I said to them, "It is no good struggling, you will have to go—go quietly." With that the police were insulting to me. They told me to mind my own business, and I told them they could not say anything to me as long as I was assisting them. They crossed over to the fountain then.

48397. Did you notice the numbers of either constable?—I know that one was 27 CR, but I could not tell you from memory what the number of the other one was.

48398. Do you think you would know him if you saw him?—I think I should, but I could not swear to it.

48399. As I understand, one constable had hold of one young woman, and the other constable had hold of the other, and you followed?—I was following.

48400. In what direction did they go?—Towards Vine Street, but they crossed over to the fountain.

48401. Give us a little more particularly the direction that was taken?—They crossed straight over to the fountain; that is the centre of Piccadilly Circus, and there, as one of the women was struggling, they called upon a constable, No. 155 CR, to assist them. They dragged the women along Regent Street, and I kept saying to the one that I knew, "Don't be silly, don't struggle; I will come and bail you out." With that the constables used filthy language to me; they told me to mind my own business, and I replied the same to them, as I had previously said at the Pavilion, until we got to Vine Street. At Vine Street, as they dragged the women through, one of the constables said, "Don't let that man through with a cap." I insisted on going through, and they would not let me go through. In the meantime Police-constable 155 had come out again, and then he said, "All right, if you want to come through, come through," and he dragged me in, and as we were going in, I said, "You have no right to drag me like this." He said, "We will soon see about that." I said, "What are you going to charge me with?" and he did not reply. When I got inside I was subjected to the most filthy abusive language, and I was pushed down by one policeman—I think it was Police-constable 27, but I could not swear to it now—and I was charged with rescuing.

48402. When you got into the station where did they take you?—At first I was pushed into the charge room, and after that I was put in a cell.

48403. But when you were in the charge room were you told to stand or were you made to sit down, or what happened to you there first of all?—I think I was told to sit down. I stood up and I was knocked down.

48404. Knocked down—how do you mean?—Pushed down very violently.

48405. (Mr. Whitmore.) Not by a fist?—Not by a blow.

48406. (Chairman.) When you were seated did you notice any constable standing quite near you?—Yes, there were two near me. I think one of them was 27 CR, and he called me all sorts of names.

48407. Did you notice the number of the other one?—I could tell you, but I have not got my pocket-book now. I have got it written down in a pocket-book.

48408. Have you got that pocket-book at home?—Yes.

48409. Will you send it to us?—Yes.

48410. Do you think it was 155 CR?—I think it was 155 and 27. I am sure it was 27, but I could not swear to 155. I have written it down.

48411. You said something about disgusting language?—They called me all the filthiest names they could.

48412. You had better say what?—They called me a b—— ponce.

48413. Then you were searched?—I was searched and my money and my knife and several odd tools and things that I had in connection with my trade were taken from me—matches, etc.

48414. Before I go on further as to what took place in the charge room, I should like you to tell me more particularly the way along which you went to Vine Street. You told us after the young women had been arrested they were taken to the fountain in the centre of Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

48415. Where were they taken next?—They crossed Swan and Edgar's and straight up Regent Street.

48416. Up Regent Street?—Yes.

48417. How did you get to Vine Street? Along what route did you get to Vine Street?—From the corner of Piccadilly Circus, up Regent Street, towards Vine Street.

48418. Where did you turn out of Regent Street?—Down Vine Street. I think it is called Vine Street. Then at the end of Vine Street there were at least ten or twelve policemen. They were building at the time next to it, and round the building they put a barricade.

48419. Do you mean round the police-station?—Round the entrance to Vine Street.

48420. How many constables were standing there?—Quite ten.

48421. You said at first it was 27 CR who arrested ———?—Yes.

48422. And then another constable, whose number you do not recollect, arrested ———?—Yes.

48423. Those two constables took the girls to the fountain in the centre of Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

48424. And there you tell me that one of the constables asked a third constable, as I understood?—Yes.

48425. Do you know the third constable?—155 CR.

48426. CR or C?—I think it was CR.

48427. Then the three constables took the two young women to Vine Street?—That is so.

48428. Were there ten constables outside the police station besides the three?—I could not swear there were exactly ten, but there were a good number.

48429. Something like eight or nine or ten according to your estimate?—Yes.

48430. Then you went into the charge room and were pushed on to a seat, as you state, and then what you called disgusting language was used to you?—Yes.

48431. What were you charged with, and how were you charged?—I was simply charged with rescuing.

48432. You were sitting on a seat?—I was put in the dock afterwards.

48433. Were the girls standing in the dock when you were put there?—No, they had already been put in the dock and taken through into a cell.

48434. Did you observe them in the dock when you were sitting down?—Yes.

48435. Will you describe what took place with regard to the charging of the two girls?—They were charged with being common prostitutes.

48436. Anything else?—Nothing else.

48437. Was an inspector seated or standing near the constable?—No, I think it was the sergeant who took the charge. I cannot remember exactly now.

48438. Do you know his name?—I could not tell you.

48439. Or his number?—No.

48440. What did he read out to the two young women?—He repeated the charge of the constable.

48441. Did he write in the book?—Yes.

48442. And after he had written in the book he told them they were charged with being common prostitutes?—Yes.

48443. Were those the exact words according to your recollection?—Yes.

48444. Nothing more?—I do not remember anything else.

48445. Did either ——— or ——— say anything in answer to the charge?—They very nearly fainted. They cried and shrieked, but I do not think they said very much. They said it was not true.

48446. Have you any definite recollection of what they said. Did you hear them speak distinctly, or what did take place?—They were asked what their profession was, and they said they were actresses.

48447. Were they asked any other questions—their addresses, for instance?—Yes, they refused to give them, and I believe they gave wrong names at the time.

48448-9. What names did they give?—I could not tell you now, but I have a recollection that they gave the wrong names.

48450. How far were you sitting from the dock?—About as far from here to that corner of the room. (About six yards.)

48451. Could you hear what was taking place?—Quite plainly.

48452. There was no disturbance in the charge room. The sergeant or whoever was in charge of the charge room kept quiet?—Yes, there was no disturbance.

48453. And while the charge was being made and being taken the only people who were talking were the constable who made the arrest and the sergeant, and the young women in the dock?—Yes, that is so.

48454. Did either of them actually faint?—I do not think they absolutely fainted, but they were very bad.

48455. In what way were they bad. How did they show they were ill or bad?—They cried and threw themselves about, and shrieked. They waved their arms.

48456. I understand that one of them or both of them said, "Not true," or words to that effect?—Yes, they absolutely denied it.

48457. We know the sergeant took the charge, and I suppose they were taken to the cells?—Yes.

48458. And then were you put into the dock?—Yes.

48459. Who made the charge against you?—155.

48460. What did he charge you with?—He said that No. 27 called him at the fountain and told him to arrest me. He then arrested me there and took me to Vine Street.

48461. He said he had arrested you at Vine Street?—No, he said he arrested me at the fountain.

48462. Let me understand. What did you hear him say to the sergeant or the Inspector?—That he was called upon to arrest me at the fountain.

48463. And that he did so?—Yes.

48464. What was the charge, did he say?—Attempting to rescue.

48465. Both the young women, or one of them?—I do not think that was expressly mentioned.

48466. Simply generally an attempt at rescue?—Yes.

48467. Did the sergeant or Inspector write any particulars in the book?—He took down the charge.

48468. Did he ask you any questions?—I, of course, denied it. It was absolutely false.

48469. Did he ask you for your name and address?—Yes.

48470. Did you give it to him?—Yes.

48471. And correctly?—Correctly.

48472. I should like you to tell me if you can recollect exactly what you did say to the sergeant or Inspector?—I told him it was a lie; that I had walked to Vine Street absolutely alone and unmolested, and that I tried to persuade the girls to go quietly, also telling them that I would bail them out if they did so.

48473. Did you go on and say you had walked to the entrance to Vine Street?—Yes, and on arriving at Vine Street one of the constables said, "Do not let that man come through with the cap"—meaning me; and I could not understand how the constable could dare tell such a lie as to say he had arrested me at the fountain when I had walked there on my own, and I could have walked away and gone anywhere I liked.

48474. I understand you followed in the way you have mentioned quietly with the intention of bailing out the young woman?—Yes.

48475. How was your arrest actually effected?—By my persisting in going down Vine Street. When I reached Vine Street one constable said: "Do not let that man come through with the cap."

48476. There were three constables with the young women, as I understand your story?—They had already gone through.

48477. When you say gone through, you mean past the constables who were waiting about the door?—Yes.

48478. Which of the three constables shouted out "Do not let that man with the cap through"?—That I could not tell you for certain.

48479. Was it the man who shouted out "Do not let that man through" who came out again?—I should think it would be more than probable, but I could not swear it.

48481. The man who came out of the police station took you?—Yes, No. 155.

48482. He was in uniform?—Yes.

48483. When you were left outside did any of the constables who were standing round the door or about the door interfere with you in any way?—They simply formed a barrier and would not let me go through, and the more I insisted the more they told me to go away.

48484. They only told you to go away?—Yes.

48485. Did they do that good-humouredly or in an offensive way?—More or less offensive.

48486. Did they use bad language?—No, they did not use bad language.

48487. But they spoke sternly and authoritatively, you mean?—Yes.

48488. What you tell us is that you refused, notwithstanding their advice to you, to go away, and then 155 C came out of the police station and spoke to you again?—Yes.

48489. What exactly did he say when he came out of the police station?—The exact words I cannot recall, but it was to the effect that I could not come through, and that I was to go away.

48490. What did you say in answer to that?—I insisted, because I considered I had as much right to go to Vine Street police station as any other member of the British public.

48491. Did he actually arrest you then?—Yes, he arrested me then, because I argued with him that I wished to go through.

48492. Was that outside or on the steps?—In Regent Street—at the top of Vine Street. Vine Street in Regent Street is a pretty small archway, and the police were in a barricade down there, and they would not let me come down into Vine Street.

48493. (Mr. Dickinson.) We understand all this took place in Regent Street?—Do you mean my argument with the police?

48494. Yes?—Yes.

48495. They were across the entrance to Vine Street?—Yes.

48496. (Mr. Whitmore.) From Regent Street?—From Regent Street.

48497. (Chairman.) I understood you to say that the eight or ten policemen were round the entrance to the station?—No, Vine Street.

48498. I did not quite understand that. Could you see from where you were standing three constables and the two girls go up the steps into the station?—No, I could not see them after they had gone through.

48499. Not after they had gone through this cordon of police?—No.

48500. You saw nothing more of them?—No.

48501. How do you know that P.C. 155 came out of the police station?—I surmised that if he got hold of one of the young women he went as far as the police station, if he did not go inside.

Mr. Y. 11 June 1907.

48502. And then came back?—Yes.

48503. And then this conversation with you took place?—It took place really from the moment the other policemen had gone through. I must have been arguing at least three minutes.

48504. That was not an argument with 155, but what we have called the cordon of police?—Yes.

48505. Then 155 C came back, and he spoke to you again?—He ordered me away, and I thought I was justified in going through, and I would not go away. I said I wanted to go through. He said: "All right, you shall come through."

48506. Did he put his hand on you?—He caught me by the collar and dragged me through.

48507. How did he catch hold of you?—Like this (describing), just behind the ear. I do not remember whether he took my arm. I think he only caught hold of me by the collar.

48508. Did you go with him?—It was not any use doing anything else. I did not struggle or anything of that kind.

48509. But you understood you were arrested?—I said to him: "You have no right to arrest me." He said: "We will see about that." I said: "Well, I suppose you know what you are going to charge me with," and to that he did not reply.

48510. Then you were taken into the charge room in the way you have described?—Yes.

48511. You have told me what you said in answer to the charge?—Yes, I absolutely denied it.

48512. And you made the other observations you have already mentioned. You said you were not arrested at Piccadilly Circus?—That is so, and I also said that I was more helping them than rescuing, because I was telling them to go quietly.

48513. (Mr. Whitmore.) Helping the police?—I was helping them in a way, because when I was telling the girls to go quietly it was giving them less trouble.

48514. (Chairman.) You had the notion that hearing the voice of a friend would tend to quiet the girls—that is what you wish us to understand?—Yes; I said, "Go quietly, and I will come and bail you out." With that the constable turned round and said, "You bail them out!—you had better be careful we do not take you."

48515. Who said that—was that on the way?—That was on the way. I think it was No. 27, but I could not swear.

48516. Were there many people?—Yes, there were any amount of people.

48517. Was this a Saturday night?—Yes; I think it was the final of the Football Cup Tie, and the streets were very much crowded.

48518. The 21st April?—I believe that was the date.

48519. To what do you attribute the unusually crowded streets?—To the big football match.

48520. And in your experience that does tend to make Regent Street and Piccadilly Circus full?—On Saturday night, if there has been anything like a boat race or anything of that kind on, there are usually more people in the West End.

48521. There were a good many people in Shaftesbury Avenue and Piccadilly Circus?—Yes, all round about that neighbourhood.

48522. And a great deal of traffic too?—I do not think there was so much traffic at the time.

48523. It was past the time of the theatres?—Yes.

48524. Were there many people by Swan and Edgar's in Regent Street?—Yes, there were crowds of people. There were not many people by the Pavilion, but there were plenty all round Swan and Edgar's and the fountain, and all up Regent Street.

48525. Did anybody follow you? As I understand there were three constables and the two young women who were rather struggling. Were the young women shouting out at all or screaming?—I do not think they were exactly shouting. They were more struggling.

48526. At any rate they were not screaming so as to attract attention?—No.

48527. Did any crowd follow you?—There was a big crowd following me.

48528. Was the crowd a noisy one?—I do not think so. I do not remember them being noisy.

48529. It did not attract your attention?—No.

48530. Then you came up to this cordon of police. Did the crowd remain behind and hear your altercation with the police?—Oh, yes; there were a lot of people standing round—packed.

48531. Packed?—By the time I got there there was a big crowd all round. You could hardly move.

48532. And they heard your dispute with the police authorities?—They must have done. There are two witnesses who heard the altercation. I do not know where one is to be found, but one is in London.

48533. One you can get?—Yes.

48534. He heard you, being at that moment a free man, having a dispute with these policemen who were blocking the way to the station?—I understand these witnesses followed all the way from the fountain.

48535-6. You were taken to the cells after being charged and after you had denied the charge?—Yes.

48537. What happened then?—I was left by myself for about three-quarters of an hour, and I suppose it was because they had got somebody who was rather disorderly and they had not got much room, so they took me out and put me in a cell with several others.

48538. How many others?—Two others.

48539. How long were you in the cells altogether?—I think it was about 3 o'clock in the morning when I came out. I must have been in the cells about an hour and a half.

48540. You must have been more than that. The arrest of the young women took place about midnight, as I gather?—Yes, but by the time we were charged and put in the cells it had certainly gone one.

48541. How long were you talking to the young women outside the music hall?—They had only just that instant come up.

48542. I understood the appointment was at 12 o'clock?—Yes.

48543. Were they long after the time?—No, only a few minutes.

48544. Then it must have been a few minutes past 12 when you first met them and when they were arrested?—That is so.

48545. If you were not charged till one o'clock, how did the delay take place?—We were not charged immediately. There were other prisoners before us.

48546. It only took a few minutes for you to get to Vine Street?—I should think we were all inside within a quarter of an hour.

48547. (Mr. Whitmore.) A quarter past 12?—About a quarter to 20 minutes past.

48548. (Chairman.) What ultimately happened to you about three o'clock, as you think it was?—I had asked the sergeant when he came down once if I could not bail myself, and he said he would see about it later on. Then he came round once or twice to the second cell I was in, and in the end I satisfied him that I could bail myself, and then I did so.

48549. There was no suggestion at all, as far as I gather from your story, that you were drunk?—No, I have never been drunk in my life; I am nearly a teetotaler.

48550. Did you sign the bail book?—Yes.

48551. And you were told to appear on Monday?—Yes.

48552. What happened to the young women?—Then I asked if I could bail them out, and they said I should have to bring more evidence to prove that I could guarantee them; so I went back to my business and I brought back different papers which satisfied the Inspector, and he allowed them out.

48553. You satisfied him that you were an engineer and that you were carrying on business at ———?—Yes, that I was a ratepayer.

48554. And then ultimately the two young women were let out on your bail?—Yes.

48555. About what time were they let out?—I could not swear exactly, but I think it must have been about half-past three, because I did not lose much time in going back. I went back with a car.

48556. (Mr. Dickinson.) What time did you get out?

—About three o'clock; it might have been before; I could not say absolutely. It was very nearly daylight.

48557. (Chairman.) Did you appear at the police-court on Monday?—Yes.

48558. And the young women too?—Yes.

48559. Did you defend yourselves or were you represented by a solicitor?—Mr. Percy Robinson, of Great Marlborough Street, defended us.

48560. A solicitor?—Yes.

48561. Did he appear for you all three?—Yes.

48562. Who retained him?—I did.

48563. What took place at the police court?—I was taken in last, and I stated exactly the same as I have stated to you.

48564. Before I come to that, do I understand the young women were charged first, and their case taken?—Yes, but it was not finished off. Mr. Robinson asked if we might be taken altogether after they were charged, as he was defending all three. Then I stated the case exactly the same as I have stated it to you.

48565. Before we come to that, do you remember what constables appeared in the witness box?—I remember two of them—27 and 155; but I do not remember the other.

48566. How many constables were called altogether, as far as you can recollect?—Three.

48567. Was the third one whose number you do not know the other one who arrested ———?—Yes.

48568. I understand it was 27 CR who arrested ———?—Yes.

48569. And then another constable whose number you do not know arrested ———?—Yes.

48570. And the third constable (155 C) came up afterwards to the assistance of his colleagues?—Yes.

48571. And those three men were called before the Magistrate?—Yes.

48572. Then Mr. Robinson appeared for you and defended you?—Yes.

48573. Were you called as a witness?—No, I was called as a prisoner.

48574. Did you take the book?—Yes, I think I was sworn. I could not swear to it, but I think I was.

48575. Did the young women give evidence as well?—They gave evidence, but I could not tell you if they were sworn.

48576. As to the charge against the young women, was anything more said at the police court than was said, according to you, at the police station—that they were common prostitutes. Were they not charged with soliciting?—They were charged with soliciting.

48577. They were charged?—Yes.

48578. That was at the police court?—Yes.

48579. Had anything been said about soliciting at the police station?—No, I do not think so.

48580. You will not be certain?—No, I could not say for certain.

48581. You remember I did ask you whether that was all that the sergeant of the police said?—They were only charged with being common prostitutes at the police station, but I think in the constable's evidence he said they were soliciting.

48582. Was the suggestion of the constable that they were soliciting you?—I think so.

48583. Or molesting you. You told us that they had taken hold of your arm?—Undoubtedly the constable at the time was under the impression that they were soliciting me.

48584. You think the constable thought so?—Yes, I think so.

48585. Was that stated at the police court?—No. He charged them with soliciting, but as they had only that second come up and spoken to me they could not have solicited anybody else. I take it he thought that was the case, and I was taking their part. But in court I produced the telegram which was sent on the Saturday giving them an appointment.

48586. That telegram was read by you in court?—It was produced at the court, and I think it was either left at the court or Mr. Percy Robinson had it. I did not get it back.

48587. What did the Magistrate do or say?—He said it was unusual for people in our position to be brought up on such a charge, and he made some comment to that effect, and then he bound us over to keep the peace.

48588. Who was the Magistrate?—Mr. Denman. I believe after I left the court Mr. Robinson asked that it should not be counted as a conviction against me, but Mr. Denman insisted that it should be.

48589. We shall see the charge sheet, and see what the decision was. Was anybody else called on your side beside yourself and the two young women?—Yes, there were two witnesses.

48590. What were their names?—A man named ——— ——, ———, I think is his name—and another one ——— ———. I know the address of the latter one, but the former one I could not tell you.

48591. You have come here on the terms of making a full disclosure to us about this matter?—Quite so.

48592. I think I ought to ask you this question: what is ———? Is she a prostitute really?—Over two years she has been the mistress of a friend of mine, and was at that time. What she is doing now I could not tell you. I have hardly seen her since that night.

48593. How long have you known her?—I had known her about nine months at that time. A man I have met in business told me she had been his mistress for about two years. But I know that she is not his mistress now, and I have hardly seen her since. I have seen her, but I have hardly spoken to her more than three times since then. As for her friend, I think she is a prostitute.

48594. You had never seen ——— before or spoken to her?—Yes, I had seen her, but never been intimate. I had spoken to her, and said "Good evening" and that kind of thing, but I had never been friendly.

48595. You had never been home with her or anything of that kind?—Oh, no.

48596. I understand the purpose of your telegram was to meet ——— with the view of making an appointment for the next day?—With my friend only. I did not know where to find him at the time, so I sent the telegram to her, knowing she would see him.

48597. What was the excursion the next day, the Sunday, to be?—We were going down to Deal, I think it was. I do not remember exactly where it was.

48598. By rail?—No, by motor car. I was going to drive them.

48599. Was ——— to be of the party?—No, only we three.

48600. (Mr. Dickinson). You say that ——— was the mistress of your friend?—Yes.

48601. Do you know at all whether, during the last two years, she has been on the streets?—During the time that she was his mistress she was not there, but since then I believe she has been.

48602. At that time she was his mistress?—Yes.

48603. At that time you knew she was not frequenting the streets for that purpose?—Not for the purpose. She used to go out to meet him, and sometimes I used to meet them.

48604. I do not quite understand. What did you think was the reason why the police-constable first took these girls into custody?—I think the constable thought they were soliciting me.

48605. Did they say anything?—No, they simply took hold of my arm. I was waiting there, and they came up, and they each took hold of my arm.

48606. Where were you at that moment?—At that moment about midway between the first turning after the Pavilion and Shaftesbury Avenue—that is to say, in the centre of the Pavilion block.

48607. On the pavement?—Yes.

48608. That is to say, on the pavement north-east of Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

48609. Were you standing there?—I was waiting there.

48610. For them?—I was not waiting for them. I was waiting for her.

48611. Where did you see them come from?—They came from the direction of Scott's Restaurant.

48612. Were you looking towards that direction?—I hardly remember, but I have got an idea that I was not—that I had got my back to that direction.

Mr. Y.
11 June 1907.

48613. Did they come up from behind you?—I believe so, but I would not swear to it.

48614. You were rather surprised at being taken hold of by the two girls?—I daresay I was.

48615. You did not expect two girls?—No.

48616. Did you say anything when they caught hold of you?—No. They might have said, "Good evening." I don't think they had time to say a word before they were arrested.

48617. So far as you know, if they had been two strange girls the constable might well have thought they were accosting you?—Quite so.

48618. You think that was the reason?—I think that was the reason.

48619. When he took the girl, what did he say to her?—I think he said, "Come along." He first caught hold of one, and he called to one of his friends and said, "Come on ———, that one as well, too." The girls protested, and I said, "They are friends of mine," and he said, "You get out of it, ——— come along." There were a lot of rough words, and I saw it was no good protesting. I simply told the girls to go quietly and not struggle. There were hundreds of policemen about, and it would have been absurd to have tried to get away.

48620. (Mr. Whitmore.) A large crowd?—No, there was not a large crowd, but in the West End on a Saturday night there were two or three policemen on every corner.

48621. (Mr. Dickinson.) Where were the policemen standing? Did you see them before this occurrence?—They came up from—I could not tell you where.

48622. They came up from behind these?—I think they came from across the road. I could not say exactly, but I had got my back towards Scott's, and as they caught hold of my arm I went to turn round, and before I knew where I was they were dragged away on one side of me.

48623. Had you any time to say a word of greeting?—I might have said "Good evening." I could not tell you exactly.

48624. Before the police took them you knew it was ———?—Yes.

48625. You did not know the other name, I understand?—I knew her, but only as a passing acquaintance.

48626. Had you time to recognise that these two particular girls you knew were taking your arm?—Yes.

48627. But you had not time to walk along with them?—We might have walked two or three steps, but before we had hardly said a word the first one was arrested, and the constable called on his colleague to arrest the other.

48628. Then the constable did not ask you whether you were annoyed at all?—No, he did not say anything. I told him they were friends of mine. He took no notice.

48629. Were the girls at all in a state of excitement when they came up to you?—I do not think so. I did not notice anything.

48630. I suppose they were quite sober?—Quite.

48631. To what extent did they struggle when they walked from there to Vine Street?—They would not walk along. They did not struggle to the extent that they fell down, but they pulled and waved their arms or tried to wave the arm that was free. They were not violent or anything of that kind.

48632. Did they cry out?—No, I don't think they made much noise. They simply protested to the constables that they had got no right to take them.

48633. Had you dropped behind, or where were you?—Directly the constable caught hold of them I let go.

48634. But you went on speaking to the constable?—I told the constable they were friends of mine.

48635. How long did you go on telling him that?—He immediately followed me up, and told me to go off or he would take me up as well. Then I turned round to the girls, who were struggling, and I said, "Don't struggle; go along quietly, and I will bail you out."

48636. Where were you when you said that?—That was on the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue and the London Pavilion.

48637. You had not crossed then?—No.

48638. They took them across the street to the fountain?—Yes.

48639. Still struggling?—Yes, to a certain extent.

48640. Where were you then?—Behind.

48641. What distance behind?—About two yards.

48642. Were you saying anything then?—I was telling them to go quietly all the time. I persisted.

48643. You went on telling them to go quietly?—Yes.

48644. How long did you go on telling them that—until you got where?—Almost to the police station.

48645. You were continually speaking to the police?—No, not the police—to the girls, except when the police said to me, "You mind your own business and go away, or we will take you as well." Then I said, "You cannot take me for trying to assist you."

48646. I suppose you were in a state of indignation then?—Oh, yes.

48647. You were angry?—I was annoyed. I was not rude about it, because I know it is no good being rude to the police in the West End of London. I was indignant without being rude.

48648. Did you raise your voice at all?—No, I did not shout.

48649. What made these two people follow you?—Because they knew me. They happened to see me in the centre of the crowd.

48650. Had you seen them before?—No, I did not know they were there.

48651. When did you first see them?—I did not see them till I got back to my business. I went back to my business after three, and I found them there waiting outside.

48652. You found these two?—Yes, after they saw me go in they had been to see if they could get somebody to bail me out without going to my family.

48653. Those two were sufficiently intimate with you to want to help you?—One was, I might also say, my best friend.

48654. That is ———?—Yes.

48655. You did not see him at all then?—I did not know he was there at all.

48656. Do not you know the other man ———?—I used to be apprenticed with him.

48657. You say you cannot give his address?—I could not tell you where he is, but he is somewhere in the country. I could find it out, but I do not know what it is now. I know where his parents live.

48658. I suppose ——— would know something about him?—I should think ——— would know something about him, but I am not absolutely certain.

48659. Are you sure that you are right when you say that the girls were charged with soliciting at the police court?—Soliciting or accosting—which I take to be the same thing.

48660. You have no doubt about that?—No doubt about it at all.

48661. I mean at the police court before the police Magistrate?—Yes.

48662. You have no doubt they were charged there with soliciting?—It was mentioned. Whether it was called a charge I could not tell you, but the constable in his evidence said they were soliciting.

48663. Did he say whom they were soliciting?—No, he did not say that.

48664. Did he say he knew them as prostitutes?—I could not tell you; I do not think so.

48665. I ask you that because in the account in the newspapers it is said that "——— and ——— were charged before Mr. Denman with being guilty of riotous behaviour in Piccadilly Circus early on Sunday morning last." That is a very different thing to soliciting and being a common prostitute. Were these policemen at the entrance to Vine Street standing there when you came up?—They were already there before we arrived. I take it they had been there some time.

48666. I suppose there was a considerable crowd there, from what you say?—There were a lot of people about.

48667. Were they standing so as to block the way?—Yes, they were standing there to stop people who came down.

48668. Standing there on purpose to stop them?—If there were any charges, so that they could let the constables through with the prisoners.

48669. Were there any police standing at the actual entrance to the police station?—I cannot remember. There may have been one policeman at the door.

48670. After the two girls were taken in you went on insisting on going in?—Yes.

48671. Were you insisting, then, in an indignant manner?—In an indignant manner. I was not at all rowdy or noisy, or anything of that kind, but I said, "I insist on going in."

48672. Did they give you any reason why you should not go in?—No, they simply said I could not go through, and, what was more, I was not going through. I said, "I have a right to." I argued in that way. They said, "Clear off."

48673. (Chairman.) Could you give me the name and address of Mr. Percy Robinson?—The number of the house I could not give you, but it is next door to Great Marlborough Street Police Court.

48674. He is a well-known solicitor?—I believe he is a solicitor practising at that court.

48675. Could you give us the real name and address of ———?—My friend who was keeping her at the time has forbidden me to do so. As far as I am concerned, I do not mind at all, but he has seen her, and she will not sanction it. I have been trying, as Mr. Timewell knows, for some long time to get her permission. At the present moment I could not give it to you if I wanted. I know what it was at the time.

48676. In the report of this case that appeared in the "People" newspaper, one of the defendants is described as "———, age 23, no occupation, living at ———"?—Yes, that is right. Mr. Y. 11 June 1907.

48677. That is the girl ———?—Yes.

48678. And the other defendant is described as "———, age 23, actress, living at ———." Is that her real name?—Yes, I believe that is her real name. They had both to give their real names before I could bail them out.

48679. (Mr. Dickinson.) Their real names and addresses?—Yes, before I could bail them out.

48680. (Chairman.) Can you give us any assistance in finding them?—I will do my best to do so.

48681. You do not know the address of either at present?—I have not seen them for quite a long time.

48682. What is the name and address of the two witnesses who you called?———————— address is —, ———————— Street, S.W.

48683. He would come quite willingly?—Yes. The other was ———, and the last I heard of him was that he was in the neighbourhood of Reading, but where exactly I could not tell you. I could find it. His parents live at Reigate.

48684. You could find out from them where he is?—Yes.

48685. What is his Christian name?— ———, I think.

48686. ——— ———?—Yes.

(Chairman.) That is all we need ask you this morning.

Mr. Z, sworn.

48687. (Chairman.) What is your name?— ———.

48688. Where do you live?— ———

48689. What are you by business or by trade?—I am a motor-car mechanic.

48690. Mr. Y was examined before us this morning, and he said that you are a great friend of his. Is that the case?—That is so.

48691. How long have you known him?—For a considerable period—I suppose six or seven years.

48692. You are acquainted with what took place on the 21st April, 1906, or, rather, in the early morning of the 22nd April, 1906?—That is so.

48693. Were you near him when he was arrested?—I was very close to him.

48694. Or when the young ladies were arrested?—Not when the young ladies were arrested.

48695. Will you tell us how you came to be a witness of any part of this occurrence?—On the evening you have mentioned I, with another friend named ———, was walking towards the Pavilion Music Hall, and we saw a disturbance just outside the Pavilion Music Hall. There were several policemen's helmets in the crowd. I said to my friend, "Here is an arrest; let us see what happens." We tried to push across the crowd and follow them across Piccadilly Circus and up Regent Street, where we got a little bit closer. There is a big hoarding there; they are building a large hotel, and there is a small passage way to Vine Street Police Station. Just up there the crowd were stopped by several policemen—I should think about six or seven of them—at this passage way. We got through, and were much surprised to see Mr. Y arguing with a policeman.

48696. (Mr. Whitmore.) Had you seen him before that?—I did not know it was him. Evidently they arrested these girls, which was the cause of the disturbance. As we got there, I think it was CR 27 had just gone down the passage way, and he turned round and said, "Don't let that fellow with the cap go down." I was quite close enough to hear that. Then I heard Mr. Y arguing; I did not know what it was. Then P.C. 155 C said, "Very well, then you shall come if you want it," and he took him by the collar and ran him in. In the court he stated that he arrested Mr. Y in Paccadilly Circus, and I absolutely denied it. He arrested him at the top of this passage for no reason whatever that I could see at all. Then the other constables moved the crowd on; they said, "Move on, move on," and pushed them all off. I went back to the garage where Mr. Y's business is, and I was going to ring up some friends to see if I could get bail for him. Mr. Z.

48697. (Chairman.) You went back to your own garage, do you mean?—To Mr. Y's garage.

48698. That is at ———?—That is at ———. I was going to ring up some friends (I did not like to go to his residence very well) to see if I could get them to bail him out, and while talking to ———, Mr. Y himself arrived. I think he got his own bail. Then we drove down in the car to Vine Street, and he bailed the two girls out. While waiting outside in the car a lot of policemen were coming on duty, and they were impudent while I was in the car. I was not the driver, and I was not the owner of the car.

48699. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You have not told us what they said or did?—One came out and examined the numbers. He said, "Those numbers are not right." I said, "I am very sorry, what is the matter with them." This was nothing to do with Mr. Y's case. He said, "Only a quarter of an inch board, and it should be five-eighths" I said, "I have a rule here; will you measure them." He said, "Don't talk to me like that, or I will go right through you, and over the top of you. Don't let me see you down the West End with this car again." Then he talked to some other constables who were going off duty. That is all about the case that I can tell you.

48700. (Chairman.) I understand when you first came up to the crowd outside the Pavilion which attracted your attention you did not see Mr. Y?—No, I did not know it was Mr. Y then.

48701. Did you see him, do you think?—I might have seen him, but I did not recognise him.

48702. According to his account, he talked to the police-constables there as well as when they got close by Vine Street?—I did not recognise him, if I did see him. Of course, when I saw the crowd they were moving across Piccadilly Circus. That is where we saw the disturbance.

48703. You did not observe the constables and the two girls at the fountain in the centre of Piccadilly Circus?—I might have seen them, but I should not have associated them with Mr. Y, and I did not at the time.

48704. I am assuming that for the moment. Did you see the constables with the two girls in their company?—Yes.

48705. At the fountain?—Yes, just across by the fountain. Going up Regent Street I could see the constables there with two girls and several fellows. Of course, I did not know it was Mr. Y.

48706. When you saw them go from the fountain, which way did they go?—On the left hand side up Regent Street.

48707. Was there a big crowd following?—There always is a big crowd with an arrest there.

48708. Were the streets very crowded on this night at that time?—Yes, they were very crowded. If I remember aright, it was a Football Cup-tie night, and there were a lot of provincial people in the streets, and the streets were very crowded.

48709. Were you and your friend ——— at the head of the crowd following, or far back in the crowd following?—We only got to the head of the crowd when they reached the passage leading to Vine Street.

48710. You think the number of constables that were standing there, and in a certain sense barring the way, were about six or seven in number?—I could not tell you; there were a good many of them. There might be seven or eight, or six or seven.

48711. When you got there the girls who had been in custody had disappeared?—They were just going down. They had not disappeared. I could see them when they were in custody. I was as close as that, and I recognised them at once.

48712. They had got past the seven or eight constables who were there?—The policemen had just opened out, and they were going down.

48713. Which of the constables shouted out, "Don't let that man with the cap go through," or words to that effect?—27 CR.

48714. Did you see anything of 155 C then?—He was standing with the other constable at the entrance to this passage way.

48715. Did he go on at all into the police station?—He arrested Mr. Y and took him into the police station.

48716. He did not go with 27 CR and the girls into the police station first, according to your recollection then?—No.

48717. That is all that you saw then really. You saw Mr. Y arrested?—I saw him arrested.

48718. How was the arrest effected? Describe what took place?—I saw Mr. Y arguing like this, and I heard the constable say, "Very well, if you want to come in you shall come," and he took him by the collar and ran him in.

48719. Did you attend at the police court?—Yes, and gave evidence.

48720. On the Monday?—Yes.

48721. How many constables were called, according to your recollection?—At the police court?

48722. Yes?—I think three.

48723. 27 CR?—Yes, and 155 C, and I have forgotten the other one. I think it was 22 C, or 24 C. I can recognise the constable, but I do not know his number.

49724. Mr. Y, we understand, gave evidence himself?—Yes.

48725. And ——— also gave evidence?—That is so.

48726. What was the evidence that you gave in substance? Was it what you have told us to-day?—Exactly, as far as I recollect, what I have told you to-day.

48727. Mr. Percy Robinson, we have been told, was defending Mr. Y. Did he ask you as to matters upon which you have not told us anything?—I do not recollect. I think he asked me the story much as I have told it to you.

48728. (Mr. Whitmore.) Were you cross-examined?—No.

48729. (Chairman.) Then ——— was also called, was he not?—That is so.

48730. After the arrest of Mr. Y, you and ——— went away together, I understand?—Yes, we went away together.

48731. You did not try yourself to get to the police station?—No, we were moved off.

48732. I understand that you are quite positive that Mr. Y was not under arrest during the time that you were following the constables and the two girls along Regent Street?—Not only quite positive, but I am quite certain he was not.

48733. (Mr. Dickinson.) You did not see him?—I did not see him, but I saw the arrest take place.

48734. (Chairman.) At any rate you are very certain when you got to the head of the crowd that was following you saw Mr. Y arguing, as you have told us, with a constable?—Yes, he was not under arrest then.

48735. (Mr. Whitmore.) Then you did see him just a little before the arrest took place?—Yes.

48736. (Chairman.) Did you know either of the girls in custody?—I knew one, ———. She was a mistress of a friend of ———. I have seen the other girl once or twice, but I do not know her well.

48737. Had you seen the other girl before?—I had seen her before.

48738. Do you know the other girl's name?—I think her Christian name was ———, but I do not remember her surname.

48739. She was not an acquaintance of yours?—No.

48740. Did you see her that morning again after they were bailed out?—I went down with ——— to bail them out.

48741. Was your bail taken as well as that of ———?—No. They did not ask me.

48742. Did you go into the police station?—No, I waited in the car outside.

48743. Did you see the girls come out?—Yes.

48744. Did they, or either of them, make any complaint of their treatment?—Mr. Y did. He complained that they had used him very badly at the station, and called him bad names.

48745. Mr. Y complained that he had been treated badly at the station?—He was forced violently into a seat. I think his solicitor, Mr. Robinson, also asked the constable the question.

48746. How did the girls look when they came out? Did they look ill or faint?—No, I do not think so.

48747. And they had no complaint to make as to their treatment in the cells?—I do not remember. I do not think that that happened.

48748. Then you drove them home, I suppose?—Yes.

48749. Where is ——— now?—I heard that he is driving a car for somebody in Reading, but I do not know his address.

48750. Do you know his home address?—No.

48751. What is his Christian name?————.

48752. Is he a chaffeur or motor driver?—An electrical engineer. He could drive a car.

48753. But his business is that of an electrical engineer?—An electrical engineer.

48754. Not in private or domestic service?—I do not know what he is doing now. I think he is in private service now, but at the time I knew him he was an electrical engineer.

48755. Could you assist us to get his address, do you think?—I am afraid I could not.

48756. You can not only understand, but I suppose you are quite familiar with plans and maps?—Yes.

48757. Vine Street Station is coloured yellow, is it not?—Yes, it is here.

48758. (Mr. Dickinson.) Where were you standing when you first saw the crowd?—I was standing about here, going in this direction.

48759. You were walking past the Pavilion?—Yes.

48760. Where was the crowd when you first saw it?—About there first—in front of the Pavilion—going in the direction of Regent Street.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) At the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue.

48761. (Mr. Dickinson.) Where did you cross?—By the fountain.

48762. Then on to the south side of Regent Street?—Then on to the south side of Regent Street.

(Chairman.) On the west side, or on the south-west side.

48763. (Mr. Dickinson.) You followed behind. How far behind were you when you first saw them moving?—20 yards, I suppose.

48764. When did you become aware of the fact that there were two women in the case?—I was not certain who it was until I got to the entrance to the passage to Vine Street.

48765. Then you did not even know that two girls were arrested up to that moment?—No.

48766. Did you see the two girls go in the passage to Vine Street?—Yes, and I saw the policemen's hats.

48767. When they turned round did you recognise them?—I recognised her by her dress and her bonnet; I knew her at once.

48768. How did you know the two girls?—By their dress and by their walk.

48769. Then did they disappear from your view?—They turned down the passage and turned into Vine Street.

48770. Could you see them down the passage?—Yes.

48771. You were sufficiently near to see them go down the passage?—Yes.

48772. You saw them go into the police station?—No.

48773. When they disappeared how many policemen were there?—There were three police-constables.

48774. You told us that P.C. 155 C did not go down the passage with the girls?—No.

48775. Then there were two other constables?—I saw one constable take one girl and another constable take the other girl.

48776. When did you become aware of the fact that this was 155 C?—At the time when he arrested Mr. Y.

48777. You took his number then?—Yes.

48778. Was he the man Mr. Y was arguing with?—Yes.

48779. Was it the result of this argument that made 155 C say "Come in"?—Apparently so.

48780. You are sure 155 C did not go away to the police station and then come back again?—Quite certain, because I saw the girls going down; I was standing there, and I saw the argument going on.

48781. What was the argument about?—As far as I can remember, Mr. Y wanted to go down the passage way to the police station, and the police-constables would not let him; they would not let anybody go down the passage way.

48782. Did he say why he wanted to go down?—I do not know; I do not think I heard that.

48783. Had you spoken to Mr. Y that evening?—I had seen him during the day.

48784. I mean during this occurrence?—No.

48785. You did not even speak to him when he was arguing with the police-constable?—No.

48786. And you had not been with him before that?—I had seen him in the morning, or in the afternoon, but not in the evening.

48787. (Chairman.) Will you show me on that plan where the constables were, and mark it in red?—There was a big hoarding here, and it was half way between that and Vine Street.

48788. From Regent Street into the passage?—From Regent Street into the passage. There is a big wooden hoarding there.

48789. Then you and the others of the crowd who were afterwards told to move on were on the pavement in Regent Street when you found your friend arguing with the police?—On the pavement in Regent Street.

48790. Then seven or eight policemen were in front?—Yes.

48791. Barring the way into the passage?—Yes.

48792. (Mr. Dickinson.) When you went to the police court on the Monday do you remember what the policemen said these girls had been doing?—I think he said they had been soliciting.

48793. Soliciting or accosting?—Yes; I would not swear to it, but I think he said they were soliciting.

48794. Did the Magistrate say anything about soliciting or accosting?—I do not remember.

48795. Did the policeman say who the girls were soliciting?—No; they said they had seen them soliciting men.

48796. Did they say they were prostitutes?—Yes, I think they did.

48797. You have a recollection of that?—I think they said they were prostitutes.

48798. I do not want you to say so if you do not remember it?—No.

48799. (Mr. Whitmore.) You say this was the night of a Football Cup Tie?—Yes.

48800. And that the streets round the Circus were crowded?—Yes.

48801. Was the crowd a noisy crowd?—I should not call it a noisy crowd.

48802. Before you saw the arrest of the girls what had you been doing?—I had been working all the day. Then I met ———. I think we played a game of billiards; then we had supper, and then I think we walked about.

48803. Had you seen other disturbances before this? What was your object in walking about at 10 o'clock?—At that time we frequently go down Regent Street.

48804. You had no idea of meeting ———?—I thought he was going down there. We often used to meet down there. I do not remember any appointment with ———. I do not think there was.

48805. You were rather open to see something lively, I suppose?—I do not think so.

48806. (Chairman.) Did you know anybody else in the crowd besides ——— and ——— who was arrested?—I do not remember.

48807. I simply ask by way of precaution; I am not suggesting that you did?—I do not think I did.

48808. (Mr. Dickinson.) You gave evidence at the police court?—Yes.

48809. What did you say at the police court?—Much the same as I have told you.

48810. Did you say that Mr. Y was not arrested at Piccadilly Circus?—Yes, I laid emphasis on that, because the police said they arrested him at Piccadilly Circus by the fountain, which was not true. I wanted to impress upon them that the arrest did not take place there, but at this passage way in Regent Street. I think Mr. Robinson did not conduct the case very well.

48811. Did the police ask you any questions about it?—No.

48812. Nobody cross-examined you?—No.

48813. The Magistrate did not ask you any questions?—I do not remember.

48814. (Chairman.) You were not satisfied with the way in which the case was conducted?—I was not. He did not impress upon the Magistrate where the arrest of Mr. Y took place. I think Mr. Robinson did not mention it in his summing up.

48815. What did Mr. Robinson say as to the girls? Did he deal with their case separately from Mr. Y's case?—No, I think the whole case was taken altogether.

48816. When Mr. Percy Robinson addressed Mr. Denman, or made a speech to Mr. Denman, I suppose he did make some observations about the charge against the young ladies, did he not?—I think he did at the time.

48817. What did he say about them according to your recollection?—I think he said what the girls said, that they denied they had solicited, and that they met Mr. Y by special appointment. If I remember aright a telegram was produced.

48818-9. I was coming to that?—Yes.

48820. What did Mr. Robinson say about Mr. Y, I mean in substance?—I do not remember.

48821. I thought you remembered well enough to know that he had not put the strongest points forward?—That was my point of view. I think he did not take as much notice as he ought.

48822. You know what the charge was against Mr. Y?—Attempting to rescue.

48823. Yes. I gather you thought it was a very important point in Mr. Y's favour that he was not arrested, as the policeman said he was, in Piccadilly Circus, but that he was arrested when he was trying to get into the police station by 155 C?—Quite so.

48824. You thought Mr. Robinson did not press that point enough?—I do not think he mentioned it in his summing up at all, if my recollection is right.

Mr. Z.
11 June 1907.

48825. It is rather extraordinary that he should not mention it at all?—I do not think he mentioned it.

48826. However, perhaps we may see Mr. Robinson. Thank you. I think that is all we want of you to-day, but we shall want you to come here again?—I am leaving to-morrow for a six weeks' tour of England.

48827. (Mr. Whitmore.) On a car?—On a car.

48828. (Chairman.) It is only in England?—It is only in England.

48829. We shall be able to find you if we send to the address you have given us?—I shall not be at the same place long. I leave at 9 o'clock to-morrow.

48830. What is your present address?— ——— will always find me, as I go there every day.

48831. That is the same address as ———?—Yes.

48832. A letter address "Care of ———" will be forwarded?—It will be forwarded, but I do not know whether I shall get it.

48833. Will you take care to give addresses to which letters will be forwarded?—I will do the best I can. Of course I cannot be my own master.

48834. Are you going on a tour on your own account or are you driving somebody?—I am driving somebody.

48835. At any rate ——— will know your movements pretty accurately?—He will know the day before.

48836. (Mr. Dickinson.) Still, you can keep him coached?—I can keep him coached on that.

FIFTY-SEVENTH DAY.

Thursday, 13th June 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
WILLOUGHBY HYETT DICKINSON, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. ST. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).
J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Mr. STANLEY SAVILL, sworn.

Mr. S. Savill
13 June, 1907.

48837. (Chairman.) Are you the Chief Clerk at the Marlborough Street Police Court?—I am.

48838. Do you produce the Register of the Court sitting at Marlborough Street for Monday the 23rd April, 1906?—I do.

48839. With regard to Case No. 24, the entry is as follows: "Name of informant 22 CR. Age 23 ———. Nature of offence dis. pros. Further—assault Walter Howell, PC 22 R. Time brought to police station 12.30 a.m., 22nd. Bailed out 3.15 a.m., 22nd. Minute of adjudication O.R."—what does that mean?—Own recognisances.

48840. "£5, Six Mos. Magistrate adjudicating G. L. Denman." Then the second case is No. 30. "Name of informant 27 CR. Age 23. Name of defendant ———. Nature of offence dis. pros. Time brought to police station 12.30 a.m., 22nd. Bailed out 3.15 a.m., 22nd. Minute of adjudication, O.R. £5, Six Mos. Magistrate adjudicating, G. L. Denman." Then the third case is No. 31. "Name of informant 27 CR. Age 22. Name of defendant ———. Nature of offence, attempt to rescue ———. Time brought to police station 12.30 a.m., 22nd. Bailed out 2 a.m., 22nd. Minute of adjudication O.R. £5, Six Mos. Magistrate adjudicating G. L. Denman." Do you happen personally to recollect the case at all?—I do.

48841. Mr. Percy Robinson appeared for the defendants, did he not?—That I cannot tell you. I remember the defendant mentioning that one of the girls was the mistress of a friend of his, and that drew my attention to it, and it makes me remember it.

48842. Did you take the notes of evidence in the case?—I did.

48843. Have you got the original notes here?—Yes (producing).

48844. Will you read them to us. Were Nos. 30 and 31 taken separately?—I am under the impression that the other case was taken first, and then the other defendant came down and before a decision in her case was given she stood and waited while these two cases were taken and gave evidence for the defence, and then the decision was given in all the three.

48845. Which case was taken first?—No. 24 was taken first.

48846-7. That was the case of ———?—That is so.

48848. Will you kindly read the notes in that case?—"Walter Howell, 22 CR. At 12.30 a.m. on the 22nd April. Piccadilly Circus. Defendant annoying gentlemen by catching them by the arm. One she stopped Windmill Street and one in Shaftesbury Avenue. Prostitute. There nightly. Struck me twice in the face with fist when I took her. Cross-examined. Had not hold of a gentleman by the arm when I took her. She was with another woman. Another constable took the other woman. At the corner of Windmill Street I saw a gentleman whom she accosted shake her off. I did not see the man ——— with her. She did not strike me twice in the face until after I had gone a few yards with her."

48849. Then you produce the notes in Cases Nos. 30 and 31?—I do. "P.C. Calladine, 27 CR. At 12.30 a.m. on the 21st April. Piccadilly Circus. Saw defendant ——— stop two gentlemen corner of Windmill Street. I requested them to pass away. They did so towards Coventry Street. Shortly afterwards the defendant ——— returned, and I saw her stop another gentleman there. She went on towards Shaftesbury Avenue. When I took ——— into custody the man ——— came up and said 'You are not going to take her,' and tried to get her away. The woman walks Coventry Street and Regent Street. The man ——— was close beside ——— when taken into custody. P.C. William Wood, 155 C. Saw 27 CR with ——— in custody. Saw the man ——— come up and seize ——— by the arm and try to get her away from P.C.'s custody." Then the man ——— is called. "On the 21st April I sent ——— a telegram (produced) to meet her at Leicester Lounge. She is the mistress of a friend of mine. I subsequently met ——— and ——— at Windmill Street. They put their arms in mine and we walked towards the Pavilion. Near there a constable came up and took her. I told her to go quietly, and did not try to rescue her." Then ——— is called.

48850. She is the person entered in the Register as ———?—Yes. "I met ——— by telegram, and about midnight went with him and the girl ——— and another gentleman friend to the Pavilion, and so on through Regent Street when the constable arrested us." ——— of ——— Street corroborated.

48851. Was she the other prisoner?—Yes. She corroborated. "The constable took me from my friend Mr. ——— arm. I met Mr. ——— by appointment at 11.45 p.m. at Leicester Lounge and left with him at 12 o'clock." Then ——— is called. "I saw ——— at Vine Street Police Station demanding to go in to bail someone. P.C. William Wood, 155 C said 'You cannot go in.' He said he wanted to go in and bail someone out. 155 C then took him." Then ——— said "I was with ——— and I corroborate him."

48852. Did the girl ——— give her address as ———?—Yes. I should have read that.

48853. Have you got the address of the other girl?—As a prisoner, you mean.

48854. What address did she give?—It would be on the charge sheet.

48855. It would be on the recognisance too, would it not?—It would be in the police recognisance—the station recognisance.

48856. It would be on the Court recognisance?—Yes.

48857. Perhaps you would not mind sending us a copy of that?—I will.

48858. (Mr. Dickinson.) May I ask why one of them comes here and the other a page lower down?—They were charged separately on separate charge sheets—not together. But it was probably brought to our notice in the course of the case that they were connected with the other case, and they were taken in that way.

48859. When is this book made out?—Before the case comes before the magistrate, from the charge sheet, and they would be on different charge sheets.

48860. (Mr. Whitmore.) It does not show that the cases were heard in that order?—It does not, but it would probably be so.

48861. (Mr. Dickinson.) You make them up on separate charge sheets?—Yes, they are made up by the police, as a matter of fact, from the charge sheets before the Court assembles, and the police put the numbers and we follow that order 48862. (Chairman.) This is not in your handwriting?—No, it is not. It is the gaoler's.

48863. It throws a light on some of the cases we have had, so I should like to ask you a question upon it. Who did, in fact, at Marlborough Street write out this book?—The sergeant gaoler.

48864. He would do that on the Monday morning.—He would do that on the Monday morning. He would come about half-past eight and see the prisoners coming from the different police stations with the charge sheets. He would enter the case, and at a quarter past ten he would have them all ready, and we should glance through them.

48865. It is very likely that ——— and ——— and Mr. Y did not come up at the same moment on Monday morning?—Yes. He would not know that it was the same case until the police told him later.

48866. (Mr. Dickinson.) How are these notes of what the defendants say taken down?—They are taken down in longhand very rapidly. We had on that morning about 70 cases, and the average time given to each would be about a minute and three-quarters; cases taking longer may reduce this to about three-quarters of a minute. We have work in the afternoon as well, and the hearing of the 70 cases takes time. We sit at a quarter past ten. It is not wholly satisfactory, speaking from my 26 years' experience.

48867. (Chairman.) You seem to do very much what a judge does. You take rapid notes in longhand but abbreviated so that you can recognise what the words are afterwards?—That is so. We do the best we can.

48868. (Mr. Dickinson.) I suppose in a case like this which was contested, and with a solicitor representing the defendants, a great deal more must have been said than what is put down here?—Yes, no doubt. I do not know that it would be all to the point quite.

48869. I suppose you have no recollection of this case?—I have none except that I remember the fact of the man going into the box struck me. When my attention was called to the case I remembered it in that way at once.

48870. Do you remember any statement having been made that he was arrested in Piccadilly Circus?—No, I do not remember that.

48871. There is no mention of that here?—No. If it had struck me as a point in the case I should have noted, but I might have missed it. The magistrate takes a note as well, and hardly refers to ours. Ours is kept as a sort of record.

48872. But if he had raised that as a defence would you have put that down?—If it had seemed to me material. I have to use a certain discretion. I might have gone wrong in missing it.

48873. (Chairman.) It is stated in ———'s evidence that P.C. Wood said: "'You cannot go in.' He said he wanted to go in and bail someone out. 155 C then took him. Then ——— said 'I was with ———, and I corroborate him'"?—Yes, there was that point.

48874. The point Mr. Dickinson is suggesting to you is that it is rather odd that was not in Mr. Y's evidence. We understand he did say the same as his friend ———?—Yes, I might have missed it.

48875. It is quite possible he might have said so according to your system?—Just so.

48876. (Mr. Dickinson.) He did not ask to cross-examine the constable on that point?—He did not. He would be given the opportunity, I expect.

48877. Therefore this case was taken with the usual run of cases on Monday morning, and it was not adjourned till the afternoon?—No, it was not. In the afternoon we have a long list of summonses and in the interval a number of commitments are made out, and so on.

48878. I see you have stated that P.C. Calladine 27 CR said:—"The woman walks Coventry Street and Regent Street. The man ——— was close beside ——— when taken into custody." When who was taken into custody does that mean?—I should say the woman ———.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I think that is obvious, Sir, from what follows. The same point struck me. "He was not taken into custody till I had taken the woman a few yards."

48879. (Chairman.) "She did not strike me twice in the face until after I had gone a few yards." What became of the telegram? It is stated here "On the 21st I sent ——— a telegram. (Produced.)" That is in your note?—If we had kept it I should have pinned it in the note book. We might have handed it back.

48880. What is your practice with regard to documents so handed in?—In the case of depositions we invariably keep them and forward them with the depositions to the court of trial.

48881. This is not a case of depositions?—No. In a case which appears to be complete and in which the record is unnecessary, we very often hand them back. It is probable that Mr. Denman looked at it and passed it over to the witness.

48882. You generally hand the documents back, I suppose?—We generally do in summary cases.

48883. At any rate, there is no doubt the telegram was produced, and you have not got it?—I have not got it.

48884. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) What were they convicted of; can you tell me from the register?—I cannot tell you from the register. I can form a conclusion and I am under an impression. Of course the magistrate in making a certain entry does not always like to be cornered as to the particular way in which he has arrived at it. If I had to furnish a return I should have given the police some guidance as to what to endorse on the charge-sheet.

48885. (Mr. Dickinson.) The words "Dis. pros." mean a disorderly prostitute?—Yes.

48886. Does that mean a prostitute who has been charged under the Vagrancy or under the other Act, or under neither?—They usually word the charge without referring to any particular statute, so that it would be dealt with under either.

48887. (Chairman.) It might be dealt with under Sub-section 13, disorderly "behaviour likely to occasion a breach of the peace," and then the policeman describes her as a prostitute?—Yes.

Mr. S. Savill.

13 June 1907.

48888. It does not necessarily mean it was a solicitation case?—No, it does not.

48889. There is not a word about solicitation in your notes?—No. The expression does not appear.

48890. Can you charge your memory with answering this question, that the word "solicitation" was used?—I do not remember it being used. There is a section in the Vagrancy Act under which we should be able to deal with them.

48891. As a matter of fact, the magistrate did not convict under any statute, did he?—He has power under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, without proceeding to conviction to bind over. He also has power under his commission, I suppose, which is a power in some sort of way derived from an old statute of 34 Edward III., to bind over.

48892. Reading that entry, I should not infer that he had convicted the prisoners of any statutory offence?—That was my impression.

48893. I suppose he might say this, "Well, I think the defendants are guilty, but as it is their first offence I will simply bind them over to keep the peace for six months." That would be legal, would it not?—That would be legal. He might have said that.

48894. You do not know what Mr. Denman did say in this case?—He would not have said that without there was some suggestion of disorder.

48895. He would not have bound them over if there had been no suggestion of disorder?—I would rather say he would have found there was some disorder. The man admitted in cross-examination he was there with these two women, one of whom was the mistress of a friend of his, and she was upon his arm at 12 o'clock at night, and probably the Magistrate thought that was quite sufficient to bind him over.

48896. In the case of Mr. Y there is no doubt there was no conviction for attempted rescue, and he was not convicted of attempting to rescue?—No, there was no attempted rescue; I should say not, because the Magistrate is more severe in a case of that sort.

48897. (Mr. Dickinson.) I do not understand what there was with regard to Mr. Y?—He was in Piccadilly at 12 o'clock at night with two women on his arm. One woman was admittedly a woman of ill-fame, or, at all events, of a doubtful character.

48898. (Chairman.) I take it, if a Justice of the Peace sees two men about to fight a duel, although they have not actually commenced any operation, he may bind them over to keep the peace there and then?—I think so.

48899. (Mr. Dickinson.) I understand it was not a conviction?—I do not think so; it is a bond not to offend.

Mr. Clinton Thomas Dent, recalled.

Mr. C. T. Dent.

48900. (Chairman.) When the Commission adjourned while you were giving evidence on the last occasion, I was asking your expert opinion as to a certain case in respect of which the Commission had taken evidence. Have you seen a transcript of the shorthand notes of your evidence?—No, I have not.

48901. Just to refresh your memory, let me remind you that I had called your attention to the fact that a gentleman of about 26 or 27 years of age had had an interview with a doctor at about 3.30 a.m. on a certain day, and I read to you the tests or an account of the tests to which the doctor had submitted him. The doctor, Dr. Davis, said he was quite certain that the gentleman was sober at that hour, and he expressed the opinion that his condition was such that he could not have been drunk at midnight—roughly speaking, three and a half hours before. You told me, I think, that in your opinion that would in any case be a hazardous judgment?—I think I used the expression that it was too strong a statement—"that he could not possibly have been drunk."

48902. The exact words you used were, "Speaking for myself, I think it is too positive a statement"?—That is what I said.

48903. Just about an hour before the gentleman was examined by Dr. Davis, he had been examined by the surgeon at the police station?—The divisional surgeon?

48903*. Yes. I think there is no doubt about the hour in this case. It was 2.30 to 2.45, and I am going to read what Dr. Mitchell said about his examination. First, perhaps, I had better tell you what the certificate was that he gave, or, to be more strictly accurate, what entry he made in the Occurrence Book. "I examined at 2.30 a.m. Maurice A. Gerothwohl, and found him recovering from the effects of excessive drinking. I think he is not now drunk." Then he was asked by Mr. Eldon Bankes, the learned counsel for the Metropolitan Police Force, "What did you find upon your examination of these gentlemen that led you to form the conclusion which you state in your certificate," and the answer of the doctor was as follows: "I examined them as to gait, and found it perfectly steady; the expression was intelligent, the voice in either case was not thick, and they did not stammer or hesitate, and I therefore came to the conclusion that they were sober; but when I examined their eyes I found the pupils still dilated, I found their lips parched, and their breath distinctly smelling of drink, and therefore I concluded that they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking." What I put to you is whether, as an expert, you think that is a sound conclusion?—As I read it in print here, I should say that the evidence was not very strong stated like that in black and white.

48904. (Mr. Dickinson.) The evidence of what?—The evidence that they were recovering from the effects of the excessive drinking founded on those conclusions—the pupils still dilated, the lips parched, the breath distinctly smelling of drink—that is a strong point, and I consider the fact of the pupils being dilated a moderately strong point taken in conjunction with other symptoms. Then with regard to their lips being parched, I should not myself think it was very positive evidence that the parching of the lips was due to excessive drinking.

48905. (Chairman.) But I think you told me last time in effect that the mere fact of a man smelling of drink by no means proved he had been drinking within a reasonable time?—It may or may not, according to the drink that he has been taking.

48906. The words I have given you are the exact words used by your expert colleague in answer to the learned counsel's question in order to justify the inference that he put in the Occurrence Book. I call your attention to the word "therefore." He does not say what may have been, but he says "recovering from the effects of excessive drinking"?—If I may take the point of the breath distinctly smelling of drink, that is a strong point if you find it in favour of a man having been drinking.

48907. Excessively?—Excessively, or drinking immoderately, if you like, or drinking unduly. I do not exactly know what meaning one is to attach to the word "excessively."

48908. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do I understand you to say if you have not been drinking unduly your breath will not smell?—No. The point I want to put before the Commission is that if the breath decidedly smells of drink it is very strong evidence that the man has been drinking. May I leave out the word "excessively" for the moment?

48909. (Chairman.) I should say it is absolute proof of the fact that the man has been drinking?—And if it does not smell it is not proof that he has not been drinking.

48910. I agree, but the question I am putting to you is a very simple one. You see what Dr. Mitchell says there first, and then he adds the words "and therefore." The question I put to you as an expert is whether you think it is a sound judgment to say positively from those symptoms that the man had been drinking excessively, or, in other words, had been drunk. It is not put as a mere hypothesis, but it is put as a distinct conclusion. Is that a sound judgment or not?—It might very well have been a sound judgment. Now I see these words in black and white that is a very different thing from seeing a patient, if I may say so, before you.

48911. Then that must be because the statement in black and white is not an accurate statement of what the person really saw?—I do not agree to that at all. The patient is before you, and those are the main factors. Were they the sole factors in this case, for I have not read the further evidence?

48912. There is nothing further, but you can read it all if you like. Look and see what the question is and see what Dr. Mitchell said in answer. He used the words "and therefore"?—It turns on the word "therefore" as to whether these facts are enough to come to that conclusion, and you ask me whether I think that is sound?

48913. I am asking your opinion as an expert whether you are prepared to say that that is a sound judgment. It is not a question of hypothesis. He says those were the symptoms, and therefore the man had been drinking excessively. Is that a sound inference or not? That is a question you can answer as an expert "yes" or "no"?—I think it is sound. But the word "excessive" seems to me to be the whole point.

48914. That is the whole point, and you have hit upon it. I put it to you in this way: Is it a true scientific inference from the data which the doctor had before him?—I think the word "excessive" is too strong as I read it there.

48915-6. Then you do not think it is a sound judgment. Observe what I mean by sound judgment—a necessary judgment. I am not suggesting that the man may not have been drunk or that he may not have been drinking excessively, but you see what Dr. Mitchell has certified, and what he has told us in the witness-box. He said the man had been excessively drinking, and he gave his reasons. The question I put to you is whether scientifically the conclusion is an inference arising from the data given?—I think it is too strong on what I read here.

48917. Those symptoms or data were what Dr. Mitchell observed at 2.30?—Yes.

48918. When Dr. Davis examined the gentleman an hour afterwards he did not find any dilatation of the pupils. Do you think that, assuming the pupils were dilated at 2.30, there would then have been no dilatation at all at 12.30?—They may have been quite normal.

48919. The lips being parched is a thing you attach no importance to?—I do not attach much importance to that, save taken in conjunction with other symptoms.

48920. I find Dr. Mitchell made perfectly clear what the symptoms were, because he was asked, "You did make a careful examination?—I made as careful an examination as was necessary for the purpose. I certified you were not drunk. I stated that you were recovering from excessive drinking for the reasons I have given—pupils dilated and inactive, lips parched, and breath smelling of drink." So there is no doubt as to the three data upon which the certificate was founded, and I understand you to say that it is not a necessarily true inference. Observe my use of the word "necessarily," which I am using in a strict logical and scientific sense?—Necessarily true on that that he had been drinking in Dr. Mitchell's opinion. Not necessarily true that he had been excessively drinking.

48921. Quite so; that is the whole point. I suppose you would agree with me that in forming a judgment such as Dr. Mitchell was endeavouring to form, and did form, in this case, the examiner, if he approaches his work in a scientific spirit, would exclude from consideration all the external circumstances—for instance, the disarrangement of the clothes, the disarrangement of the hair, the general dilapidated appearance, shall I say, and the surroundings of a police station. All those are elements that a scientific man would eliminate, would he not?—He would take them into account before he eliminated them.

48922. Why?—He does not want to have his judgment warped or paralysed by assuming that because a person's hair, for example, is in an untidy state, or his clothes torn, that that must necessarily be the result of his having been drunk.

48923. Please follow me. The question put to Dr. Mitchell, according to his own account, was an entirely scientific one. He was asked to give a statement of the condition of these men in regard to drink. He finds they were sober and not drunk, but adds to that a conclusion that they were recovering from excessive drinking. The last question I was putting to you was this, whether in forming a judgment upon that a doctor ought not to eliminate entirely all such circumstances as I have referred to?—Oh, yes; I think I see the point of the question.

48924. The debtor was not discharging the duty of the Magistrate or the duty which is cast upon the Commissioners with regard to this case. He was asked a question as an expert medical or surgical practitioner. Surely the question whether it was or was not more likely to be true that the men had been drunk at 12 o'clock because he found them in a police station was quite irrelevant?—I think not. The doctor, in forming the judgment as to the condition of a patient, must take into account the possibility of symptoms that might be caused by drunkenness being explained by something else.

48925. Do you think he was entitled to take into account anything said by the constables to him, for instance?—No, I do not think that.

48926. Why not on your principle?—He takes the symptoms that he sees before him.

48927. The symptoms?—Yes.

48928. But the disarrangement of the hair and the disarrangement of the clothes are not symptoms, are they?—Evidence of the person having perhaps gone through an exciting experience, and so forth.

48929. The exciting experience might have been somewhat rough treatment by the police, might it not?—It might have been so.

48930. Does that throw any light on the scientific question as whether the man was or was not sober or whether he had been drunk?—Most unquestionably it does.

48931. On the scientific question?—Yes. If a man has been through an exciting experience he is likely to be sobered by it.

48932. I do not think I quite understand your view as a scientific man with regard to this matter?—Might I draw your attention to paragraph 5 in my proof of evidence under the heading of "Drunkenness"?

48933. I quite see that, but of course a doctor in all cases practically sees a man who comes to him voluntarily in his own house or at the patient's own house, or else in the case of police surgeons he may see him at the police station. Am I to understand that in forming an opinion as to whether a man had been drunk you take into account the place at all. Supposing I come to you at your residence to inquire about anything. I suppose the tests which you would apply would be the same as those you would apply if you saw me in a hospital, would not they?—Very much the same tests for what they were worth.

48934. Supposing the question is whether I am about to get some obscure disease of a paralytic kind, the sort of disorder in which you put a man through his paces and perhaps make him strip naked and turn round on his heels and so on, or stand steadily for a moment if he can. It seems to me quite irrelevant from a scientific point of view whether the examination takes place in hospital or whether it takes place in a man's home?—Oh not, that is not so. He would be misled by symptoms very often.

48936. Then you are on your guard, I understand, against that kind of symptom which may be due not to the cause you are seeking, but due to adventitious accidental circumstances?—Yes.

48937. Then it may be a very disadvantageous thing for a man to be examined on this question of drunkenness at a police station?—On the contrary—much in his favour.

48938. In what condition?—Because fear or excitement or nervousness would tend to sober him, and mask the symptoms of drunkenness, for the volition is latent in alcoholic intoxication. It can be re-exercised, and there lies the whole difficulty.

48939. Therefore, following your principle, the really competent Police Surgeon takes into account the fact that the man is in the police station, and that the fact that he is in a police station has sobered him, or may sober him?—Yes.

Mr. C. T. Dent.

13 June 1907.

48940. That is rather against the prisoner, is it not?—On the contrary. If he finds sufficient evidence to say he is drunk there, the probability is that he was worse before.

48941. I do not follow that. I am taking your own illustration?—Under quieter circumstances the symptoms would come out more, and be more pronounced.

48942. At 2.30 Doctor Mitchell examines this prisoner. Do you suggest that the symptoms that he saw justified his coming to the conclusion that the prisoner had been drunk three hours before because the very fact of being in the police station had sobered him, and diminished the symptoms?—I do not suggest in the least that Doctor Mitchell, who is an experienced Divisional Surgeon, took that into account. As a medical man, he sees what is before him, but the symptoms would probably be less pronounced as he sees the prisoner and certifies. If he is justified in his opinion in putting down such a certificate as he does, it is probable that under less exciting circumstances he could have made it stronger. That is my point.

48943. Then the effect of the answer that you have given in answer to the case that I put to you, and in answer to the actual case that is in our minds is this, that the scientific expert in forming an opinion has to eliminate or make allowance for an increased intensity or a diminished intensity of symptoms, owing to the circumstances under which the examination takes place?—I do not agree that he makes allowance for it. He can judge only on what he sees. My point is that these examinations under those circumstances are in favour of the accused person, owing to the surroundings, broadly speaking.

48944. It is not a question of accusation at all. Dr. Mitchell simply repudiated the suggestion that he was influenced in the slightest by anything the constables told him, and I understand he repudiated that he was influenced by the surroundings. You are suggesting that the surroundings ought to have influenced him?—No, on the contrary. I hope I did not convey that idea at all. When the Divisional Surgeon examines a person under those conditions, as in forming any other medical opinion, he has to judge by what he sees. He forms his opinion on that. If I may put it in this way, as a matter of fact the symptoms on which he forms his opinion are in favour of the person he is examining, let me say. I used the word "accused," but I was referring to the person he was examining. I do not know if I make my point clear.

48945. I should have thought from my reading of books about science, especially books on logic, as bearing on the theory of induction, that the first process where you are seeking to discover a cause is to eliminate everything that one knows from experience to be irrelevant to the inquiry. Supposing, for instance, a man finds himself in a strangely nervous shaky condition, he finds his limbs do not answer to the call of his will; he goes to a medical man, and he says, "I want you to find out what is the matter with me." It seems to me that the place at which the examination takes place in order to discover the cause of these symptoms is irrelevant to the inquiry. You assented to that at first, but then you said the place has a bearing, because the place may make a patient nervous, and that gives rise to symptoms. Then the first duty of the scientific observer is to eliminate the symptoms, or to increase or decrease the symptoms due to the place of examination. Is not that so?—To eliminate it. But my point is that it is in favour of the prisoner.

48946. You come back to the question of favour. It is not a question of favour at all?—It would make the symptoms less pronounced.

48947. Quite so. I think we are at one in the matter, except that you do not seem to adopt my language. I daresay my language, though it is the language of general logic, may not be the language of the principles of the art of surgery. But surely, if you are trying to determine whether a particular patient in a hospital is suffering from incipient locomotor ataxy, and he is stripped before a class, you say the patient is nervous. I should think, in pursuing the inquiry, you have to eliminate the symptoms due to the nervousness, have you not?—Yes.

48948. You have to make allowance for them?—Yes. I quite follow you there.

48949. In the same way I suggest to you that when the Divisional Surgeon is in a police station, and is asked to inquire what condition a man is in with regard to drink, the first thing he has to do is to eliminate the surroundings, and not to attend to small details, such as the fact that the man is dirty or dilapidated, or that his clothes are disarranged, or his hair disarranged. Do you not think he ought to do so?—I think he does do so. He disregards the fact that the man's clothes are torn.

48950. (Mr. Dickinson.) You said that, in your view, after an exciting experience, a man is likely to have become sober?—Yes.

48951. I want to know whether it is also true or not that after an exciting experience a man may have symptoms which are akin to the symptoms of drunkenness?—I suppose that one must allow that that might be so, but it is rare. The probability is that it is all the other way.

48952. Then do I take it that the symptoms of drunkenness are not at all, as a rule, like the symptoms of excitement?—That may be so.

48953. What I want to get at is whether bona-fide mistakes may not be made if a medical man says that the symptoms are those of a man recovering from drunkenness, and they may nevertheless be merely the symptoms of an excitement through which he has gone?—I think that is so. May I put it in this way, which I think might make it clearer? The person who had been drinking a little, taking a proper amount of alcohol, and is in a state of great excitement, may appear drunk. I think that is so.

48954. And may have the symptoms of drunkenness?—I think so.

48955. May he have dilated pupils?—Dilated pupils is a most deceptive symptom; many people have always large pupils, and some have small ones, and some have irregular pupils all their lives.

48956. Would you say that dilated pupils are not only not a symptom of drunkenness, but not a symptom of anything that is definite?—I should expect in the case of a drunken person—an undoubted case of a drunken person—to find the pupils dilated, but you do not, as a matter of fact, always do so.

48957. But you also find dilated pupils in cases in which there is no question of drunkenness?—Oh, yes.

48958. I would like to ask you precisely the same question with regard to the smell of drink. Can you go further than to say this, that the fact that a man's breath smells of drink proves that he has been drinking alcohol?—You cannot go further than that.

48959. That is to say, smelling of drink does not prove at all that he has been drinking excessively?—No, and per contra total absence of smell may be associated with drunkenness.

48960. Total absence?—Yes, you may have practically no smell of alcohol in the breath, but a person may be profoundly intoxicated with alcohol. It depends on the nature of the intoxicant.

48961. A man may be perfectly sober and have been perfectly sober, and yet his breath may smell strongly of drink?—I do not think I ought to say "perfectly sober." I do not know where the condition of perfect sobriety begins. I suppose if he takes a teaspoonful of wine he begins the intoxicating stage, does he not?

48962. But if you were to drink a glass of whisky now your breath would smell for a time, would it not?—If it was very old and good whisky there would be very little smell. If it was new it would be very strong.

48963. It would be a strong smell without any question of your being drunk?—It depends on what the effect of the glass of whisky was on the individual.

48964. But in the ordinary course with regard to a person who drinks whisky in moderation, and there is not any question of his being drunk, his breath would smell, would it not?—With good old whisky very little.

48965. But ordinary bad whisky?—It would smell. If he put a teaspoonful in his mouth it would smell.

48966. I am anxious to ask you with regard to this because you understand from what we have heard it is evidently the principal symptom that the police consider in the case of drunkenness, because they always say, "The man smelt of drink." I want to know how far in your opinion the smelling of drink is really any proof of either existing drunkenness or having been drunk?—As an isolated symptom it is comparatively of no value.

48967. Then it comes to what I have said, that it is only a proof that the man has drunk something?—That is so really. He might have taken a teaspoonful of bad spirit into his mouth, and his breath would smell strongly of drink, especially if not diluted.

48968. You are Surgeon in Chief, are you not, to the Metropolitan Police?—I am Chief Surgeon.

48969. Does that place you in any relationship of superiority to the other Divisional Surgeons?—Yes.

48970. Are they supposed to be under you?—Yes, in a sense they are under me.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) There is a branch of this gentleman's proof which deals with this very question, but it has not been given in evidence yet.

48971-2. (Mr. Dickinson.) Then I will put it now. The Divisional Surgeons, you say, are appointed by the Secretary of State?—Yes.

48973. Upon your recommendation?—Yes, endorsed and submitted by the Commissioner.

48974. You state they were formerly appointed for life, but since 1904 they are appointed for five years?—Yes.

48975. Are those Surgeons who were appointed for life still holding life appointments?—Yes, unless they have changed their status. For example, a man is a Divisional Surgeon and he desires to become a Co-Divisional Surgeon. Then he may be made co-divisional, which means there are two doing the work of one, and he then must go on this five years' basis. It would date from the reappointment.

48976. You say they are men in full professional work?—Yes.

48977. You make a point of their being in full professional work?—Yes.

48978. Is that the case with the men who were formerly appointed and who are still holding office?—Some of them under the old system have held office for many years, and their work may be dropping off. There are about 176 Divisional Surgeons. They have all been, I presume, in general practice.

48979. But some of them have no practice now?—In some cases the practice may be dropping off. That is quite possible. Some of them are elderly. Of course I do not know what their practice is now.

48980. Then you say the Divisional Surgeons give their medical certificates in accordance with carefully reasoned medical opinions. That is what I was going to ask you upon. Do you take any steps whereby the Divisional Surgeons deal with these questions of drunkenness upon any recognised scientific system?—Since I have been appointed we had a conference on this very question. There was a paper read at the meeting of the Divisional Surgeons, and they all discussed the matter at great length, realising the extreme difficulty of the question. The discussion took place at Scotland Yard. It was a private meeting, you understand, for they were earnestly desirous of hearing each other's methods and conclusions, and so far as possible, if there was need for improvement, improving existing procedure with regard to this matter. They desired to exchange views for their own guidance so that they might be able to do their work as efficiently as possible.

48981. How long ago was that?—I suppose that the meeting must have taken place 18 months or two years ago. I cannot give you the precise date. I opened the discussion myself.

48982. Was that the first time that any attempt was made to deal with it?—I believe that was the first time it was discussed in that kind of way as at a debating society.

48983. Has anything come of that? Have you been able to devise any system or process which could be generally adopted?—No. I wish to goodness in such a case we could lay down definite tests. It cannot be done. There cannot be tests that are conclusive.

48984. But I suppose there can be some definite system of examination which all could agree upon?—It must vary according to the judgment of individuals. Some attach more importance to one symptom and some to another.

48985. The first question that the medical man has to settle is whether a man is drunk or sober at the moment. That is a difficulty, of course, but that is one of the problems. Do you think it is part of his duty to go beyond that, and if he finds the man is sober at the moment to give any opinion as to the probability of his having been drunk at a previous time?—If he likes to put down the word "drunk" or "sober" I do not think he need go beyond it, but in the great number of cases he can do neither. They are on the border line.

Mr. C. T. Dent.

13 June 1907.

48986. In two or three of the cases we have had before us we have had a certificate saying, "Not drunk, but has been drinking." Do you at all consider whether that is a suitable certificate to give?—I think so. "Recovering from alcohol" or "to some extent under the influence of drink," or "has evidently been drinking, but I can hardly say he was drunk," is constantly all that a medical man can say on what he sees before him. He cannot attach a definite meaning to what is really an indefinite term—the term "drunk."

48987. Quite so, but it might be better for him to state that he cannot say whether he is then drunk or sober, and not go into what is more a question of other evidence as to whether a man has been drinking?—I think it is fair that he should state that.

48988. You think it is the duty of the medical man to state what he thinks?—Yes.

48989. Of course, if he were giving evidence, but I am dealing with the question of putting it on a certificate?—He is called to certify as to the degree of alcoholic intoxication. He certifies a mild degree by these sorts of phrases, does he not?

48990. Why do you say he is called to certify as to the degree?—I should not have said that. He is called to examine the person with regard to alcohol intoxication—not to certify.

48991. This is a case in which he cannot say the man is under alcoholic intoxication. I am putting the case where there is a certificate such as we have seen, "Not drunk, but has been drinking." That is a case where so far as intoxication at the moment goes it is non-existent?—I think he certainly ought to state that.

48992. But the phrase "drinking" may mean two things. It may mean he has been drunk. If he had to say "Recovering from drink" that is a different thing to saying he has been drinking?—I do not see how a medical man can put an entry in the Occurrence Book saying that a person was recovering from drunkenness if he had not seen him in that condition. That would be going a great deal too far.

48993. That is the case that has been put to you all this morning—recovering from excessive drinking?—I say that the word "excessive" is too strong, as I said before.

48994. Do you think the medical certificate ought to be more definite or not? You say in your proof that some of your Superintendents and Inspectors think so?—They would like the positive word put down—"drunk" or "sober"—very often, but what I point out to them is that over and over again it is wholly impossible. You cannot do that. You cannot conscientiously do it.

48995. (Mr. Whitmore.) It might be a matter of individual opinion or judgment?—It must be, and individual judgments on such a point must, within limits, vary.

48996. (Mr. Dickinson.) What is your suggestion in the last paragraph of your statement with regard to another form of question being put?—Over and over again a precise answer, if the question were put from the Bench, would be returned to a question like that. I know from conversation with Magistrates that some of them habitually do that so as to arrive at a conclusion. That is for the Bench, and not for the medical man.

48997. That is a question which is put to you when you are giving evidence?—Yes.

48998. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) In the nature of a special verdict from which the Court would infer whether the man was drunk or sober.

48999. (Mr. Dickinson.) That is where you are called to give evidence?—Yes.

49000. I am concerning myself now with the question of the certificate. I suppose you would not suggest that the certificate should state whether the man was drunk or sober, but your suggested question is, "Was the man sufficiently drunk as to be unfit to be in charge of a cab?" and so on?—That is, of course, referring to a question being put from the Bench, but the police station is not the bench.

Mr. C. T. Dent.
13 June 1907.

49001. (Chairman.) That is all we have to ask you, and the Commission are very much indebted to you for coming here and giving your evidence.

Dr. Horatio Nelson Hardy.

Dr. H. N. Hardy.

49002. (Chairman.) You are a Fellow of the Royal College of Surgeons, Edinburgh?—I am.

49003. And you were for 21 years Divisional Surgeon of Police at Dulwich?—That is so.

49004. I think you have now retired from the practice of your profession?—Yes.

49005. How many years experience have you had altogether?—Including the 21 years at Dulwich, 40.

49006. You have been good enough to say that you can give us some evidence as to the difficulties connected with cases of drunkenness?—Yes.

49007. As to coming to a decision on the question of whether a particular individual is drunk or not at the moment?—Yes.

49008. Will you please tell us what you have to say about that? Will you tell us what you consider amounts to drunkenness?—It is easy enough in the case of a person who is what is called dead drunk. There can be no mistake about it. He is lying probably quite insensible, and he does not answer when you speak to him, or move when he is wanted to, and probably he has considerable smell from his breath. If you examine his eyes you will find the pupils dilated; if you examine his tongue you will find that it is coated; and if he does manage to speak at all you find that he speaks thickly and indistinctly. It is not those cases that give much difficulty; it is the intermediate cases which are, I would prefer to say, "under the influence of liquor." I think there ought to be a third denomination. The police have only two—"drunk" or "sober"—and one is compelled to pronounce either the one or the other in all cases. I think there should be an intermediate one, "under the influence of drink." That particularly would apply in cases where men, for instance, are in charge of a horse and cart or of a cab —cab-drivers—or in any other position of responsibility in which it is important that they should have all their faculties about them. It also would apply, of course, to the police themselves. Twice in the course of the 21 years I was called upon to examine the police. In the first instance, which happened shortly after I was appointed, I said to the Inspector in the case, "The man is not much under the influence of drink; I cannot detect very much sign of it." I mean I called the Inspector aside and told him this. He said, "Well, sir, the man is in the usual way a very civil and obliging man, but he has been most rough and rude," and he put it to me in this way: "Will you take the responsibility of sending him out on his beat?" I said, "No, I will not." In that which was a doubtful case I had to pronounce the man drunk when he was not very deeply under the influence of liquor. He was able to bear most of the ordinary tests, but, of course, when the question was put to me in that way I had no hesitation in giving a reply. I could not take the responsibility of sending him out on his beat when the Inspector had detected a difference between his ordinary behaviour and that which I saw.

49009. Did it not occur to you that it was a somewhat strange proceeding for you to have that conversation with the Inspector apart from the prisoner?—No, it did not, because I wanted to get all the information I could about the case, and I did not think it fair to have that before the man himself.

49010. Yes, but what I gather is that when the Divisional Surgeon is sent for in a case of this kind he, as an expert and scientific observer on the question of drink, has to give a specific answer to the question whether a man is drunk or sober?—Certainly; but every expert has the right to gain all the information he can about the case; and the Inspector was practically pointing out to me some material evidence which I had overlooked or with which I was not acquainted.

49011. The Inspector told you that. You assumed the truth of what the Inspector said, did you not?—Certainly I did.

49012. But of course you are perfectly aware that when the matter comes before a court of justice the truth of the statement made by a witness is not assumed?—Yes, I know that.

49013. Then you wrote something in the Occurrence Book on that occasion?—No, I did not.

49014. You did not happen to do that in that case, but you expressed a judgment?—I expressed a judgment.

49015. And that judgment was not formed simply upon the actual observation of the condition of the accused person, but partly upon information, which might have been false, given to you by the Inspector? —Quite so. I should not have acted upon that information had it not been that I considered the important duties the man had to perform.

49016. Which man?—The policeman who was about to be sent out on his beat. I considered that that overweighed any other consideration in the matter.

49017. That, I gather, was a case in which the Inspector had to decide whether he would send the constable on his beat or not?—Yes.

49018. That is not quite the same case, is it, as the case of an ordinary citizen who had been charged by a constable with being drunk?—No, it is not.

49019. What was your practice in that class of case when you were called in to see a man who was charged before the Inspector with having been drunk and disorderly?—My practice in that class of case was to form, as far as I could, an independent opinion—to listen to both sides, and to form an individual opinion. One of the cases I was going to bring before you to-day was a case in which a brewer's drayman had been charged with being drunk. He had run over a man about 5 o'clock in the afternoon. About 7 o'clock I was sent for to the station, and I found him there charged with being drunk. I examined him carefully, and I heard all the circumstances of the case—that he had run over someone, that this man was injured, and that he was going to be charged not only with being drunk, but with injuring someone during a state of drunkenness. I examined him carefully, and I could not find any evidence whatever of drunkenness in that man. The Inspector then said to me—(it is not an uncommon thing for us to obtain information from the Inspectors, because we do not simply go and look at a person and form our opinion from that, but we get all the information we can)—"Well, sir, an hour ago when he was brought in he was in a very different condition." I said, "Why was I not sent for then?" He said, "I was waiting to see the condition of the wounded man." The result was he was brought up the next day at the police court and charged; I was not there, and he was remanded for my attendance. I was not asked to go there. We are not asked to go there on the first occasion, as a rule, until the Magistrate sees whether it is likely to be a case for committal. On the second remand I attended, and although the Magistrate was fully prepared to commit on the evidence he had heard, as soon as I told him my opinion that the man was not drunk when I saw him he at once discharged him.

49020. Your view seems to be that when you were called in it was right to listen to both sides?—Certainly. I always do.

49021. Why was that? Were you not anticipating the duty of the Magistrate in doing that?—No. I am using my own faculties to arrive at a true conclusion about the matter.

49022. I do not know. No doubt you were using your own faculties—not your own faculties as a Surgeon, but faculties which you in common with the Magistrate, and other persons, possessed?—Quite so.

49023. In this case, I understand, in forming a judgment whether a man was drunk or sober at 7 o'clock when you were called in, you heard, as you say, both sides?—Yes.

49024. You listened to what the Inspector said?—Certainly.

49025. Did it occur to you that what the Inspector said might be false? I am not suggesting it was?—No, I do not know that it did in that case, because he was an Inspector that I had every confidence in.

49026. I know, but you see what is in my mind?—Yes, I do.

49027. If you, as a doctor, when called in, go and collect evidence, or listen to statements made not only by your patient but by other persons, and although those statements may be false you assume them to be true, you are doing something more than a doctor should do. You are performing the functions of a Judge as well, are you not?—No, except with regard to the particular matter that was before me. I am not saying whether the man should be brought up before the Magistrate or not. I have not to decide that. All that I have to decide (and that I have to decide, I think, on getting all the evidence I can) is whether the man is drunk at that particular time. That is not a judicial decision, because I am not a Judge.

49028. I do not know. Let us just see whether it is not a judicial decision. Possibly it is not strictly a judicial decision, but is it not very like a judicial decision?—Certainly not; and that is what happens on every occasion.

49029. But my suggestion to you is that the true course is for you, as a scientific man, to apply yourself to a scientific test alone, or to an observation of the patient as he is before you, without listening to any statement made by anybody else as to how he had been at any other time?—My view is that we ought to get all the information we can from any source whatever.

49030. Very well. I will give you a case. Supposing I am walking along a London street, and I see a man coming out of a public-house, he is 50 yards away, he staggers, and walks into a lamp post, I should come to the conclusion that that man was probably drunk. You would come to the same conclusion, would you not?—No, not after my experience without further investigation.

49031. You are toying with it. Would you not think if you saw a man coming out of a public-house and walking along the street and staggering, it was very likely that he had been drinking?—Very likely; but if you ask me as a doctor whether I should come to that conclusion or not ——

49032. As a doctor you would not come to any such conclusion?—Certainly not. I would require more evidence.

49033. Of course you would require more evidence. You admit, at any rate, it is very likely he would be drunk?—It would not be at all improbable.

49034. Now let us transfer ourselves to a glacier in Switzerland. If you saw a man 50 yards off staggering you would think it was probably not due to drink, I suppose?—It depends on whether there is any public-house near.

49035. Please do not trifle with the question. I have given you a glacier in Switzerland. Perhaps I had better tell you what a glacier is?—No, it is not necessary, but there are some houses of refreshment not far from the glaciers in Switzerland.

49036. I will put it more particularly then if you want me to do so. A man is on a glacier four miles from any human habitation whatever, and he is walking and staggering, and falls. It may be that he is drunk, I suppose?—I should say, without knowing further, he may be.

49037. It might also be the case that he was not drunk?—Quite so.

49038. Putting the two cases together, it is very much more likely that a man coming out of a public-house staggering would be drunk than a man staggering and falling on a glacier, I suppose, would be drunk?—Certainly not.

49039. But supposing the question became important as to whether the man was or was not drunk, would you not have to apply, if you were called in as a scientific man, the same test in both cases?—I do not think so.

49040. You would apply quite different tests?—In the first case, of course, a man coming out of a public-house, you naturally would think of his being under the influence of liquor, but in the case of a man slipping on a glacier no such thought would enter into one's mind, and one's first idea would be to see where he had slipped unless the question of drunkenness was suggested.

49041. It is suggested. That is exactly what I have suggested to you. Supposing you were asked whether he was or was not drunk, what would you do?—If there was someone there who suggested that the man might be drunk——

49042. I am not there, but I am suggesting it. What test would you apply?—I should look first at his eyes, then I should look at his tongue, then I should hear him speak, and then I should see him walk, not on a glacier but on a flat surface; and if he passed through those tests satisfactorily I should conclude it was the glacier and not drink that had caused his falling.

49043. Are not those very much the tests you would apply to a man whom you saw staggering out of a public-house?—Yes, to a large extent they are.

49044. Then I was right after all. Scientifically considered, you apply the same tests to those very different cases?—Of course that means that staggering is only one symptom, and no one with any common sense depends on it alone.

49045. I do not want to have any conflict of opinion, even with you, but what I am suggesting to you is that if a Divisional Surgeon is asked whether a man is drunk or sober, he is asked a scientific question, and that he ought to apply his mind to that and never mind what a constable or anybody else says to him?—But, with great respect, I venture to think we have a right to get all the truth we can about a case before we come to a conclusion on the matter.

49046. It did not matter in the two very extreme cases I put to you, because when I asked you what your own judgment would be, you practically admitted that the fact that a man was on a glacier, in the one case, and a man staggering from a public-house in the other case, were quite irrelevant?—No, I do not think I admitted that at all, excuse me. It was only when you said that you or someone else might suggest that it was drink. I started by saying that a man slipping on a glacier would not for a moment——

49047. I did not say "slipping." That is your word. I said he staggered and fell. The word "slipping" was introduced by you?—Yes, and I adhere to it. I think the probability is that the conclusion most people would come to would be that the man had slipped on the glacier.

49048. I should have thought being in a rarified atmosphere the man might have fainted?—A great many things might happen, of course.

49049. I should not suppose the man slipped if I did not see him slip?—I should, if he was on a glacier and fell.

49050. I am not prepared to say that you are wrong, but, at any rate, you think when you are called in as a Divisional Surgeon to testify as to the condition of a prisoner you have a right to gather all the information you can about him?—Certainly.

49051. That is your view?—That is my view.

49052. Then you admit that your judgment is not based on scientific data only?—I think any information one gets like that may be just as scientific as any other.

49053. A scientific datum, as we all know, is a thing that must be admitted to be true for the purpose of the argument, and you have said it is possible the Inspector may have made a false statement?—Yes.

49054. If the data upon which you form a judgment include the statement of the Inspector, then you are going beyond the range of scientific data, because it is impossible that they can be false?—Yes.

49055. That was a case you were giving by way of illustration in answer to my question?—That case illustrates another point. There is not one point of examination, or, as you might call it if you like, scientific data, which is to be depended upon. The only point that I could find in that man's case that was at all suspicious was that the man spoke thickly. He had a "burr" in his speech. I thought at the time, and I found it was correct afterwards, that it was his native "burr." He came from Somersetshire, and in the police court I found that he spoke in just the same way as he had spoken on that night. That, in many cases, is one important point; but it was not, I thought, sufficient to decide that the man was under the influence of drink. When I afterwards found that he had come from Somersetshire, I was quite satisfied that drink had not caused it.

49056. In that case did you attend the police court?—Yes.

49057. What happened there?—As soon as I gave my evidence the Magistrate dismissed the case. The Magistrate had not been made acquainted with my opinion before.

49058. You said you thought the man was sober, I suppose?—No; I said he was not drunk.

49059. I understand the point of the case to be that, although the prisoner may have been drunk or under the influence of drink at 5 o'clock when the accident happened, you only saw him two hours afterwards, and you could not be sure then?—Yes, that was the point of the case.

49060. You say two hours, from 5 to 7. At what time do you think you ought to have been called in in order that your opinion might have been given with certainty, or with as much certainty as the circumstances would permit of?—I can only say, relying on the Inspector's account, if I may, that if I had been called in an hour previously the man was then in a very different condition, and was showing signs of being under the influence of drink.

49061. Let me put it in this way. Assuming that the man was drunk at 5 o'clock, that he was not incapable, that he was not in a state of coma, or anything of that kind, but that he was so far removed from his ordinary and normal condition as to be undoubtedly drunk at 5 o'clock, how long do you think in that case (you may perhaps remember it perfectly) would the effect of the drink last so as to be observable?—That is a very difficult question to answer, because the mere fact of being taken to a police station and being subjected to questions and that sort of thing will rouse a man up very much. Of course, it also depends on how much the man has been under the influence of drink.

49062. Put it as nearly as possible in the middle between complete sobriety on the one side and coma on the other?—I doubt if it would be much longer than an hour.

49063. (Mr. Whitmore.) Before the obvious signs of drink had worn off?—Yes.

49064. (Chairman.) Then you saw him at 7?—A little after 7—a quarter past 7.

49065. Your view, after listening to the story of the Inspector as to his condition at 5 o'clock, was that you could not say with absolute certainty that he had been drunk at 5 o'clock?—No, certainly not. I do not consider that it was my duty to say what he was at 5 o'clock. I can only swear to what I myself observe.

49066. I do not in the least dissent from that view, I was only asking you the question as you are an expert witness. In that case two hours after the man had been brought to the station you could not be sure whether he had been drunk at 5 o'clock or not?—No, certainly not.

49067. You say the only symptom that suggested drunkenness at 7 o'clock was thickness of speech?—Yes.

49068. Did you examine his eyes?—I did.

49069. What was the condition of his eyes?—The pupils were not dilated and the conjunctiva was not congested.

49070. That means that the eyes were not blood-shot?—Yes, they were not blood-shot.

49071. There was no other sign?—No. I examined his tongue also, and his tongue was not furred. I made him walk up and down, and he could do so quite right.

49072. Do you attach much importance to dilatation of the eyes in this class of case?—Yes, I do, a good deal. The only thing is, of course, it is liable to be brought about by disease. It is not an infallible sign, and none of these signs are, because you may get dilatation of the pupils in cases of disea e, or if the person happened to be at a hospital a day or two before and had had belladonna put into the eyes the pupils would be dilated.

49073. I do not suppose that the mere fact that the pupil looked very large, or that the eye was dilated, is so very important. Is not the only thing that is important in reference to the condition of a patient to see whether it answers to light?—Yes, and it would not if it was due to drunkenness, neither would it if it was dilated by belladonna.

49074. I can understand the belladonna case, but you say if a man is under the influence of alcohol, and his pupils are dilated, or seem to you larger than the pupils would presumably be in a normal condition, if you put a light close to the eye you would expect there to be no closing?—They do not close.

49075. Supposing you put a man through a very severe test. You put this man, I think, to a severe test?—I put this man to a sufficient test, I should have thought.

49076. Was there any other test you could have put him through?—There was the test of making him shut his eyes and put his feet together and twirling round.

49077. Did you ask him to do that?—No, I did not. I do not consider it a fair test.

49078. Because I suppose a good many men who are perfectly sober could not do it correctly?—No; some men would do it very clumsily, but if a man had been accustomed to athletics he would do it all right. Then there is another thing; if the man happens to be suffering from any spinal disease he could not do it at all.

49079. But supposing in the case of that man you had applied that test, and he had shut his eyes, or you had bandaged his eyes, and then he had put his feet together, and turned round, and he had done the experiment correctly, what conclusion would you have drawn from that?—It would only have confirmed my previous opinion that he was not under the influence of drink.

49080. Would it in your opinion have made it absolutely certain that he was sober at 5 o'clock?—No, I do not think it would. No, not at all, because the effect of the alcohol on the spinal cord, which is the essence of that test, might have sufficiently passed away the same as the other signs. There have been no scientific tests to ascertain how long alcohol retains its operation upon either the brain or the spinal cord, and therefore I, for myself, would never say what the condition of a man had been two hours before.

49081. So that the mere severity of this test would not afford any indication in your judgment of the condition of the man two hours before?—Nothing whatever.

49082. If the other signs showed that he had been drunk two hours before?—Yes. The absence of it would not certainly prove to my mind that it would not have acted differently two hours previously.

49084. Supposing a man is strong and healthy, and as far as one can tell he is not suffering from spinal disease, if he could perform this experiment, I will call it, nobody would think he was drunk?—I should only take it as one item. I do not think there is any one of the signs of drink which is to be considered infallible. Now, you know, we are not discussing a man who is dead drunk—in a state of comatose. We are thinking of the intermediate stages which graduate off from it, some of them, on the one hand, approaching very closely to soberness, and others, on the other hand, approaching to incapacity.

49085. During the examination of one of the cases that came before us, Dr. Ivor Davis gave evidence that he put a man to a test who came to him at 3.30 in the morning. This is what Dr. Ivor Davis said: "I made a very exhaustive examination. I commenced with the eyes. I saw there was nothing unusual in the eyes. They acted to light and they were not dilated. There was a little congestion of the mucous fibres, but you may have that at any time"?—Excuse me, but that is one of the things which one does look for—that congestion of the eyes.

49086. I quite follow. I will read the doctor's answer: "There was a little congestion of the mucous fibres, but you may have that at any time. You may take a dozen men in this room, and you would see a little congestion in the whites of their eyes. I examined the eyes, and I found them quite normal, and also the pupils; in fact, the whole eye was normal—both eyes. Then I examined the breath, and I could detect no fumes of whisky or of any spirits. I inquired if he had been sick, or if he had been feeling sick, and he told me no. I then examined his hands with a paper held between the fingers, to see whether there was any tremor of the hand or of the arm. There was none. I also got him to put his two feet together, then close his eyes, and then turn round in a circle as on a pivot. He did that perfectly. I then got him to walk, and he walked perfectly straight. His pulse was normal. I think it was said in the police court that he lisped, but that is likely to occur to anyone at any time who is excited. Again, there is a most important point, and that is this. I got him to repeat sentences after me, and also to pronounce very difficult words, which he did perfectly. All through I had conversational remarks with him, and I came to the conclusion that he was not under the influence of drink." Does that commend itself to you as a sound judgment?—Yes, so far as you have gone.

49087. That is not quite an answer to my question. You may read it if you like?—No, thank you. I heard something of it, and I understand that Dr. Davis came to the conclusion that that man had not been drunk two or three hours before.

49088. I have not come to that. I am proceeding by steps?—That he was not drunk then—yes.

49089. I may tell you that is common ground, because another doctor attended and said the man was not drunk an hour before. So far there was no dispute. I only wanted your opinion?—I quite agree.

49090. Then one of my honourable colleagues asked the same witness later on: "You have told us that there was no indication of their having been drunk two hours before. Take the time we have in this case, namely, from 11.30 to 12.10. Was it possible at the time you saw either of these gentlemen that they could have been drunk between 11.30 and 12.10? (A.) They could not possibly have been." What do you think of that?—I think it is altogether incorrect.

49091. "Altogether incorrect." That means it is impossible they could have been sober?—No, excuse me. I say the opinion in my judgment is not warranted by the evidence which the doctor had.

49092. Again I do not think you are quite answering my question, at least not, I think, in the sense that you really mean. You say the answer was not warranted by the evidence?—By the evidence he had before him.

49093. I suppose what you mean by that is he was speaking too positively?—No, I mean more than that—that he was not warranted in going so far as he did.

49094. (Mr. Whitmore.) You mean it is not impossible that they might have been drunk?—Yes.

49095. (Chairman.) What Dr. Davis says is they could not possibly have been drunk?—I do not agree with him. That is all.

49096. Do you think it possible they may have been drunk?—Yes.

49097. Do you think it possible they may have been sober?—Yes.

49098. Do you mean to say, the gentleman having stood all the very severe tests to which Dr. Ivor Davis subjected him, that no inference can be drawn from that as to his condition at midnight?—Yes, that is my opinion.

49099. You think the man might have been drunk at midnight and pretty drunk too?—I did not say anything about that. "Drunk" is an indefinite expression.

49100. Very indefinite, and therefore I am not quite sure what the correct interpretation of your answer is. I must put it to you again. This person was subjected to a very severe test at half-past three in the morning?—Yes.

49101. It is perfectly clear he was sober then?—Yes.

49102. You say that no inference at all can be drawn as to his condition at midnight from the result of that examination?—The only inference that I myself could draw, and I can only answer for myself, is this—the strong probability is that the man was not dead drunk at midnight, because if he had been dead drunk I should have expected to find him asleep.

49103. If he had taken such a quantity of liquor as to make him insensible, incapable of walking or of moving his limbs in the ordinary way at all, then you think he could not have recovered sufficiently to stand these tests three hours afterwards?—That is so. I should have expected to find him asleep.

49104. Then take the intermediate condition?—There are so many intermediate conditions that I myself would not feel justified in swearing anything as to his condition three hours previous.

49105. You would not have felt justified upon such an examination as I have just read to you in certifying that the person in question had been drinking excessively, or anything of that kind?—Certainly not, I should not certify in one direction nor in the other.

49106. I think I quite understand your position with regard to that. About an hour before the examination by Dr. Davis the same person was examined by Dr. Mitchell, the Divisional Surgeon at Vine Street. This is what he said: "What did you find upon your examination of these gentlemen that led you to form the conclusion which you state in your certificate?" (A) "I examined them as to gait, and found it perfectly steady; the expression was intelligent, the voice in either case was not thick, and they did not stammer or hesitate, and I therefore came to the conclusion that they were sober; but when I examined their eyes I found the pupils still dilated." I do not know what the doctor means by still dilated, so I think we must eliminate that word, because this is the very first time he had seen them. "I found the pupils dilated, their lips parched, and their breath distinctly smelling of drink, and therefore I concluded"—something. What would you have concluded from that as to their condition, say, at 12 o'clock?—I should have concluded that they had probably been under the influence of drink at 12 o'clock.

49107. This is at half-past two in the morning, I put to you, and the crucial time is midnight?—I do not consider it is safe to form any opinion whatever at a definite hour as to what condition a man was in two and a half hours before.

49108. That is your view?—That is my view.

49109. That is what in substance you have told us before in the case of the carman you mentioned?—Yes.

49110. What Dr. Mitchell says is (I have really got his answer down in the word "drunk")—"and therefore I concluded that they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking." According to you that is not a sound judgment?—I did not say so.

49111. Dr. Mitchell said: "And therefore I concluded that they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking"?—At the time he saw them.

49112. Yes. At the time he saw them (half-past two) they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking?—It seems to me that is a very different thing from pronouncing what their condition was at 12 o'clock.

49113. I fail to see that. If a man drinks excessively he becomes drunk, does he not?—They might have drunk excessively at one o'clock. All that Dr. Mitchell pronounces is that they were at the time he saw them recovering from drink.

49114. Yes?—That, it seems to me, does not pronounce any opinion as to what their condition was at 12 o'clock. It is a different thing altogether it seems to me.

49115. Do you mean they might have had delirium tremens a week before?—I did not know there was any question of delirium tremens.

49116. I did not say so. I am only trying to find out what is in your mind about this, as you are good enough to come and help us here?—What I said was that Dr. Mitchell said that they appeared to him at half-past two to be recovering from drink. That, it seems to me, does not pronounce any opinion as to what their condition was at 12 o'clock.

49117. Then you think Dr. Mitchell would be quite justified in saying they had been drinking and were drunk at one o'clock. Is that what you mean?—No. What I mean is they might have taken drink at any time between 12 o'clock and half-past two when Dr. Mitchell saw them. All he says is that they were recovering from drink. He does not specify the time at which they had the drink, and he certainly does not specify what condition they were in at 12 o'clock.

Dr. H. N. Hardy.

13 June 1907.

49118. I am afraid instead of applying your mind to my question you are rather seeking to defend Dr. Mitchell?—Not in the least; I am merely answering the question that I understood you to put to me, and your observations on my reply. I can only hear what you tell me that Dr. Mitchell said, and it does not seem to me that that bears out the idea that he pronounced anything about their condition at 12 o'clock.

49119. Then I must read you the certificate: "I examined at 2.30 a.m. Maurice A. Gerothwohl and found him recovering from the effects of excessive drinking. I think he is not now drunk." That is the form of judgment which Dr. Mitchell entered in the Occurrence Book?—At 2.30.?

49120. At 2.30., and he told us here (of course he did not put that in the certificate or in the entry in the Occurrence Book), "I examined him as to gait and found him perfectly steady." Then he goes on to say, "When I examined their eyes I found the pupils still dilated"—he had not seen the gentlemen before—"I found their lips parched, and their breath distinctly smelling of drink." Dr. Mitchell gave that certificate?—Yes, but I cannot see what bearing that has on their condition at 12 o'clock.

49121. Surely if at 2.30 they still showed signs of recovering from excessive drinking it points to the inference that they may have been drunk at 12 o'clock, does it not?—Or they may have been drinking in the meantime. You may make any inference you like from it.

49122. But as a matter of fact they were arrested at 12.15, and Dr. Mitchell evidently knew that, but that, again, is not expressly relevant to the question I am asking you. I might mention to you that these men were taken into custody a few minutes after 12 o'clock?—And remained in custody.

49123. They were charged at Vine Street at 12.15, and they remained in the cells until 2.30?—That makes all the difference.

49124. There was no opportunity for them to drink, or anything of the sort?—Then that would seem to indicate that Dr. Mitchell considered they were still under the influence of drink, for which they had been taken into custody at 12 o'clock.

49125. Therefore the inference is that they must have been drinking excessively before 12.15?—Quite so.

49126. Do you think that was a just and sound inference for a medical man to draw?—I think if he finds signs which seem to him conclusive as to excessive drinking——

49127. I have read you what the signs were—pupils dilated, lips parched, and breath distinctly smelling of drink. The point is, of course, on the word "excessive." You have told me that Dr. Davis' statement that they could not have been drunk at 12 o'clock was not warranted. Do you not think you might say (it is for you to answer the question) that Dr. Mitchell's statement that they were recovering from the effects of excessive drinking was equally unwarranted?—There is a difference, you know, because Dr. Mitchell found some symptoms attributable to drink. Dr. Davis found none. It is always a very difficult thing to prove a negative; but if you have any positive signs such as you are accustomed to see when the drink fit is passing off, I think Dr. Mitchell would be justified in giving that very qualified certificate which he gave.

49128. I do not think there is any qualification about it?—"Recovering from the effects of excessive drinking," you know, "but not drunk." That is a very qualified certificate.

49129. Of course, if you come to the construction of the certificate, it is perfectly clear that what he meant by excessive drinking was that they had been drinking, but he puts in the word "now"—"Is not now drunk"?—No magistrate would, I think, convict, on a certificate like that, a man of being drunk, or could convict him. Therefore, I call it a modified certificate.

49130. That is not an issue for us. I should have thought, however, that that certificate was rather in favour of the police than the prisoner in a case of that kind. You think the contrary?—I think it in favour of the prisoner, because, you see, for the police it is either "drunk" or "sober," and he definitely pronounces that the man was not drunk at the time he saw him.

49131. That, of course, is a question for the magistrate?—Exactly.

49132. That is not the point that has been in my mind?—I daresay not, but that is the object of giving these certificates.

49134. And he expresses his opinion in the certificate in that way, and he was making, as he thought, a careful certificate. The words "Not now drunk" seem to show that they were not then drunk, but that they had been drunk before. The point I am putting to you is this. Was that a sound judgment for a man to come to? It was at 2.30, two and a half hours after midnight. Supposing you had been asked to examine the man, and the constable, pointing to the man, said to you, "I am told that man was drunk at 12 o'clock, will you kindly look at him and tell me what is his condition now," would you have given that certificate?—I do not know that I should.

49135. You might say, "Not drunk. I cannot say whether he was drunk or not at 12 o'clock"?—That is probably what I should have said.

49136. That would have been absolutely sound?—That would have been my conclusion in the matter.

49137. Then you think it was a risky thing to call on Dr. Mitchell to say that he had been suffering from the effects of excessive drinking?—I should not like to say.

49138. There seems to be some too subtle distinction in your mind for me?—We do find cases where men are just recovering from drink. If, as in this case, he had been some time in the police station, he would have had time to recover partially from the drink.

49139. Of course he would. That is common ground. The point is, was Dr. Mitchell, in your judgment, right in adding to his certificate that the men showed signs that they had been drunk at 12 o'clock, for that is, in substance, what he says?—I do not read that into his certificate.

49140. I do. The certificate is "Not drunk now; recovering from the effects of excessive drinking." Put those two together, and it seems they had been drunk some time before. Do you think that is a sound judgment for a medical practitioner to embody in his certificate?—I think it is. Of course, each Divisional Surgeon forms his own conclusion on these matters. There are no abstract rules which we can apply, and there is no person or body who can help us in any way, but each man has to form his own conclusion, and Dr. Mitchell is one of the most experienced Divisional Surgeons, especially on this particular matter, because he sees a great many more drunken people than any Divisional Surgeon, and I should hesitate to criticise any statement that Dr. Mitchell made.

49141. You have come here to help the Commission, and I am bound to ask you this question?—I am quite willing to help the Commission if I can.

49142. If I may say so, I think you have answered my questions very carefully. I believe you have some suggestions to make as to the improvement of the medical service, have you not?—Yes. There was one case I wanted to mention to you, and that was one of those cases that was constantly giving rise to the heading in a certain class of the press of "Drunk or Dying." I was called to see a man who had fallen down and hurt his head in the evening, and was then noisily drunk. I stitched up a superficial wound at the back of his head, during the whole of which time he kept making a great noise, and talking excitedly, and I left him there comfortable. The next morning I was sent for about 7 o'clock in the morning—between 6 and 7 o'clock—and I was told he had wakened up, and asked for some tea, and when the tea was brought to him he was not able to drink it, and he lapsed into insensibility. His son then arrived. I examined both on the previous and on this occasion in the morning for any fracture of the skull, which sometimes does take place with these falls when people are drunk, and I could find no evidence whatever. The son had come to bail him out, so I allowed him to be taken home on a police ambulance, and told the son he would require medical attendance. The son took him home. We afterwards heard that the man had been taken to the hospital, operated on unsuccessfully, and died two or three days afterwards. The police authorities thought it likely that the police action would be blamed in the matter, so they asked me to attend the inquest, although the Coroner did not summon me. Part of the evidence was that the man was insured, and it was endeavoured to be proved that he was a very sober man. His wife and other relatives gave evidence that they had never seen him drunk, and so on. This was in order to save the insurance. They tried to make out a case that he had not been drunk at all. However, after I gave evidence in the matter, the counsel who was engaged in the case, and who has since, I might state, become one of the Metropolitan Police magistrates, said that he could not ask the jury to blame the police in any way for their action. Of course, every care had been taken of the man as far as we could do so. It appeared that the man had had a fracture of the skull. He had fallen down, and besides this superficial wound which I had dressed, there was a fracture of the skull, from which he ultimately died. There you have what one might call a combination of "Drunk and dying," because he did ultimately die, but, of course, through no fault of ours, and every care was taken of him that could be taken.

49143. What did the post mortem show?—The post mortem showed that his organs were diseased in the way they usually are with drunkards.

49144. I do not ask you about that case, but I think it is a good illustration. With regard to your suggestion as to the improvement of the medical service, what have you to say?—In all these doubtful cases of drunkenness I think the Divisional Surgeon ought to have the opportunity of calling in a consultant, someone who has had already considerable practice in similar matters—for instance, anyone who has been for 10 years or so engaged in police work, which is altogether apart from the ordinary medical or surgical work. There are about 150 Police Surgeons over the metropolitan area, and each Police Surgeon has to learn for himself. I thought it might be of interest, so I have brought with me the instructions that are issued by the Metropolitan Police. This happens to be one issued in Sir Edmund Henderson's time. These are all the instructions that we get. I will hand it in. (The instructions were handed in.) Then in Sir Charles Warren's time they were increased.

49145. We have them in the White Book?—All I want you to see is that in none of them is there anything dealing with this subject of drunkenness. There is no help whatever for the Divisional Surgeon, even when he is just appointed, as to calling anyone in. The practice is that a prisoner, if he has the money, may call in a doctor to examine him, and then the Divisional Surgeon is also called in. Then you always get the fact that the doctor called in by the prisoner becomes at once an advocate. He is there to prove, if he can, that the prisoner was not drunk. That is no help at all to the Divisional Surgeon, and he wants someone who has, if possible, more experience than he himself has; and I think that could be improved by having a number of those who have already served as Police Surgeons in the A B C Divisions of the Metropolitan Police, with whom it could be arranged that they should be called in to any doubtful case.

49146. (Mr. Whitmore.) Dr. Dent told us that soon after his appointment he convened a conference of Divisional Surgeons of Police?—Yes, I was there.

49147. There was no practical outcome of that conference?—None whatever.

49148. I gather you think it would be desirable to have some uniform practice adopted amongst all the Divisional Surgeons in testing cases of alleged drunkenness?—Precisely.

49149. You do not think it would be impossible to arrive at a uniform practice?—Not in the least: I think it could be done quite easily if a little organisation were introduced into the medical service of the police.

49150. Would it not be a good thing that at such a conference as Dr. Dent referred to the question of what form your certificates should take should be considered?—Yes.

49151. Adopting your suggestion that there should be some third alternative intermediate to the description of "drunk" or "sober"?—I am very strongly of opinion that that would facilitate matters greatly. There is a second suggestion that I have put down in my paper, which would bear out what you ask me about, and that is that if a number of these consultants were appointed for the different districts of the police, a dozen or so of them should meet periodically at Scotland Yard in order to consult together about such questions as what were the proper tests for drunkenness, and what was the proper form of certificate, and all that.

49152. Then there is another point. We have had a case, which is not an uncommon one, of a man being charged with being drunk and disorderly at 12 o'clock, or with being drunk at 12 o'clock, and he is actually examined two or three hours afterwards. I think I may take it that the result of your evidence is that it is a very hazardous thing for any doctor to form a positive opinion from the symptoms at two or three o'clock in the morning as to what was the actual state of the man at 12 o'clock?—Absolutely.

49153. Then what do you say should be the form of certificate? Should the doctor content himself absolutely with stating what the condition of the man was at that moment?—Yes.

49154. Although the real thing, from the Magistrate's point of view, is to ascertain what state he was in two hours before?—I think it a great mistake. I find this published in a book which is supposed to be for the guidance of Police Surgeons, and is said to be published under the authority of Sir Edward Henry and Mr. Clinton Dent: "It must in this connection be clearly borne in mind you are not called upon to decide if a man is drunk, but if he was drunk at the time of his arrest." I consider that is altogether erroneous. If it were not that those gentlemen's names are referred to in the preface as having assisted in it, it would be hardly worth while calling attention to it; but this is a Police Surgeon's guide, and I think it extremely unwise to publish anything like that, apparently on the authority of the Commissioner.

49155. (Chairman.) Where does that occur?—It is in a book which came under my notice while I was thinking of the evidence I should give.

49156. (Mr. Whitmore.) What is the date of it?—It is published this year. It is only just published, but it is the names of Sir Edward Henry and Mr. Dent that give importance to it. They are mentioned in the preface.

49157. (Chairman.) Police Surgeons' Emergency Guide, by C. Graham Grant, L.R.C.P., Divisional Surgeon to the Thames Division, Metropolitan Police?—In the preface you will see the names mentioned.

49158. (Mr. Whitmore.) In your experience, are Divisional Surgeons sent for with sufficient promptitude to examine cases of alleged drunkenness?—Yes, quite so.

49160. Do you think that the examination by the Divisional Surgeons ever conflicts with the examination by private doctors?—Yes, I suppose it does because, as I said just now, the private doctor brought in to the prisoner becomes actually an advocate. He has to do his best to prove that the man is not drunk, whereas the Divisional Surgeon, in my judgment, is sent for simply to decide fairly between the two parties. He takes neither side.

49161. I was only wondering whether, with your views, you could not do something to induce Mr. Clinton Dent to have another conference with a view to carrying out some of the suggestions which you have been good enough to make?—The conference would have no power. We tried it when Sir Charles Warren was Commissioner. We got together a Society of Police Surgeons, but Sir Charles Warren refused to recognise it in any shape or form. It has been going on more or less since, but it has no authority.

49162. Still, any conclusion they arrived at would be weighed by the Commissioner?—I do not think we found it so. We gave it up as a bad job.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Will you allow me to ask this gentleman just one or two questions?

(Chairman.) I do not think we must vary the procedure at the last moment, but perhaps you will suggest to me what question you wish to put.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I would suggest that if a Divisional Surgeon, when called in, can, by scientific examination at the time he sees the person in custody, assist the Magistrate by arriving at a conclusion as to what the condition of the person was as to drunkenness when arrested, he ought to do so. It strikes me as being somewhat analogous to a case of insanity, where very often scientific men have been called to prove that a person is perfectly sane, but from such and such symptoms he is able to say that at a certain time he was insane or is insane now. My submission is that the object of calling the Surgeon is to see the person charged with being drunk, and not to decide merely upon the question of what his state is now, but to assist, by scientific examination, if he can, the Magistrate in deciding the only question the Magistrate has to decide, namely, what was his state of drunkenness at the time of his arrest.

49163. (Chairman.) You have heard what Mr. Muir has said?—Yes.

49164. Do you assent to his view of the duty of Divisional Surgeons?—No, not at all.

49165. You do not agree with what Mr. Muir says?—No, I do not.

49166. In what respect do you disagree?—In the respect which I have already mentioned, that a Divisional Surgeon called in ought to give evidence as to what he ascertains at the time that he examines, and not as to what happened hours before.

49167. Yes, but a medical man is called upon to give "opinion" evidence, as we lawyers call it, sometimes?—Yes.

49168. You think that you, as a Divisional Surgeon, would be over-stepping the line of your duty if a Magistrate were to ask you to answer this question? Supposing the Magistrate asked whether, when you saw this man at such and such an hour, he was sober, and you said, "Yes," he was sober, then supposing the Magistrate asked you, "Did you notice anything about the man that led you to think he had been drinking too much two or three hours before?" would you give an answer to that question?—I think I should decline to pronounce. I do not think it would be fair to the prisoner to pronounce that against him.

49169. The rule that you take has been really pretty explicitly stated by you in your account of what you did in the carman's case that you mentioned?—Yes.

49170. That was a case where it was alleged by the Inspector that the man was quite drunk when brought in at five o'clock, and you saw the man at seven o'clock and you gave such evidence that the Magistrate dismissed the case?—Exactly.

49171. You do seem to have expressed an opinion as to the condition of the man at the time?—No, not at all.

49172. But you told the Magistrate you could not be certain from what you saw that he was drunk?—No, I did not. My evidence was that he was not drunk when I saw him. I did not express any opinion.

49173. You left the Magistrate to draw his own inference from that?

(Mr. R. D Muir.) May I say that the rules that were handed in are reproduced (I do not know whether they are the exact rules, but similar) at page 102 of the White Book—"Rules for the duties and remuneration of Divisional Surgeons." The question we are discussing are at page 99, and they take the shape of directions to the police. We have had those over and over again.

(Chairman.) Thank you.

FIFTY-EIGHTH DAY.

Tuesday, 18*th June* 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).

Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esq., K.C., M.P.

Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).

Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).

J. W. St. Lawrance Leslie, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).

J. F. Waley, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

IN CAMERA. Mr. Y's CASE. (Referred to as the A. B. Case).

18 June 1907.

(Chairman.) We have got Mr. Z here, the second witness called in this case, and you can cross-examine him, Mr. Bankes.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I am afraid I am not ready, Sir. There has been a misapprehension about this. I think a difficulty does arise owing to our not getting a more formal notice of what is going to happen. The only notice we have had about what is going to happen to-day is that you gave a private intimation to Mr. Muir that our witnesses were to be here. Of course, out of courtesy to the Commission those witnesses are here, but directly I was told of that I considered the matter fully with those who advise me, and we felt that our witnesses ought not to be asked to give their evidence until first of all you have decided whether you intend to proceed with this case or not.

(Chairman.) We have decided that. I stated that as clearly as I could. It is true that one or two observations were made at the table with regard to the matter, but I said the Commission had decided to take this case, which we call the A. B. case.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) That is quite true, but if you look at the Notes you will see a member of the Commission rather interposed, and then finally you said that you could not give any formal intimation at the time, but that you would have to discuss it.

(Chairman.) I gave a formal intimation at the close of Mr. Nelson Hardy's examination on Thursday to Mr. Muir. It was necessarily a private intimation, because the case had been taken in camera.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I did not understand you to say you had determined to go on with the case.

(Chairman.) Surely the very fact that I was asking for your witnesses indicated that.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I may be very stupid, but I did not so understand it.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) It would be a very simple thing for the Secretary to write us a notice—that does not affect the case being tried in camera—and then there can be no misunderstanding, but as long as there are messages of this kind there are sure to be misunderstandings.

(Chairman.) This was not a message. I called Mr. Muir up, and if it had been a case that we had been taking in open court I should have said it from the Bench. As we are taking this case in camera I could not without making it public make any observation. I therefore asked Mr. Muir to come up, and I told him, "We are going on with the A. B. case"—that is my recollection of what I said—"and you will have your witnesses here on Tuesday."

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Unfortunately I did not so understand it. All I understood you to say was, "Will you have your witnesses here on Tuesday. You know the kind of witnesses we want."

(Chairman.) I went further, and I said that we should want the three constables engaged in the arrest, and the inspector.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) They are here, I understand.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) We have them here, but you tell us now you have decided to proceed. Certainly Mr. Muir did not understand it, because he came to me at once.

(Mr. Whitmore.) I think I was the only other Commissioner present at the time. My recollection exactly corroborates what Mr. Muir has said only undoubtedly I and our Chairman intended to convey by what was said an intimation that we had made up our minds to proceed with the case. There were no words directly used.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It would be assumed from the fact that you were asking for the witnesses.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Mr. Muir clearly misunderstood it, because he came to me, and the result of the discussion was——

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It is a misunderstanding?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Yes.

(Chairman.) The Assistant Secretary, in the absence of the Secretary, did tell the clerk to make the usual communication to Mr. Muskett.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) We have not received it. All I ask is in order to avoid anything of the kind again that it should be put in the form of a letter.

(Chairman.) My intention was that a formal letter should be sent. Unfortunately the Secretary was away on Friday, and the Assistant Secretary did ask the clerk to give the usual intimation. I assumed it had been done.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I am sorry there has been a misapprehension.

(Chairman.) But I do not see how it matters, having regard to the character of this tribunal.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) My submission with regard to that is this. You have decided, I understand, to proceed, and having decided to proceed I ask that the Inquiry should be conducted in the way in which all the other cases have been inquired into—namely, that before our witnesses are called on to give any evidence we should have the opportunity of cross-examining the witnesses for the complainant.

(Chairman.) Mr. ———, we understand, will be here in the course of the day, and I understand the other witness, Mr. ———, has arrived.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I understand Mr. Bankes' difficulty. We are quite ready, as you have intimated, to allow cross-examination to proceed before the police witnesses are called, but the difficulty seems to be, as I follow what is said, that Mr. Bankes is not ready to cross-examine the witnesses if they are present.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) No, and for this reason. You will remember on the last occasion it was pointed out to us that we were not to make any inquiries until you formally intimated that the case was to be proceeded with.

(Chairman.) And Mr. Muir asked me, "Then we may make inquiries?" and I said, "Certainly, in this case."

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) What we understood was that you wanted the statement of those particular constables who are involved in the matter, and we have taken those.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Can it matter, under the circumstances? I do not see how any injustice is to be done to you if we proceed in this case and hear the witnesses whom you have here. You will be, I suppose, at a little disadvantage in their having heard what your witnesses say before you cross-examine. But it cuts both ways. In this case I do not see it matters very much.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I am very sorry I must object. I have considered the matter carefully, and I have taken instructions about it. My instructions are to object and not to proceed with the matter if the Commission take the course of examining our witnesses before we have an opportunity of cross-examining the complainant's witnesses.

(Chairman.) We have been trying to meet you. We are a Royal Commission, you know.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I am quite aware of that, Sir. I felt bound to say what the position was. I do not want to keep anything back.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) We have nothing to discuss. We will go on with the case in our own way.

(Chairman.) We will discuss the matter and ask you to retire; but before you retire will you repeat your proposition so that there is no doubt about it?

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) My proposition is this, that if you have decided to proceed with this case we ought to have the ordinary opportunity of cross-examining before our witnesses are examined.

(Chairman.) Under our procedure in each case we have reserved to ourselves the right to say whether we will or will not allow you to cross-examine particular witnesses. We have never laid down the doctrine that you are to cross-examine at any particular moment.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I am not suggesting you have, but I simply say that unless the opportunity is given us of cross-examining before our witnesses are called, and preparing for cross-examination, of course, my instructions are to withdraw.

(Chairman.) Perhaps you will all retire, and we will confer upon it.

(The room was cleared.)

(After some time the Counsel and parties were called in.)

(Chairman.) Continuing the conversation from the point at which it was broken off when the Commission desired to confer, I wish to call your attention, Mr. Eldon Bankes, to these observations of yours which appear on the shorthand notes: "We made some inquiries before we knew it was objected to, but you will intimate to us whether it is intended to proceed with the A. B. case, and directly you intimate to us that it is your intention to proceed with the A. B. case then I claim a free hand to get up our case in the ordinary way." The Commission are of opinion that that intimation was sufficiently given at the rising of the Court on Thursday. The Chairman informed Mr. Muir that the Commission would take the A. B. case on Tuesday, and that Mr. Muir should have his witnesses in attendance, and mentioned that he desired the attendance of the three police-constables concerned in the arrest, and the Inspector in the charge room. Mr. Muir assented, and said, "Then we may make inquiries," and the Chairman said, "Of course." The Clerk on the same day telephones to Mr. Muskett that the case would be continued on Tuesday. The answer was, "Very well. Mr. Muskett has a note of it." The Clerk again telephones to the same effect on Friday, and Mr. Muskett's Clerk replied that Mr. Muskett had the appointment entered in his diary. To-day the witnesses Mr. Y and Mr. Z are in attendance, and if Mr. Eldon Bankes applies for leave to cross-examine them, or either of them, the Commission give him liberty to do so. The witness ——— is engaged to go on a tour for six weeks or more, and cannot come back for cross-examination till after the tour is finished and after the probable close of our inquiry. ——— has come back from Paris especially for to-day. The Commission think it very undesirable that the inquiry should be kept open for the cross-examination of ———, and desire to point out that after hearing the police witnesses now in attendance, they may come to the conclusion that cross-examination of the witnesses Mr. Y and Mr. Z may be unnecessary. The Commission are very anxious to terminate the inquiry without delay, and to take advantage of the presence of the police witnesses to-day, unless it is seriously represented that such a course would operate unfairly. The Commission are of opinion that the taking of this course can in no way prejudice the position of the police. If Mr. Eldon Bankes finds it inconvenient to cross-examine the witness ——— to-day the Commission are quite willing to allow him to postpone it, as has been done on other occasions.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Would you give me an opportunity of conferring with my friend, Mr. Muir, for a moment? It is perfectly obvious there was a misunderstanding as to the nature of the intimation you intended to give. If we had thought the intimation was that you had decided to proceed, and were going to proceed, in the ordinary way on Tuesday, then, of course, we should have had to have been ready.

(Mr. Whitmore.) It is quite clear there has been a misunderstanding.

(The learned Counsel conferred with Mr. Muir and Mr. Muskett.)

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) I have spoken to my learned friend and to the gentleman who instructs me. It is obvious there has been a misapprehension, and neither Mr. Muir nor I are prepared to cross-examine the witnesses. We have not considered the matter from that point of view, but if the Commission desire that our witnesses should be examined, and think it is the best course, having regard to the fact that there has been a misapprehension, we would raise no objection to that course if the Commission think it be one that, under the circumstances, it is best to take.

(Chairman.) Then you will call the witnesses in the ordinary way.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Yes, Sir, they are here.

(Earl Russell.) I appear for Mr. Y in what is called the A. B. Case.

(Chairman.) Yes.

(Earl Russell.) Before the witnesses are called in, may I say that my friend, Mr. Cockle, is here in Mrs. ——— case—Case B—in which he is instructed.

(Mr. Cockle.) I do not know, Sir, whether you have made up your minds to go on with that case, but I should like to draw your attention to a letter received from the Commissioner of Police. On the 11th June some complaint was made that this matter had got abroad to the police, and that certain shadowing had taken place. Since then Mr. Timewell has written to the Commissioner of the Police, and a letter has been received from him showing clearly that Madam ——— and her husband were on more than one occasion followed. I do not know whether you would consider it well that some intimation should be given to the police under those circumstances.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) If you look at the letter you will find no intimation is necessary.

(Chairman.) If you hand in the letter we will consider what to do in the matter.

(Mr. Cockle.) I do not understand whether you are going to take that case, and, if so, when?

(Chairman.) We are proceeding with the other case now. I have nothing to say at the present moment about that case.

(Mr. Cockle.) It is quite clear, at all events, I shall not be wanted to-day.

(Chairman.) Oh, yes.

(Earl Russell.) In the case that is called the A. B. Case one of the witnesses is a man named ———, who was supposed to be at Reading. A subpœna has been issued, but apparently the man does not understand he is bound to attend. I have a letter here that I will hand to the Commission, and I shall, perhaps, have to make it clear to him that he will have to come when he is told. I am told he has had a second subpœna and still he has not come.

(Chairman.) You had better make this application a little later, I think. Are you applying to us that we should exercise our compulsory powers with regard to his attendance?

(Earl Russell.) If he really understood that you were in a position to do so he might come, but I rather fancy he has not grasped that he is bound to come.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Now, Sir, I wish to hand in the charge sheet. You remember on the last occasion Mr. Savill was not able to tell you precisely what the conviction was for. He said something would be marked on the charge sheet, and it appears that the conviction was under the old statute of Edward III., and there was a mere binding over in each case.

Police-constable Walter James Earle, 22 CR, sworn.

P.C. W. J Earle.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Is there any objection, Sir, to Inspector McKay, who is the Sub-divisional Inspector of this division, being in court?

(Chairman.) No, I think Inspector McKay may be present.

49174. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Is your name Walter James Earle, and are you Police-constable 22 CR, stationed at Vine Street?—Yes.

49175. Did you join the Metropolitan Police Force on the 7th June, 1886?—Yes.

49176. You have had 21 years of service?—Yes.

49177. Has it all been at Vine Street?—It has all been at Vine Street.

49178. Have you got a clean defaulter's sheet?—Yes.

49179. And you have had the regulation advancement of wages?—Yes.

49180. And four augmentations of pay?—Yes.

49181. Have you had a large experience in dealing with disorder in the West End of London?—Yes.

49182. On the night of Saturday the 21st April, 1906, were you on patrol duty?—Yes.

49183. What were your hours?—On that night there was some extra, and I could not say for certain what time I went on. There was a football match—the Final Cup Tie.

49184. You cannot remember what time you went on?—No.

49185. It was out of the usual course?—Yes.

49186. What was your patrol?—Round the London Pavilion with another constable.

49187. On that side of the street?—On that side of the street.

49188. Where did you patrol to?—From Windmill Street to the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue.

49189. Do you have a duty called double patrol?—Yes, there was another officer with me that night.

49190. What time did you begin double patrol?—As far as I can remember it was just before 12 o'clock midnight.

49191. Who was the other officer who you joined to form the double patrol?—27 CR, Callendine.

49192. With him did you patrol round the Pavilion, part of Shaftesbury Avenue, and Windmill Street?—Yes.

49193. Did you see on that night those two women who gave the name of ——— and ———?—Yes.

49194. Where did you see them for the first time that night?—The corner of Windmill Street, Piccadilly Circus.

49195. What hour was that?—That would be just before the half-hour—say 25 past 12.

49196. Was anybody with them at that time?—There was no one with them when I first saw them; but I saw them stop two gentlemen there.

49197. Had you seen those two women at all before?—I had seen them frequently in the West End.

49198. For how long before that?—About six months.

49199. Had you ever seen them together?—Yes, frequently.

49200. Had you ever seen them alone?—Yes, I have seen them alone.

49201. Had you seen them doing anything?—I have seen them soliciting prostitution—stopping gentlemen the same as I did on that occasion.

49202. On that occasion you saw them speak to someone?—I saw them speak to two gentlemen at the corner of Windmill Street, Piccadilly Circus.

49203. Were they two separate gentlemen or two gentlemen who were together?—Two gentlemen who were together.

49204. What happened?—27 CR spoke to them, the two gentlemen went up Windmill Street, and they passed on to Shaftesbury Avenue and the Circus in front of the Pavilion.

49205. The young women passed on towards the Pavilion?—Yes.

49206. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did you say 27 CR spoke to them?—Yes.

49207. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Did you follow them or did you see them again?—We patrolled together and they were just in front, and they spoke to two other gentlemen, one in front of the Pavilion, and the other at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue, and then they were taken into custody.

49208. Were those two more men that you have referred to separate gentlemen?—Separate gentlemen.

49209. What was done about taking them into custody—what act?—I took one, ———, and 27 CR took the other one, ———.

49210. Did you hear what 27 CR said?—I did not hear what he said.

49211. What did you say to your prisoner?—I said I would take her into custody for soliciting prostitution.

49212. What took place then?—She never made any remark, but going across Piccadilly Circus she hit me in the face twice with her fist. Then I got hold of her hand to prevent her striking me again, and held her hand until we got to the station, and she was charged.

49213. When you took her into custody was there any man with her?—No, there was no man with her when I took her into custody.

49214. Who went first along the road—you or 27 CR?—I did.

49215. Did you see what happened to him and his prisoner?—No.

49216. Just describe again how it was your prisoner behaved?—She struggled in the Circus and struck me twice in the face, and made some remark, but what the remark was I could not say for certain now. She deliberately struck me.

49217. You took her along the south side of Regent Circus?—Piccadilly Circus.

49218. I was speaking rather of Regent Street—the Quadrant?—That would not be the south side. I took her on the north side. From the Pavilion it would be on the right hand side of the fountain.

49219. Did you take her on Swan and Edgar's side?—Yes, the Regent Street side.

(Earl Russell.) Where was the arrest?

49220. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Just outside the Pavilion, was it not?—The arrest was at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue, and close to the Pavilion, outside the Piccadilly Buffet.

49221. You took her across by the fountain to Swan and Edgar's corner?—Yes.

49222. According to the compass mark on this plan that is the south side of the Quadrant?—Yes.

49223. Opposite the County Fire Office?—Yes.

49224. You took her along that side. What was the state of the street from Air Street up to Vine Street at that time? Was there some building going on?—There is the building of the Piccadilly Hotel. There was a hoarding up; it was over the footway then, but it has been taken down since then.

49225. Did that extend all the way from Air Street to Vine Street?—Yes.

49226. Was Air Street partly blocked up?—From Air Street the passage where the hoarding was up, the footway was temporarily put up with wood.

49227. Is the passage that leads into Vine Street called Half Moon Passage?—Yes.

49228. When you got to Half Moon Passage were there any policemen there?—None whatever.

49229. What did you do with your prisoner?—I took her inside, where she was charged. Shortly after I got inside the other constable came in with his prisoner, and another constable brought the man in. I had never seen him before till he was brought in then.

49230. When you got to Half Moon Passage was there any crowd in front of you?—No, none whatever.

49231. Was there any crowd behind you?—I believe there was a big crowd behind following the other constable.

49232. Did you say, or did you hear anybody else say, "Do not let the man in the cap come in"?—I never heard any remark passed.

49233. Or any words to that effect?—No words to that effect.

49234. And you did not say it yourself?—I did not say it myself.

49235. Did you know of the existence of Mr. Y at all until he was taken into Vine Street Police Station?—No, I never saw him in my life before until he was brought into the station.

49236. Was your prisoner put into the dock first?—Yes.

49237. And you made your statement to the inspector?—Yes.

49238. Did you say anything about Mr. Y in that statement?—No, nothing whatever.

49239. Did you know anything about him?—I knew nothing whatever about him.

49240. Did you hear P.C. 155 CR say at all where he had arrested his prisoner?—I understood him to say when he was in the station to say he had arrested him in Regent Street near Swan and Edgar's.

49241. Did you hear him say, or did you hear any police officer say at Vine Street, that Mr. Y was arrested at the fountain in Piccadilly Circus?—No, I did not.

49242. The prisoners were brought up before Mr. Denman on the Monday—that would be the 23rd?—Yes.

49243. And did you give evidence?—I gave evidence.

(Earl Russell.) I do not know whether the Commission have got the notes of the proceedings at Marlborough Street. If so I should like to see them. (Documents handed to Earl Russell.)

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Is the name of the police constable Howell or Earle?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Earle.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It seems to have been entered in the name of Howell in the depositions. I suppose they misunderstood the name.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That is so.

49244. (Earl Russell.) I understand you agree that it was just outside the Pavilion that you arrested this woman?—Just close to the Pavilion, near the Piccadilly buffet.

49245. You had at that moment seen her solicit two gentlemen who were separate?—I saw her solicit two gentlemen separately between the Pavilion and the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue.

49246. Within a minute or two before you arrested her?—Yes.

49247. How did she solicit them. What did she do?—Went and got hold of their arms.

49248. First one man?—Yes, and then the other.

49249. What did the first man do?—Shook her off and walked away.

49250. What did the second man, whose arm she took hold of, do?—He shook her off and walked away.

49251. Where was he when you arrested her?—I could not say where he went to, but he left her there, and I arrested her.

49252. Was he any distance off when you arrested her?—Close to her. He must have been, because I arrested her directly.

49253. Are you quite sure that she had not still got hold of his arm when you arrested her?—I am sure.

49254. Quite sure?—Positive.

49255. Are you quite sure that that man was not Mr. Y?—Sure.

49256. You know Mr. Y; you have seen him in the station?—I saw him in the station.

P.C. W. J. Earle.

18 June 1907.

49257. So far as you know you never saw Mr. Y to recognise him until he was brought into the station?—Never before.

49258. Your prisoner and you reached the station in advance of the other prisoner?—Yes.

49259. ——— was your prisoner?—Yes.

49260. And ———, with 27 CR, was just behind you?—She was not far behind me. Shortly after I got to the station they came in—a matter of two or three minutes.

49261. As much as that?—Yes.

49262. He was not following you up Regent Street?—Not close to my heels.

49263. You did not see his prisoner at all?—I did not see his prisoner behind. I saw her when she was accosting gentlemen, because I was with 27 CR.

49264. You were patrolling together, and both of you were watching these women?—Yes.

49265. Which of you decided to arrest them?—I decided to arrest one of them and he decided to arrest the other.

49266. Did you say to him "Take the other one?"—I did not say "take the other one." We took them together.

49267. But after that you got away first to the station?—Yes.

49268. And he was so far behind you that you did not see him as you came up Regent Street?—No.

49269. And he could not see you?—I could not say that.

49270. Did you cross the Circus together—you and the other constable?—No, I crossed in front of him. I think his prisoner was struggling.

49271. You lost sight of him almost immediately?—I lost sight of him almost immediately.

49272. The Circus was pretty crowded?—A tidy few people about.

49273. And moving backwards and forwards—a great many of them?—Yes.

49274. So you got separated from the other constable and his prisoner almost at once?—Yes, almost at once.

49275. Was it after you had crossed the Circus that the prisoner struck you in the mouth?—She struck me in the mouth in the centre of the Circus alongside the fountain.

49276. You were already out of sight of the other constable?—I must have been. I could not say. I never looked behind.

49277. Was the woman sober?—Yes, perfectly.

49278. How did she behave as you went to the station apart from striking you in the mouth?—After she struck me in the mouth I got hold of her right hand that she struck me with. She struggled a bit, but after that she gave in, and went to the station quietly.

49279. You had hold of her by both her hands?—Yes.

49280. Was she shouting anything on the way to the station?—No, she did not shout. She said something when she struck me in the mouth, but what it was now I could not remember.

49281. After that she was silent?—After that she was silent.

49282. And this particular woman you had seen several times, had you?—Yes, previous and since.

49283. Had you seen her once a month previously?—More than that.

49284. Once a week?—Yes, possibly two or three times a week.

49285. Pretty regularly?—Yes.

49286. What about the other woman ———, who went with 27 CR?—I have seen her about.

49287. Have you seen her engaged in prostitution?—Yes.

49288. Soliciting?—Yes.

49289. Going home with men?—Yes.

49290. Often?—Not very often.

49291. Have you seen her actually accost a man and make an appointment and go off with him?—I have seen her take a man away—different gentlemen.

49292. And go away with him?—Go off with them in a cab.

49293. Not long before this happened?—Before this happened.

49294. You are quite sure you have seen her?—Yes.

49295. Did you hear ——— say anything?—I did not.

49296. Did you hear any man at all saying anything about bail?—Mr. Y after he was in the station said he would bail them out.

49297. I mean before you got to the station—at Piccadilly Circus?—No.

49298. Did you hear anyone at all advising the woman to go quietly?—No.

49299. You did not hear any man speak to your prisoner at all?—No, none whatever.

49300. As far as you and your prisoner were concerned, except she struck you in the mouth, it was an ordinary arrest?—Yes.

49301. Nothing at all out of the way about it?—No.

49302. No interference from any member of the public?—No.

49303. Neither by interfering with your prisoner or by telling her to go quietly?—No, none whatever.

49304. When she hit you in the mouth I suppose it took you a moment or two to get her other hand, and get her quiet again?—Yes, it did. She struck me twice before I could get hold of her hand, but after I got hold of her hand she did not strike me again.

49305. How was it the other constable got so far behind you?—I could not say if his prisoner struggled with him. I do not know.

49306. From your own knowledge you could not say that?—No.

49307. You did not see his prisoner struggle, or hear her shouting, or anything?—No, I did not.

49308. And he got to the station two or three minutes after you got there?—Yes.

49309. Had you charged ——— by that time?—No.

49310. She was waiting her turn, was she?—Yes.

49311. And you saw the other constable bring in ——— as his prisoner?—Yes.

94312. When did you first see Mr. Y?—Brought in then or almost immediately by P.C. 155, Woods.

49313. A minute or two after 27 came in?—It might be a minute, or directly after.

49314. Had you seen 155 on your way to the station?—I had not.

49315. You do not know where he was stationed that night?—I do not.

49316. And then were these two women and the man all charged at the same time?—No, separately.

49317. Of course, separately?—Following one another.

49318. All the three prisoners being present?—Yes.

49319. And the three constables?—Yes.

49320. 22, 27, and 155?—That is right.

49321. All present together?—All present together.

49322. And the Inspector?—Yes.

49323. What was his name?—Mr. Bex.

49324. Was anybody else in the charge room?—Probably there might have been three or four men in the charge room. I could not say who they were.

49325. Three or four constables, do you mean?—Yes, there might have been. I could not say.

49326. You do not remember?—No.

49327. But no one else who had anything to do with this matter?—No one else who had anything to do with this matter.

49328. Do you know anything at all about the man being bailed out, or had you gone back on duty?—I went back on duty as soon as the charge was taken and the prisoner was put back.

49329. When the prisoner was sent to the cells you went straight back to your beat?—Yes.

49330. You do not know anything about what happened after that night?—No.

49331. Perhaps Mr. Muir can tell me whether behaving in a riotous and indecent manner is the formal mode of charging soliciting.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes, it is under the Vagrancy Act.

(Earl Russell.) Those are the regular words?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes.

49332. (Earl Russell.) Apart from soliciting, you do not suggest there was anything riotous or indecent in the behaviour of ———?—Riotous and indecent means soliciting prostitution—behaving in a riotous or indecent manner.

49333. There was not anything that you could call riotous in the ordinary course?—No.

49334. Nor anything indecent?—No.

49335. What you simply mean by that is that she was soliciting?—Yes.

49336. Did you tell Inspector Bex what you have told us now?—Yes.

49337. About how you had seen these two women?—Yes.

49338. You told him about both the women?—Yes.

49339. You told him about being struck in the mouth?—Yes, and she was further charged with assaulting me.

49340. And then he put that charge down. Then you repeated that at the police court on the Monday, did you?—Yes.

49341. The time of the charge is put down on the charge sheet as being half-past 12. Should you say that is about right?—That is about right.

49342. That was a few minutes after you had reached the police station?—A minute or two afterwards—almost directly they were charged.

49343. When Mr. Y was brought into the charge room did you hear him say anything?—I do not remember hearing him say anything.

49344. Not a word?—I do not remember what was said with reference to Mr. Y. I was looking after my prisoner.

49345. Did you hear Mr. Y being charged?—Yes, I was there when he was charged.

49346. Did you hear what he was charged with?—Yes, attempting to rescue the prisoner from the lawful custody of 27 CR.

49347. You heard what the constable said who charged him?—Yes.

49348. You heard nothing that Mr. Y said?—I heard what Mr. Y said. Mr. Y never said anything about protesting against it, or anything.

49349. You say he never said anything?—Not to my recollection.

49350. Neither before he was charged or after he was charged?—I do not remember it.

49351. Was he wearing a cap?—That I could not say.

49352. Did you hear him say anything about bail?—No, I did not.

49353. What did your prisoner say when you charged her?—She never said anything.

49354. Not a word?—She made no remark.

49355. No answer at all?—No answer at all.

49356. And you never heard Mr. Y say anything?—I never heard Mr. Y say anything—not to my recollection.

49357. You say he might have said something?—He might have said something—I should not like to say he did not.

49358. Did you notice that the three prisoners knew each other?—No, I never took no notice of that.

49359. You noticed nothing, except your own prisoner?—No.

49360. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Were there any constables outside Vine Street Police Station?—No, I did not see any.

49361. At the entrance to the station?—Only one who was on the door. There is always a man stationed at the door.

49362. That is his regular duty?—That is his regular duty.

49363. What is he there for—to help anybody in if there is any trouble?—No—to answer questions of anybody who makes inquiries. If anybody makes inquiries he shows him into the Inspector.

49364. Do you know how many people there were at all that night?—There were police inside the station.

49365. There were two or three?—Yes, and there might have been one or two more. I could not remember. It is a long while ago.

49366. (Mr. Dickinson.) You knew these two girls, I understand?—Yes.

49367. As being prostitutes?—Yes.

49368. Had you seen both of them previously to that night, till I saw them accost a gentleman at the night?—I had not seen them both previously to that corner of Windmill Street and the Circus. I had not seen them before on that night.

49369. But previous to that night?—Previous to that night I had seen them frequently.

49370. You had seen both of them frequently?—Yes, along Coventry Street.

49371. Had either of them been arrested before as prostitutes?—I could not say that, I do not know.

49372. You were on patrol duty?—Yes.

49373. Was it your duty to arrest prostitutes?—Yes, my duty was to look after the streets to see that they were kept quiet, and to see that these prostitutes did not annoy gentlemen as they passed to and fro.

49374. You said that Police-constable 27 CR was with you and spoke to them?—Yes.

49375. What did he say?—He told them to pass on. The gentlemen passed on up Windmill Street, and the two girls went towards the Pavilion.

49376. Was that supposed to be a caution to them?—The prostitutes know what it means. They are there nightly.

49377. What is your recognised habit with regard to cautioning. We have understood that police-constables caution a prostitute before they arrest her?—We usually tell them to pass on, and not to do such a thing again, or else we should take them into custody.

49378. You told them not to do it again, or you would take them into custody?—Yes. Police-constable 27 spoke some words to them, which I could not catch, but they walked away quickly. The gentlemen went up Windmill Street, and we went up towards Shaftesbury Avenue.

49379. Did they go on in front of you?—Yes, they went on in front of us.

49380. Then the people spoken to by 27 went on in front of you towards the Pavilion?—Yes.

49381. How far in front of you were they?—A matter of five or six yards.

49382. What happened then?—They stopped another gentlemen right in front of the Pavilion door.

49383. What kind of dress had he on?—Dark, as far as I remember.

49384. Do you remember at all what kind of hat he had on?—No, I could not say. The one they stopped at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue was dressed in dark clothes, but what kind of hat he had on I could not remember. It is such a long time ago.

49385. Are you sure it was not Mr. ———?—I am sure it was not—positive. I never saw the gentleman before till he was brought into the station.

49386. (Chairman.) Do you see him now in this room?—No, I do not know the gentleman now.

49387. (Mr. Dickinson.) That happened exactly at the corner?—Yes, where we arrested them.

49388. And do you say they spoke to two men separately?—They were the two gentlemen—one in front of the Pavilion, and the other at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue.

49389. Then the two girls separated from each other then?—No, they were both together.

49390. One spoke to one gentleman, and the other to another?—Yes.

49391. In which direction did this other gentleman go away?—One gentleman left her in front of the Pavilion, but which way he went I could not say. The one in Shaftesbury Avenue left them directly we went up to them and arrested them.

P.C. W. J. Earle.

49392. What direction were you coming from when you came on these girls?—We were coming from Leicester Square towards Piccadilly Circus. From Windmill Street towards Piccadilly Circus. That was our patrol.

49393. Along the pavement?—Yes.

49394. You took this girl across the road?—Yes, across the road over to the Circus.

49395. When did you first see Police-constable 155 come up?—In the station.

49396. Did you know where he had been—whether he was out or not?—I do not know where he had been.

49397. When did you go out of the station afterwards?—I went out shortly after the charge was taken.

49398. Was there any crowd about them?—There was no crowd about then when I went out.

(Chairman.) Show me on this plan exactly the place where you effected the arrest, and the course that you took in going to Vine Street. (The witness pointed out the position on the plan.)

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It is exactly on the corner.

49399. (Chairman.) On the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue and Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

49400. That is on the south side?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) On the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue and Piccadilly Circus, which is nearest to Coventry Street.

49401. (Chairman.) In what direction did you go then?—Then to the Fountain. I went by there and to the south side of Regent Street.

49402. You passed Air Street?—Yes.

49403. And got up to Half Moon Passage?—Yes. It is a bit of a bend round the passage, and the station is round the corner.

49404. Were there any people in Half Moon Passage when you got there?—None whatever.

49405. Any constables?—None whatever. There was no one there.

49406. Let me read you what Mr. ——— told us. He said, "They crossed straight over to the Fountain." That is you, the constable, and one of the women. "That is the Fountain in Piccadilly Circus, and there, as one of the women was struggling, they called up a constable—155 CR, to assist them." Is that the case?—That would not be me, I did not call 155. No one assisted me to the station with my prisoner.

49407. 27 CR may have called 155 to his rescue?—He may have done.

49408. Was it at the Fountain or about the Fountain that your prisoner ——— struck you?—Yes.

49409. You did halt there a moment or two?—Possibly I should have to halt there a moment or two till I got hold of her hand, and then she went on quiet and never struggled any more all the way to the station.

49410. Did no one speak to you at all?—No one whatever.

49411. Did not the man whom you afterwards saw enter the dock as a prisoner say anything to you?—Nothing whatever, he never spoke to me.

49412. Your impression is that you had not seen him at all?—I had not seen him at all.

49413. And nobody at all in the crowd that was following said anything to you, or anything to your prisoner?—Nothing whatever.

49414. Did you hear these words, for instance, shouted out by somebody: "Don't be silly, don't you struggle, I will come and bail you out"?—No one ever spoke to me. I never heard those words mentioned.

49415. Are you quite sure that there were no constables at all in Half Moon Passage or in Vine Street outside the station, beside the reserve man on guard outside?—Positive.

49416. This is what we are told: "They crossed Swan and Edgar's, and straight up Regent Street"—that is you and one prisoner, and 27 CR and another prisoner. "(Q.) Where did you turn out of Regent Street?—(A.) Down Vine Street. I think it is called Vine Street. Then at the end of Vine Street there were at least ten or twelve policemen. They were building at the time next to it, and round the building they put a barricade. (Q.) Do you mean round the police station?—(A.) Round the entrance to Vine Street. (Q.) How many constables were standing there?—(A.) Quite ten." Do you say there was not a single man there?—There was not a constable there when I passed through. It was perfectly clear.

49417. How far behind was your colleague with the other woman?—It was a matter of about two or three minutes when they came into the station. I could not say how far he was behind. I did not look behind me.

49418. If the difference between your arrival at the station was two or three minutes when you were at Half Moon Passage it is quite possible that the other woman had not left the Fountain and the Circus?—That I could not say.

49419. How many yards is it?—From the Fountain to the passage I should say very nearly 100 yards.

49420. How long did you take to convoy your prisoner from the Fountain to Vine Street Station do you think. You say the road was clear in front of you?—Two or three minutes.

49421. The reason I am putting that question to you is this, that Half Moon Passage may have been clear when you passed through, and yet the other constables may have come with the crowd behind them?—It might be possibly so, but I could not say.

49422. You see what I mean?—Yes, I understand.

49423. When you arrived with your prisoner and turned into Half Moon Passage you saw no constable except the usual reserve man outside the station?—Yes.

49424. The difference of time between your arrival at Vine Street and the arrival of the next prisoner was two or three minutes?—About two or three minutes as far as I remember.

49425. It is quite possible that a large crowd came into the passage after you had come in?—It might be so, I could not say.

49426. Do you think you were being followed by a considerable crowd?—I believe there was a crowd.

49427. Did you know these women pretty well before this night?—Oh, yes.

49428. Can you describe the one you took to the station?—She was dressed in blue that night. She is about five feet four or five feet five, and is rather a stiffish built woman.

49429. What kind of hair?—As far as I remember she had darkish hair. I could not say for certain.

49430. Had she a hat or bonnet or a toque?—A hat.

49431. She was noticeably dressed?—Pretty fashionably dressed.

49432. Did you know what her name was then?—No.

49433. Had you ever heard her called by any name, a nickname or familiar name?—No. I have seen her frequently since.

49434. You did not know her as ———?—I never heard her name before.

49435. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You said just now you have seen her frequently since?—Yes.

49436. Do you mean as a prostitute?—Yes.

49437. In the same part?—Yes, I have seen her enter the Leicester and leave the Leicester.

49438. When was the last time you saw her?—I could not say the date, but it was last month when I was on duty round there.

49439. Have you seen her pretty frequently when you have been on that patrol?—Yes, I have. I have seen her and the other woman leave the Leicester with a gentleman, get in a cab, and go away with him—different gentlemen.

49440. Do you mean you have seen them both go away with one gentleman?—Two gentlemen.

49441. I am not quite sure that I understand what you did about giving a warning—what warning was given to these girls before you arrested them?—Sometimes you caution them and tell them not to repeat their conduct again, or otherwise you would have to arrest them. Other times you cannot get near enough to caution them. They run away.

49442. Then do you arrest them?—If you catch them at it again you can arrest them.

49443. Then you have not cautioned them?—Sometimes you have not cautioned them, but they are repeating the soliciting of prostitution, and you arrest them.

49444. If you have not been able to warn her, and you are pretty sure that the woman is a prostitute, and you have seen her soliciting before, you arrest her?—Yes.

49445. Although you have not given her a caution?—Yes, that is quite right.

49446. I thought there was a rule that you had to give her warning?—If you get close enough to them there is a rule, and you are supposed to caution them. If you cannot get near enough to them, if they run away from you, and you see them repeating the soliciting of prostitution and annoying gentlemen, then you arrest them.

49447. Do you mean you find in practice you cannot give them warning?—You cannot get near enough them to warn them.

49448. If that is the case, and you are quite certain of it, you disregard the rule and arrest the woman?—I do not say it is a rule.

49449. I thought it was a rule. This is what I find in the White Book: "In the first instance the woman should be cautioned by the police on duty, and told to move on, and conduct herself properly. Should she refuse, and persist in misconducting herself, she should be taken into custody and charged with such offence." I understand what you say with regard to it, and I only want to follow what you mean. That has happened on more than one occasion, has it, that you have had to arrest a woman for soliciting whom you have not been able to get near enough to caution?—Oh, yes, it has.

49450. You did see the other policemen speak to them?—Yes.

49451. You could not say what he said?—I could not say the words he said to them.

49452. Have you not heard since?—No, I have not.

49453. Have you not spoken to him about it since?—I have spoken to him, but he never mentioned, and I never asked him, what he said.

(Chairman.) No reports were called for in this case?

49454. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) No. I am not asking about reports that were made, but about conversations which have taken place between you and him about it?—No, I have not spoken to him about what he said to them.

49455. As far as you know it was not a caution?—Whether it was a caution or not I could not say.

49456. (Chairman.) There is one other question I should like to put to you categorically. Mr. Y told us that he met these two ladies ——— and ——— at the Pavilion where he had been waiting for them. This is what he said: "They took hold of me by the arm, we started walking along, and had got as far as the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue, and were waiting to cross." There is no doubt, and it is common ground between you, that they got to the corner?—They were at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue.

49457. That is clear. But Mr. Y says that he knew the two girls, and that he met one of them by appointment, and that then they took him by the arm, and he was walking along arm in arm with them when just as they were going to cross a constable seized ——, and then turned round to one of his colleagues and said: "Take the other one as well." Is it true that the two prisoners that you and your colleague arrested were arm in arm with any gentleman when you arrested them?—No, Sir, no truth whatever.

49458. Did you turn round and say to somebody: "You take the other one"?—No, I did not.

49459. Did the other constable say that to you?—Not that I remember.

49460. Who effected the first arrest?—I did.

49461. Did you say anything to your colleague on patrol?—No, not that I remember.

49462. Did he act quite independently of you and arrest the other one?—He took hold of the other one.

49463. Had you jointly determined to do that?—Yes, we had.

49464. When did you come to that determination? How far were you behind them when you and your colleague decided that you would effect the arrest?—It might be about ten yards.

49465. Who suggested the arrest?—I did. I spoke to him about it, and I said: "These women we have been speaking to at the corner of Windmill Street are soliciting again, and we will arrest them as disorderly persons."

49466. After you came to that determination did they, in fact, solicit again?—They were then soliciting the last gentleman.

49467. They were both soliciting one gentleman?—Yes, they were soliciting one gentleman. In the first place they stopped two gentlemen, and in the second place and in the third place, one.

49468. After the second act of solicitation you determined that if a third occurred you would arrest the two women?—Yes.

49469. And then I understand the third act of solicitation was the solicitation of one man by one or both?—Both women were together.

49470. Did they put their arms round him?—They got hold of his arm.

49471. One had hold of each arm?—No, one had hold of his arm and the other stood in front of him, as far as I can remember.

49472. That is quite consistent with the two young women having known the young man?—No, it is not very often the case.

49473. No, but if that is all you saw it is quite possible they were acquainted before?—He was shaking her off, so that he did not know her.

49474. You think that what you saw was inconsistent with their having been previous acquaintances?—Certainly.

49476. That I understand—and he had never seen you. But what Mr. Y. told us is exactly what I have read. He said he met two friends, and he told us one of the girls he knew as the mistress of a friend of his, and the other he was acquainted with. Then he had arranged to meet the one that was the mistress of his friend at the Pavilion and he did meet her at the Pavilion, and he says: "They took hold of me by the arm and we walked on"?—He was not the gentleman whom they accosted.

49477. The gentleman whom they accosted before you arrested them, I understand, pushed them off roughly?—Yes.

49478. (Mr. Dickinson.) It is some time since this happened. Are you quite sure that it was at the corner of Shaftesbury Avenue that the gentleman shook her off, because before the Magistrate you said: "At the corner of Windmill Street I saw a gentleman whom she accosted shake her off?—At the corner of Windmill Street there were two gentlemen there and the next one was in front of the Pavilion, and he shook her off.

49479. Did they both shake her off?—When a gentleman does not want them he says: "Go away"—like that. (Describing.) I do not say he roughly pushes them away. They simply say: "Go away, I don't want you," as far as I remember.

49480. Is your memory quite good about what happened upon this occasion?—Yes.

49481. This is a twelvemonth ago last April?—As far as I remember that is what was done.

49482. Have you had any means of refreshing your memory at all?—No.

49483. Not since some time back?—I did not hear of it till the other day.

49484. When did you first hear this question was coming up?—Last Thursday or Friday.

49485. Between April twelvemonth and the present time you have thought nothing more about the case?—No, I have not thought any more about it.

49486. You have made no notes in your book?—No, nothing.

49487. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did you understand anybody else had warned these women that night before you arrested them?—Not that I am aware of.

P.C. W. J. Earle. 18 June 1907.

49488. You said just now, in answer to the Chairman, you suggested to 27 CR that you should arrest these women, and you said it after he spoke to them at Windmill Street?—After he spoke to them at Windmill Street.

49489. That is what you said to him?—I suggested that if they solicited for prostitution again we should take them into custody.

49490. You said after he had spoken to them at Windmill Street?—The corner of Windmill Street.

49491. What did you think he had said to them at the corner of Windmill Street?—I could not say what he said.

49492. Can you form no idea?—No.

49493. What had the speaking at Windmill Street to do with it?—They were accosting two gentlemen there.

49494. That is what I am trying to get from you. Then you had seen him speak to them?—I saw them stop and speak to these gentlemen at the corner of Windmill Street. We were there together.

49495. You two policemen?—Yes.

49496. No warning was given them?—He might have been a yard in front of me, and what he said to them I did not catch. The gentlemen hurried up Windmill Street and they came along towards the Pavilion.

49497. Do you think the policeman had warned them or had not?—I think he had warned them.

49498. You told me several times, certainly a moment ago, that nobody warned them that night?—That is what I think he did. I could not say whether he had, so far as my memory goes.

49499. Then you think somebody had warned them that night?—Yes, some other constable. I thought you were suggesting some other constable besides us two who were patrolling together had warned them.

49500. No, I am speaking of you and 27. You mean when you suggested to him you should arrest them that was because you thought he had already cautioned them at Windmill Street?—That is so.

Police constable PATRICK CALADINE, 27 CR, sworn.

49518. Had you seen them together before that night?—Yes.

49519. Had you seen them apart also?—Yes.

49531. Was it before or after midnight that you saw them stop two gentlemen?—It must have been after midnight—about twenty minutes past twelve.

49532. What did you do when you saw them stop two gentlemen at the corner of Great Windmill Street?—They were walking along, and I asked them to pass away.

49533. That is all you said to them?—Yes. They were stopping gentlemen—I saw them stop these two gentlemen—and I asked them to pass away.

49534. That was your reason for speaking to them?—Yes.

49535. You simply said "Pass away"?—"Pass along."

49536. Is that your ordinary way of speaking to those women?—If they are standing with gentlemen in the street.

49537. That is what you say to them?—Yes, "Pass away," or I caution them if I get near enough to them.

49538. How do you caution them when you get near enough to them?—Simply tell them that they are stopping gentlemen, and that they must pass away, or if I see them doing it again I shall perhaps take them into custody.

49539. You sometimes say that to them?—Yes.

49540. Did you say that to these two women on this night or not?—No, I did not say I should take them into custody.

49551. What was done then?—We went on in the direction of the station; 22 CR went on with ——— and I followed behind with ———.

49552. What happened?—When I got about ten or twelve yards from the kerb, or somewhere about that distance, she became violent.

49553. In what way?—Screaming and throwing herself about. Then a crowd began to collect, and a gentleman came out and took hold of her arm.

49558. What did he say or do?—He took hold of her arm and said, "You are not going to take her?" I said, "You leave the woman alone." Eventually he let go the woman.

49559. Where was it he seized her first?—Ten or twelve yards from the footway facing Shaftesbury Avenue.

49560. Before you got to the Fountain?—Yes, before I got to the Fountain.

49561. Did you go on with your prisoner?—Yes, I went on then.

49562. Which direction did you take?—Straight across to the corner of the Fountain.

49563. That would take you just over to the corner of the fountain pavement?—Yes.

49564. What happened next?— ——— kept on talking to this woman on the other side, and I said, "You had better get away; you are only making the woman worse."

49565. What was he saying to her?—I could not remember the words.

49566. You went on with your prisoner?—Yes.

49567. What happened next?—We got nearer the Circus, near Swan and Edgar's, and near Air Street, and this woman became very violent again. She screamed and holloaed, and Mr. Y came up again and took hold of her arm. I requested him again to leave go. When I saw Police-constable 155 C I told him, "Will you take this gentleman in custody?" not knowing his name then.

49568. Where were you then?—Near Air Street.

49569. Swan and Edgar's building runs right from the corner of Piccadilly Circus up to Air Street?—Not right up; there are three or four shops between.

49570. It runs from Piccadilly Circus to within three or four shops of Air Street?—Yes.

49571. It is just about the end?—As near as I can say.

49572. At Swan and Edgar's you called upon Police-constable 155 C to take the man into custody?—Yes.

49573. Did he do so?—I did not exactly see the arrest.

49574. What happened then as far as you were concerned?—In the meantime Sergeant 20 came up and took hold of the woman's other arm.

49591. Was your prisoner charged?—Yes.

49592. Was Mr. Y charged?—Yes, he was charged.

49593. When you were going in at Half Moon Passage did you hear anybody say, "Don't let that man with the cap come in"?—No.

49594. Or at the entrance to the station?—No.

49595. Did you say so yourself?—No.

49596. At the station did you say anything about where Mr. Y was arrested?—No.

49597. Did you hear any other officer say where Mr. Y was arrested?—No, I did not.

49598. Did you hear anybody say that he was arrested at the Fountain in Piccadilly Circus?—No.

49599. Have you been on this duty since the 21st April, 1906?—Yes.

49600. Have you seen either of those two women since?—Yes.

49601. Which of them?—I have seen them both.

49602. Were they behaving in the same way?—In the same way.

49603. (Earl Russell.) Let us deal with the women first. Had you seen them behaving frequently in this way before?—I had.

49604. Both of them?—Yes.

49605. You are sure that you had seen your prisoner ——— as well as ———?—Yes.

49606. You had seen both of them soliciting men before?—I had seen them speaking to different gentlemen.

49607. At night?—At night.

49608. In the Circus?—In the vicinity. I could not tell you exactly the spot.

49609. Had you seen them stop several men the same night?—No, I had not—not several the same night.

49610. Had you seen them stop more than one man in one evening?—I had seen them with two different gentlemen the same evening. I had not seen them stop them, exactly.

49611. Had you seen the men they stopped on other nights give any indication that the women were not known to them before?—No.

49612. I want you to quite understand what I am asking you. You say on previous nights you had seen these women stop men?—Yes.

49613. Had you seen the men shake them off, or indicate anything that showed they did not know them?—I had seen them walk away from them.

49614. You had seen men on previous nights shake them off like that, as if they did not want to have anything to do with them?—As if they did not want to have anything to do with them.

49615. You know the indications when a man does not want to talk to a woman, or to have anything to say to her?—Yes, I do.

49616. For over three months, I think you said, you had seen them?—In the streets for three months.

49617. Sometimes apart, and sometimes together?—Yes.

49618. You are quite sure you had seen ——— as well as the other woman during the previous three months?—Yes.

49619. Both engaged in soliciting?—Yes.

P.C. P. Caladine.

18 June 1907.

49620. Were you on any of those occasions doing patrol duty in the same way as you were on this night?—Yes.

49621. When it was your special business to watch this class of woman?—Yes, when on patrol.

49622. Do you say they never stopped more than one man of an evening when you were watching them before?—I had seen them stop one, and I had seen them with different ones, which I had not seen them stop.

49623. On no previous occasion had you ever seen them stop more than one man?—No.

49624. Not either of them?—No.

49625. But you say on this night they stopped four men within about 50 yards. Is that right?—Yes.

49626. Quite different to anything you had seen them do before?—Yes. I had seen them stop gentlemen before.

49627. Was your prisoner —— sober?—Yes, I think so.

49628. Up to this night their behaviour had been such that you never required to caution them?—No, they had not accosted before.

49629. On this night you thought you would give them a warning?—Yes. They stopped two gentlemen in front of me, and they were still doing it.

49630. They were a few yards from you when they stopped these two men?—Yes.

49631. Had they hold of the men's arms?—They were simply talking to them.

49632. In conversation?—In conversation.

49633. Not touching the men?—I do not think they were touching them.

49634. About how many yards were they from you when you saw them stop them first?—About three or four yards.

49635. And this group of four continued speaking until you got up to them?—Yes.

49636. The men did not try to break away, or anything?—No.

49637. Did you push in between the women and the men?—No, I simply walked up to them and asked them to pass away in the usual way—to pass along.

49638. "Pass away," or "Pass along," I suppose, was addressed to all four of them, was it not?—Yes.

49639. You do not allow groups of men to stand and talk when the streets are crowded, do you?—No.

49640. So that really applied to all four?—Yes.

49641. You think that the women would distinctly understand it was a warning that you had been noticing what they were at?—Yes.

49642. You think they would take it as a warning that you had seen them behaving as prostitutes, and that they had better be careful?—Yes.

49643. After that it was you saw them speak to one single man?—Yes.

49644. Did he do anything to show that they were not friends of his, or that he did not want to have anything to do with them?—No. He moved away before we got to them. They were a yard or two in front of us; they saw us on approaching them, and the gentlemen left them, and the women went on.

49645. Did they lay hands on that man?—I could not say if they got hold of him.

49646. You were within a yard of him?—They were in front of us, and we would hardly notice whether they had hold of his arm or not.

49647. You could not say with regard to the first single man they stopped that he took them off, or anything of that sort?—I could not say that.

49648. Had you made up your mind to arrest them after they left this man when you had spoken to them?—No, I had not made up my mind to arrest them—not then. I told them to pass away.

49649. Yes, but first of all this group of four separated when you came up, and then you saw them stop another man?—Yes.

49650. You still had not made up your mind that you would arrest them?—Not then.

49651. When did you make up your mind that you would arrest them?—When we got as far as Shaftesbury Avenue we saw them with another gentleman there.

49652. He was the last one of all before you arrested them?—Yes.

49653. It was not until you saw them with that man that you made up your mind to arrest them?—No.

49654. You were in company with No. 22 CR all this time?—Yes, we were patrolling together.

49655. Was it you, or was it he, who made up your mind first that they ought to be arrested?—Police-constable 22 CR suggested it.

49656. He suggested it to you?—Yes.

49657. Did you tell him that you had cautioned them at Great Windmill Street?—I said I had spoken to them.

49658. You did?—Yes.

49659. You said you had spoken to them. You might have said "good evening," or anything else. At that time you told 22 CR you had cautioned them?—I told him I had passed them along.

49660. So that he quite understood that you had already cautioned them at Great Windmill Street?—Yes.

49661. You do not think he could have had any doubt about that?—No.

49662. Then it was he, because he knew that, who made the suggestion to you, that they ought to be arrested?—Yes.

49663. Because he knew you had cautioned them at Great Windmill Street?—Yes.

49664. When they came up to this last man before they actually were arrested you agreed with him that this was a proper case for an arrest?—Yes.

49665. Just tell me your general practice. Suppose you had cautioned the woman by saying "pass along," or "be careful," or in any other way, would you as a rule arrest her if you saw her speak to a man again afterwards?—If I saw her stop another man.

49666. You give her a warning, and then, as a rule, when she speaks to the next man you arrest her?—Yes.

49667. In this case you were a little more lenient, because you did not make up your mind after she spoke to the first man after you had warned her?—I could not get near her in the second instance; we were not near enough to arrest her.

49668. You do not suggest that you tried to arrest them, and that they escaped from you?—No.

49669. You had not made up your mind to arrest them the first time you spoke to them after the warning, or the second time?—No.

49670. Then we come to the last man before you arrested them?—Yes.

49671. That was just outside the Pavilion, was it?—Yes, Piccadilly Circus.

49672. On that frontage facing Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

49673. Did you see the man whom they accosted before they came up to him—the last man of all?—No, I did not see him before.

49674. The women were walking in the direction of Regent Street?—Yes, in the direction of Regent Street.

49675. Or of Glasshouse Street, if you like, or up in that direction?—Yes.

49676. You were on the same pavement behind them?—Yes.

49677. About how far behind them?—They might have been before we saw them just at the corner ten yards in front.

49678. Before you saw them stop this last man of all you might have been ten yards behind them?—Yes.

49679. Was 22 CR walking practically shoulder to shoulder with you?—Yes.

49680. Was the pavement crowded with people?—Yes, it was; there were a good many.

49681. Did you see them actually accost this man?—Yes.

49682. You saw the meeting between the two women and this man?—Yes.

49683. Can you tell me which way the man was facing when the women came up to him?—As we were going this way the man was facing this way, looking towards us, and the women were backing us.

49684. The man had his face towards the women as they approached?—As they approached.

49685. When they got close enough to him what did they do?—They walked right in front of him and stopped him.

49686. Was he walking or standing still?—He was walking, coming up and meeting them, as you may say.

49687. Meeting them and meeting you?—Yes.

49688. Walking very slowly?—Yes.

49689. You had a good view of him?—Yes, I had a good view of him.

49690. They walked up in front of him and stopped him?—Yes.

49691. The two women stopped in front of him so that he could not walk on without running into them?—Yes. Then when we came up the gentleman walked away, and we took the women into custody.

49692. Did they take his arm?—I believe one of them had hold of his arm at the time.

49693. Was he resenting that in any way?—No, he did not seem to resent it. He walked away.

49694. Can you tell me how he was dressed?—No, not exactly—I cannot remember.

49695. Was the night light or dark?—It was dark.

49696. Do you remember what sort of a hat he was wearing?—No, I could not tell you that.

49697. When you got up with the women you and 22 CR immediately laid hands upon them, I suppose?—Yes, we took them into custody.

49698. That is by laying hands on them?—Yes.

49699. The man had not left before you arrested the woman?—He walked away.

49700. As soon as you did that?—Yes—almost before.

49701. Which direction did he go in?—I think he went up the avenue, but I cannot remember.

49702. Almost immediately after you had done that, and almost immediately before you had got more than a few yards on your journey to the station this man Mr. Y came up to you?—Not until this woman became violent.

49703. That is your prisoner?—Yes.

49704. Had you, by the time she became violent, lost sight of the other prisoner?—Yes, they had gone on.

49705. You had lost sight of No. 22 C.R.?—Yes.

49706. Did you cross from the pavement to the fountain with 22 C.R.?—They were in front of me; I followed directly behind.

49707. You were within an arm's length or so?—Yes.

49708. You crossed towards the Fountain?—Yes.

49709. Did this woman become violent before you reached the fountain or when you reached it?—Before.

49710. Before you reached it?—Yes.

49711. In the public roadway?—Yes.

49712. How near the fountain were you then?—As near as I can remember about 20 yards from the fountain.

49713. About half way from the pavement to the fountain?—Yes, I should say so, as near as I can remember.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) About 24 yards.

49714. (Earl Russell.) It would be about half way between the pavement and the fountain, or something of that kind?—As near as I can tell you.

49715. At that time you were following close behind 22 C.R. and watching him?—Not watching him.

49716. You were going on in company with your prisoner?—Yes.

49717. What did the woman do when she became violent?—She threw herself down and began screaming.

49718. Did she scream loudly at all?—Yes, very loudly.

49719. What sort of things did she say?—She only screamed out. She did not say any words.

49720. She just screamed?—Yes.

49721. Do women scream, as a general rule, if they are sober?—Some of them do, but not always.

49722. Not always when they are sober?—Sometimes.

49723. At the time this began the other constable, 22 C.R., was within a yard or so of you?—He might have been five or ten yards in front.

49724. Was there anybody between you and him?—People passing along.

49725. I thought you told me you were crossing with him, following close behind him?—Yes.

49726. I rather want to know how close. Were you as close as you are to me?—As near as I can say, or it might be a little further.

49727. This woman screamed so loudly that he must have heard her?—I cannot say whether he heard her or not.

49728. You say she screamed very loudly?—She did scream very loudly.

49729. Could he not hear it if he was only five yards off?—I could not say whether he heard her or not.

49730. Did you see the woman with him giving any trouble?—No.

49731. You had enough to do with your own prisoner?—Yes.

49732. How often did she throw herself down on the ground?—Once or twice there before we went any farther.

49733. She tried to throw herself down once or twice?—Yes.

49734. Both these women were a little upset at being taken, were they not?—I believe so.

49735. Did they not more or less start struggling almost directly you took hold of them?— ——— resisted when I took hold of her just a little, but not much.

49736. Did No. 22 C.R. suggest to you that you should take the other woman as well? He arrested his woman first, did he not?—Yes. He suggested we should take them into custody.

49737. But at the moment of the arrest he laid his hands on the woman a moment before you took yours, did he not?—Almost together.

49738. Did he say, "You take the other one"?—No, he did not say that.

49739. When she began this struggling, was it within half a minute of your taking her into custody, should you say?—When she began to struggle?

49740. When she began to scream?—After I took hold of her?

49741. Yes?—Yes.

49742. That would be within half a minute or so?—It might be.

49743. While you were half way across to the fountain?—Yes; then she became violent.

49744. Then you say at that moment this man Mr. Y came up and took hold of her arm?—Yes.

49745. Did you hear him speak to the woman, or did she he speak to you?—He spoke to me.

49746. Did he not speak to the woman at all?—No, he spoke to me first.

49747. Did you hear him say to the woman, "It is no good struggling; you will have to go—go quietly"?—No.

49748. You did not hear him tell the woman to go quietly?—No.

49749. And you told him to mind his own business?—No, I did not tell him to mind his own business.

49750. What did you say?—I told him to let go of the woman.

49751. You did not use the expression of telling him to mind his own business?—No.

49752. Did you have a good view of the man?—Yes, I did.

49753. How was he dressed?—I could not tell you the kind of dress he was wearing. That I cannot remember. I believe he had a kind of motor cap on, if I remember rightly, but it is so long ago I cannot be certain; and I think he had a kind of a light dust coat on.

49754. Would you know the man again?—I should know him if I saw him.

49755. Stand up, look round, and tell me if you can see him?—Yes, that is the gentleman there.

49756. And you think he was wearing a sort of a motor cap?—I think so.

49757. You say he put his hand on this woman's arm. Did he try to drag her away from you?—Yes, he pulled her.

49758. He took hold of her arm and pulled her?—Yes. I requested him to leave go. She was in my custody when I told him.

49759. I suggest to you that you found him so troublesome that you had then to ask 155 C to help you?—Yes, when I reached the fountain.

49760. You had to call on 155 C before you reached the fountain, had you not?—No, I saw no policeman there.

49761. Are you quite sure that 155 C was not on duty at the fountain?—I never saw him there. Whether he was there I could not tell you.

49762. I suggest to you that you called on 155 C then and there when this woman began getting violent to help you in Piccadilly Circus?—No, I did not.

49763. You say you managed to get rid of Mr. Y by persuasion?—Yes.

49764. Without using any bad language to him?—Yes.

49765. You never told him to mind his own business?—No.

49766. You simply told him to let go?—To leave the woman alone.

49767. Do you wish to suggest that he was trying to urge her to resist?—Yes, I do.

49768. Did he say anything about bailing her out?—No.

49769. Not a word in Piccadilly Circus?—No.

49770. Did he tell you the woman had met him by appointment?—No.

49771. Did any man in the crowd at all tell you that the woman had met him by appointment?—No.

49772. You know now, as a matter of fact, that there was an appointment, do you not?—I have heard so.

49773. Was there not a telegram produced in court on the Monday?—Not to my knowledge.

49774. You were there, were you not?—I was at the court.

49775. You do not remember a telegram?—No, I do not.

49776. Did the woman say anything to you about having met the man by appointment?—No.

49777. Did the prisoner make any protest beyond struggling?—No.

49778. Said nothing in words?—No. If she did, I did not notice it.

49779. What happened to this man, Mr. Y, after you had got rid of him by persuasion, and you went on from the fountain?—He was following along by the side of her.

49780. Was he not persuading the woman to go quietly?—No, I did not hear him use those words about going quietly.

49781. He might have used them?—He might have done; I did not hear them.

49782. He argued with you a little?—No, he was talking to the woman alone.

49783. He was not arguing with you?—No.

49784. Who was he arguing with?—I suppose he was talking to the prisoner.

49785. When I say "arguing," I mean having a difference of opinion. He was not having a difference of opinion with the prisoner, was he?—I do not know; I cannot remember that.

49786. I suggest to you that what he did say to you was that you could not do anything to him ,as he was only helping you to try and keep the woman quiet?—No; he was upsetting her.

49787. He might have ben upsetting her, but did he say anything to the effect that he was only helping you?—I cannot remember.

49788. You would not like to be sure he did not, would you?—No, I would not like to be sure of it either way.

49789. When you reached Swan and Edgar's the woman had started screaming again, had she?—Yes, she became very violent again then.

49790. For no reason?—No.

49791. And this man, Mr. Y, again took hold of her arm?—He took hold of her arm again.

49792. And tried to pull her away from you?—Yes.

49793. You are sure he was not trying to keep her quiet?—No, he was trying to pull her away.

49794. Seeing the size of you, it was not very likely he would be able to pull her away?—No, but there was the woman as well.

49795. Which arm did he take hold of?—The left arm.

49796. You had hold of the right arm, had you? Is that so?—Yes.

49797. You seriously say he was pulling the woman away from you?—Yes.

49798. Did he stretch the woman's arms out between you and him?—Yes, they were pulled out like that (illustrating).

49799. Did you go on trying to persuade him at that time to let her alone?—Yes, I did.

49800. What did he say to that?—He let go—he released the woman.

49801. Did you hear him say to the woman at that time, "Do not struggle"?—I do not remember it.

49802. But you did not think he was encouraging her to struggle, did you?—Yes, I did.

49803. You thought he was urging her to scream and to struggle and to be violent?—Yes.

49804. You say you managed to persuade him again to let go by telling him he must not interfere?—Yes, I told him he must not interfere.

49805. When you told him that, he did let go?—He let go.

49806. Did he take hold of her arm a third time after that?—No, he did not.

49807. After he let go of the woman he made no further attempt to rescue her?—No.

49808. Then why did you rely on Police-constable 155 C taking him into custody?—I saw 155 C there; he came up; I saw him, and I said to him, "Take this gentleman into custody; I call on you to arrest him."

49809. Although by that time he had left off giving you any trouble?—Yes, he had let go of the woman then.

49810. He was not making any further attempt to rescue at that moment?—Not at that moment.

49811. Then you gave him into custody for what he had done already, did you?—Yes.

49812. Where did 155 C come from?—I could not say where he came from. There was a large crowd about at that time.

49813. Was it before or after you told 155 C to arrest him that you came across Sergeant No. 20?—Yes, I saw 155 C first.

49814. And directly you saw him you said, "Take this man into custody"?—Yes.

49815. It was after he was in custody, was it, that you came across the sergeant?—I cannot tell you whether he was in custody at the time the sergeant came up.

49816. You mean they were so close together?—They were just at the back of us. My attention was on the woman.

49817. The woman went on being violent, although Mr. Y let go of her?—Not after the sergeant took hold of her.

49818. Did you watch what happened between 156 C and Mr. Y when he took him into custody?—No, I did not see the arrest.

49819. You were within three or four yards of where it took place, were you not?—Yes.

49820. According to you the arrest of Mr. Y took place somewhere outside Swan and Edgar's?—Yes, I should think it was near the end of Air Street—at Swan and Edgar's end of Air Street, as near as I can remember, where I called on Police-constable 155 C to take this man into custody.

49821. That is about 40 or 50 yards from Vine Street Station, is it?—I should think it is quite 50 yards or over, as near as I can say.

49822. I think it is 177 yards altogether, so that it would be about 50 to 80 yards. Would that be your idea—about 50 to 80 yards?—Something like that.

49823. You were still in the station, of course, when Mr. Y was charged?—I was in the station.

49824. You knew that he came quietly?—I could not say how he came.

49825. Did you not all go to the station practically together?—We were following one another.

49826. Following right close up?—I could not say how close they were to me; I could not see behind; I know they came into the station shortly after us.

49827. But as the distance is only 80 yards, unless there was a struggle, or there was something to delay him, and if he was arrested while you were still within three or four yards of him, you ought to have got to the station practically together?—Yes, it was only two minutes, or it might have been three minutes.

49828. It might have been five minutes, might it not?—No, I think not.

49829. You think it was only two or three minutes?—Yes.

49830. When you got to the station you took the woman into the charge room?—Yes.

49831. You were not able to charge her at once?—Yes. The other prisoner, ———, was charged first.

49832. Was that the only prisoner waiting at the time?—To my knowledge she was the only one.

49833. You do not know how long ——— got there before?—No, I could not say.

49834. So far as you know, there was only that one waiting?—As far as I know.

(Chairman.) The charge sheet puts the arrival at the station simultaneously.

(Earl Russell.) Not as regards ———.

(Chairman.) That is quite consistent with two or three minutes.

(Earl Russell.) I think possibly it is.

(Mr. Dickinson.) What does "No. 4" in the charge sheet mean?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Those are extracted. It is not the full charge sheet.

(Chairman.) I was going to add that in the actual charge sheet, which we have seen, other cases intervened. The entries we have are taken from more than one charge sheet.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) What does "C 49 and 105" mean?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That is the Scotland Yard register; that is a sheet, and it has nothing to do with the ordinary charges taken at all.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It shows that there are three seperate sheets.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It does show that there are three separate sheets.

49835. (Earl Russell.) Let me know exactly what happened in the charge room. First of all, is your memory pretty clear about this night? It is some time ago?—It is pretty clear; I remember it pretty well from the disturbance.

49836. You recall the look of the two women, the look of this man, and what happened?—Yes.

49837. (Mr. Whitmore.) You remember it on account of the disturbance, do you say?—The disturbance of the woman would bring my memory more to it than though it was quiet.

49838. (Earl Russell.) Do you know how long at all 22 CR had been there with his prisoner when you arrived?—I should not think many minutes.

49839. Was his prisoner in the act of being charged when you got here?—Yes.

49840. Was she in the dock and being charged?—I could not say for certain whether she was in the dock or not at the time when we arrived at the station.

49841. When you formally charge prisoners you put them in the dock, do you not?—Yes.

49842. That is the time when the charge is read over to them and put in the sheet?—Yes.

49843. You are not quite sure, you say, whether she was actually in the dock when you got there?—No.

49844. Was she in the dock almost immediately after you got there?—Yes.

49845. How long does charging a prisoner take—a couple of minutes or so?—Something like that; it depends upon the charge, and what they have to take down, of course.

49846. First of all, an account is given by the arresting officer to the Inspector?—Yes.

49847. Were you in the station in time to hear the account given of the arrest of the other woman?—Yes, I should be there.

49848. Do not tell me you should be there. If you do not remember, say so?—Yes, I was there when she was put into the dock and charged.

49849. You remember it?—Yes.

49850. You remember Police-constable 22 CR telling his story about how ——— had behaved?—He told the Inspector the charge he had got against her, but I could not tell you what it was.

49851. You did not take any particular notice?—No.

49852. Then the charge-sheet has to be signed. An ordinary charge like that only takes two or three minutes?—It does not take long.

49853. Had they finished taking that charge before Mr. Y was brought in. Do you remember whether your prisoner was in the dock when Mr. Y came in?—No, I think not, if I remember rightly. It is some time ago. I think Mr. Y was there before the first woman was put into the dock, or about the time that she was put into the dock.

49854. You think Mr. Y was there before ——— was charged?—I think so, as far as I can remember.

49855. As Mr. Y only arrived a few minutes after you there must have been a little delay before she was charged?—Yes.

49856. Just let me remind you of the suggestion that is made. When you first got there not only was there a prisoner or two waiting to come before them, but the Inspector was not in the charge-room, and you had to wait a few minutes for him. Do you remember that?—I am not quite certain of that.

49857. Were these people charged in this order, ——— arrested by No. 22 CR, ——— arrested by you, and Mr. Y arrested by No. 155 C?—Yes.

49858. They were charged in that order?—Yes.

49859. Were they put into the dock one after another?—Yes.

49860. With no other prisoners in between?—No.

49861. The three were put in one on top of the other?—One after the other.

49862. And you think the three constables and the three prisoners were all present in the charge-room during the whole of the charges?—Yes.

49863. But you cannot remember what 22 CR said about his prisoner?—No, I cannot remember that.

49864. You had to give your account both of the behaviour of ——— and of the behaviour of Mr. Y, had you not?—Yes.

49865. And you told the Inspector?—Yes.

49866. Did you tell him practically all you have told us now?—Yes.

49867. Did you tell him that it was at the fountain that Mr. Y had interfered with you?—Yes.

49868. Did you tell him that it was at the fountain that Mr. Y was arrested?—No.

49869. Did you tell the Inspector where Mr. Y was arrested?—No.

49870. You did not say anything about it. You left him to guess?—I did not tell him where, because I did not know.

49871. Did you hear 155 C say where he was arrested?—He said he was arrested in Regent Street, at Swan and Edgar's.

49872. I suggest to you that 155 C had entered the station with you when you came in with ———, and that he left the station again before he came in with Mr. Y?—No.

49873. Are you quite sure?—Quite sure of that.

49874. That 155 C was not in the station in connection with these matters until he brought in Mr. Y?—No.

49875. Did you see ——— before you arrested the woman ———?—No.

49876. You never set eyes on her?—No.

49877. Can you tell me whether Mr. Y was close to the woman ——— when you arrested her?—I do not know; I think he could not have been far off.

49878. By the way he came up?—By the way he came up.

49879. He might have been quite close?—He might have been pretty close.

49880. But you cannot say, can you?—No, I cannot.

49881. You have no means of knowing whether Mr. Y was close alongside ——— when she was taken into custody, or not?—No, I could not tell you.

49882. Are you perfectly certain that no attempt was made by Mr. Y to come to the police station on his own account in connection with these women?—I could not tell you. That I do not know.

49883. You are quite sure that you never heard him say anything about going bail for them?—Yes, quite sure.

49884. Never heard a word about his saying he had an appointment with them?—No.

49885. And you do not remember a telegram being produced at the hearing on Monday?—No.

49886. You are quite sure he was arrested on the way to the station because he tried to pull the woman away?—Yes.

49887. It is not true to say he tried to get into the police station and was prevented by other police-constables?—I could not say that.

49888. Do you mean you are not quite sure whether 155 C did arrest him at once when you told him to do so or not?—No, I could not say that. I did not actually see the arrest.

49889. You told 155 C to arrest him outside Swan and Edgar's, although at that moment he was not trying to rescue your prisoner?—He had let go the prisoner then.

49890. I say at that moment he was not trying to rescue her?—Not at that moment.

49891. Is it possible, as far as you know, that Mr. Y might have walked up himself towards the police station, and have been arrested later?—As far as I know.

49892. (Chairman.) Had you been doing this kind of patrol work about Piccadilly, Regent Circus, and so on, for some little time in April, 1906?—Yes.

49893. How many weeks had you been on this patrol duty then?—I should have been on Coventry Street about two or three weeks that month; I was posted there for the month.

49894. Had you arrested any women at all for solicitation before this incident on the Saturday night?—Yes.

49895. How many do you think during the three weeks you had been on duty at Coventry Street?—I could not remember; I could not tell you exactly—two or three, or three or four.

49896. Or many more?—No, it would not be many more—about three or four.

49897. Have you been on this kind of duty since April, 1906?—Yes.

49898. Did you continue doing this patrol duty in that same region after this Saturday night?—Yes.

49899. For how many weeks?—We go on point duty one month, and then we patrol the next.

49900. I know, but did you remain on this duty after this Saturday evening incident?—Yes.

49901. For how long?—Until the end of the month.

49902. Until the end of April?—Until the end of April, and possibly two or three days at the commencement of the next month.

49903. Did you arrest any women subsequently to the arrest of ———?—Yes, I think after that.

49904. How many do you think?—One or two.

49905. Do you remember their names?—No, I do not.

49906. Was there anything remarkable in this particular case that attracted your attention, or that made it out of the ordinary course?—Yes.

49907. What was that?—They seemed to be persistent with gentlemen, and annoying them, and insulting them.

49908. I do not quite see that. All that you told us they did was first, they had stopped and talked to two gentlemen, then they went on; then they spoke to another man, a man apart, a single man, and then they walked on a few yards more and spoke to a third man?—Yes.

49909. Or, rather, to a fourth man, because there were two men first, but that was the third act of solicitation?—Yes.

49910. That does not strike me as very extraordinary before an arrest. We have heard some other cases. That a woman should speak three times to men on a particular evening before she is arrested is nothing out of the ordinary course, is it?—They may do that.

49911. I am putting to you that it quite commonly takes place. What I suggest to you is this. You seem to have arrested a good many. I should have thought it was the sort of evidence on which you act in almost every case that a woman speaks to men three or four times before you arrest her, or before you get the opportunity of arresting her. Is not that so?—That is so.

49912. What I am putting to you is the mere fact that the two women accosted men three times is nothing very unusual. That does not assist your recollection about this case, does it?—No.

49913. We are now in the month of June, 1907, and this affair took place in April, 1906?—Yes.

49914. I am rather suggesting to you that it would not be very wonderful if your recollection were not very fresh about the matter?—No. My recollection is fresh about it on account of the disorder of the woman which recalled the night of the occurrence.

49915. It is not for me to suggest to you, but I should have thought that the thing that would have recalled this case to your recollection was that there was an attempted rescue?—Yes.

49916. Is it not the attempted rescue that enables you to fix on this case with some particularity?—Yes, more so, and the rioting.

49917. There was no rioting, so far as I gather, before she was arrested?—Not before.

49918. Is it an uncommon thing for a woman to scream out and throw herself on the ground when you are taking her to the station?—No, I have had them do that before.

49920. Your experience is that this class of prisoner usually goes quietly to the station?—Yes.

49921. And probably is not very much upset?—Some of them.

49922. Not at all upset?—No.

49923. I suppose others cry and seem alarmed and flurried?—Yes.

49924. And some become positively violent?—Yes.

49925. You tell me that it is rather rare for them to be quite violent?—It is.

49926. I am dealing with this class of prisoner when she is sober. Of course, if the prisoner is drunk violence is quite possible?—Yes.

49927. We quite agree about that. There is nothing then, except the attempted rescue, and the violence on the way to the station, that fixes this case very definitely in your mind?—That is so.

49928. Nothing else?—Nothing else.

49929. Nothing that took place at the Police Court?—No.

49930. Do you remember what took place at the Police Court?—No, I do not.

49931. That is quite consistent with your former answer. You do not remember anything about the Police Court that adds to your recollection in the matter?—No more than the ordinary charge was before the magistrate.

49932. Do you remember whether the prisoners were defended by a solicitor or counsel, or whether they answered for themselves?—Yes, they were defended by a solicitor.

49933. By what solicitor?—I believe Mr. Robinson.

49934. That was the case. Were the streets very crowded when you effected this arrest?—Yes, there were a lot of people about.

49935. It was a Saturday night?—Yes.

49936. It was some minutes past 12 o'clock, was it not?—Yes.

49937. The streets were getting freer of people, I suppose?—It was rather busy that night.

(Earl Russell.) It was a Saturday night, and it was after closing time.

49938. (Chairman.) It was after closing time. It was about half-past 12 when they got to the station.

49939. You say the streets were crowded?—Yes.

49940. Not very crowded with carriage traffic, I suppose?—Not a lot of carriage traffic, more pedestrians.

49941. When you effected the arrest was it done quite quietly?—Yes.

49942. Did the woman scream at that moment?—No.

49943. So that a crowd did not collect at once?—No.

49944. You hurried the woman off in the usual way?—Walked her off in the usual way.

49945. Walked her towards the station?—Yes.

49946. Did you notice whether a crowd was collecting behind you and following you?—No, not at the time.

49947. When did you first know there was a crowd following?—When they heard the screaming of the woman they seemed to rush from all parts.

49948. Two constables—Sergeant 20 and Constable 155 C—appeared on the scene quite quickly when the screaming commenced, as I understand it?—I did not see them at the commencement.

49949. She went a little way quietly after that, did she?—Yes.

49950. On the second occasion you found 155 C and Sergeant 20?—155 C, and Police-sergeant 20.

49951. That was the second time of her becoming violent?—Yes.

49952. Or, rather, I ought to say it was at the second time of her becoming violent that you noticed Sergeant 20 and 155 C close by?—Yes.

49953. Were there people round you then to any extent?—Yes, there were a lot of people round me following along.

49954. I suppose you stopped for a moment?—We had to stop.

49955. Then the crowd began to collect?—More so—they were following along from the first scene of the disturbance.

49956. Then I understand when the sergeant came to your assistance you and your prisoner went on again?—We went on again.

49957. You had not passed Air Street, I understand, when the sergeant came to your assistance?—No, not exactly.

49958. You went on, you passed Air Street, and you came to Half Moon Passage?—Yes.

49959. When you entered Half Moon Passage were there any people in the passage ahead of you?—Just one or two—they stood aside when we passed.

49950. One or two civilians?—Yes.

49951. Or were they constables?—Civilians.

49952. Not police officers?—No.

49953. At that time did you see the other constable with his prisoner ahead of you when you turned into Half Moon Passage?—Which constable do you mean?

49954. 22 C.R. and ——— were ahead of you, as I understand it, were they not?—Yes.

49955. I judged that from the story you told Mr. Muir?—Yes.

49956. Were they in sight when you turned into Half Moon Passage?—No, they were not in sight.

49957. There is a bend in the passage. When you got to the bend were they in sight ahead of you?—No, I did not see them.

49958. Then you did not see them until you saw them in the charge room?—No.

49959. When you turned into Half Moon Passage did you look back at all to see whether the passage became full of people?—No.

49960. But it is quite possible the passage might have become full of people. Directly you and the sergeant passed with your prisoner into the passage there was nothing to prevent members of the public following into the passage?—No.

49961. It is a public thoroughfare?—Yes.

49962. You do not know whether members of the public pressed upon your heels?—No.

49963. You saw nothing of Mr. Y. After what you have referred to as the attempted rescue and the prisoner becoming violent the second time you had not seen Mr. Y?—No, not until he came into the station.

49964. Are you perfectly certain when you got to the end of Half Moon Passage and you were going into Vine Street there were no constables except the man on the door?—No, I never saw them.

49965. I suppose there are a good many constables ordinarily in Vine Street coming and going?—They are going on and off duty, and that sort of thing. There are not very many there on duty.

49966. I am glad you make the distinction which I ought to have made. I did not mean my question to apply to the police-constables actually placed on duty. Were there any constables walking or standing about the entrance to the station?—No, I did not see any; I did not notice any.

49967. Is it a common thing for constables going off duty to stop just outside and chat?—No; they go straight away as a rule; they do not stop.

49968. I suppose a good many constables are going in and out at all hours of the day?—Yes.

49969. And at all hours of the night, too?—Yes.

49970. However, you do not recollect seeing seven or eight constables in Half Moon Passage barring the way, or anything of that kind, I understand?—No.

49971. (Mr. Dickinson.) This happened a long while ago now—about 14 months ago?—Yes.

49972. When did you first hear of this matter again since April of last year?—I think about Thursday or Friday was the day I first heard of it.

49973. Last Thursday or Friday?—Yes.

49974. Who spoke to you about it?—I was spoken to by the Sub-Divisional Inspector, Mr. McKay.

49975. Did you have any means of refreshing your memory about it?—Yes, I looked up the charge book and saw that they were the people who were charged at that time, and refreshed my memory.

49976. That was the only thing you had to help you?—That was the only thing I had to help me.

49977. Have you seen the Magistrate's notes?—No, I have not.

49978. I suppose since last Thursday or Friday you have prepared a statement?—Yes.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) On Saturday morning.

49979. (Mr. Dickinson.) Have you refreshed your memory by talking it over with other constables at all?—No; I simply took the names and addresses at the time in the charge book, and the occurrence came to me on thinking it over.

P.C. P. Caladine.

18 June 1907.

49980. After the hearing at the police court, did anything more happen?—Nothing more happened.

49981. The case was all over as far as you were concerned?—Yes.

49982. Can you tell us a little bit more about the disturbance? After you had taken this woman up you say Mr. Y came just about the middle of the road to you?—Yes, as near as I can say about 10 or 12 yards or so.

49983. What was the first thing he said?—He said to me, "You are not going to take her, I suppose, into custody?"

49984. Did he threaten you?—No, he used no threats to me.

49985. He might very well have said that if he thought you were making a mistake and not taking her up rightly. What did he say he was going to do?—He seemed to me as though he was trying to get her away from me.

49986. Then did she throw herself down?—It was then she threw herself down.

49987. Did she absolutely throw herself down?—I could not say whether she went down on to the roadway or not. I held her up, of course, as best I could.

49988. And I suppose you had to drag her out of the road?—No, I did not have to drag her. She pulled herself together and walked on again after that.

49989. Had you hold of her right arm then?—I had hold of her right arm.

49990. And he took hold of her left arm?—Yes.

49991. He went on with you. That lasted some little time, did it?—Perhaps a minute or two, or something like that.

49992. I suppose he was excited?—He seemed very excited.

49992*. What did he say?—I could not hear what he was saying, there were so many around.

49993. Did you hear anything said about bail?—No, I did not.

49994. Of that you are sure?—I am sure.

49995. Did you hear anything said about bail in the police station?—No.

49996. You know they were bailed out?—Yes, I know they were bailed out.

49997. But, so far as you were concerned, you had no idea at that time that there was any question of bailing them out?—No.

49998. You called upon Police-constable 155 C to arrest Mr. Y?—Yes.

49999. Why did you do that? Mr. Y had already let go the woman?—Yes. He got hold of the woman a second time. I gave him the first chance.

50000. He got hold of the woman a second time?—Yes.

50001. Did you really think he was trying to rescue a woman he knew?—Yes, I did.

50002. In the crowd?—Yes.

50003. Did you say anything to Police-constable 1555 C about arresting Mr. Y?—I told him to take him into custody.

50004. I suppose you were excited at that time too?—No, it would not make me excited; I am so used to those occurrences.

50005. You say you knew these women as prostitutes?—Yes.

50006. How long before, do you think, you had known them?—Two or three months, or something like that. I could not tell you exactly the length of time; it would be about two months, if not more.

50007. Frequenting this part of Piccadilly?—Yes, the vicinity.

50008. Every night?—I cannot say every night.

50009. But regularly?—Regularly.

50010. Why did you not arrest them before?—I never saw them actually accost men in my presence—not two or three, one after another. As soon as they see you there you cannot get near them.

50011. You saw them accost some men at Great Windmill Street, and then between that and the Pavilion, which is not very far, they accosted another man?—Yes.

50012. What is your general rule with regard to these women? Here are two women who you say are well known as prostitutes, and you do not attempt to arrest them. Do you say if you had thought it right to arrest them during that period you could not have arrested them?—If you see the women, these prostitutes, accost gentlemen in the vicinity—if you see them stop two or three gentlemen—and you know what their characters are, you take them into custody if you can get hold of them.

50013. Do you mean to say these two women, who you knew perfectly well, were Regent Street prostitutes, had never been seen by you before accosting men?—I have seen them accost one gentleman, as I say, and the like of that; but you cannot get near them, as a rule. They do not give you the chance to get near them to caution them.

50014. You were behind them?—Yes, and they seemed persistent on this particular night.

50015. You say 155 C did not help you to take the woman at all?—No, he never touched the woman.

50015. You took the woman with Sergeant 20?—Yes, he came up almost immediately with 155 C.

50017. I understand from you Mr. Y was not taken into custody until you reached Air Street?—Near Air Street. That is, where I called on Police-constable 155 C to take him into custody. Whether he arrested him at that time, I could not say. I did not actually see the arrest.

Police-constable WILLIAM HENRY JAMES WOOD, 155 C, sworn.

P.C. W. H. J. Wood.

50018. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Your name is William Henry James Wood, you are Police-constable 155 C, and you are stationed at Vine Street Police Station?—Yes.

50019. Did you join the Metropolitan Police Force on the 17th June, 1901?—Yes.

50020. Have you done duty at Vine Street Police Station ever since?—Yes.

50021. Have you a clean defaulter's sheet?—Yes.

50022. And have you had your regular advances of pay?—Yes.

50023. On Saturday, the 21st April, 1906, were you on patrol duty?—Yes.

50024. Where were you patrolling?—On the north side of Regent Street, from Air Street to Piccadilly Circus.

50025. That is round by the County Fire Office?—Yes.

50026. Was that from 7 o'clock in the evening until 3 o'clock the next morning?—Yes.

50027. Where were you principally stationed during that time? Did you go backwards and forwards the whole time?—Yes, I was up and down the whole time.

50028. Did you see Police-constable 22 CR with a woman in custody?—Yes.

50029. Where were you then?—By the County Fire Office.

50030. Where was Police-constable 22 CR with the prisoner?—Crossing Piccadilly Circus.

50031. Whereabouts in Piccadilly Circus?—As far as I can remember, just about the Fountain.

50032. What was the next thing that you noticed?—I saw a large crowd a short distance behind Police-constable 22 CR, and I then saw Police-constable 27 CR with a woman in custody. I saw the woman struggling.

50033. Where was that?—In Piccadilly Circus.

50034. Whereabouts?—Just by the Fountain, and I saw a man trying to pull away the woman from the police-constable.

50035. How long did that continue?—Only a few minutes.

50036. What was the next thing you noticed?—The man would not let the woman go, and they walked across the Circus towards Regent Street. I followed the crowd up.

50037. How far would you be from the constable and the woman?—A matter of a few yards. I followed them to Swan and Edgar's. I saw the man catch hold of the woman by the arm again.

50038. Could you say whether it was the same man or not?—Yes, the same man.

50039. It was the same man?—Yes.

50040. Did you see him afterwards at the police station?—Yes.

50041. Who was the man?—His name is Mr. Y.

50042. Outside Swan and Edgar's you saw that he caught hold of the woman's arm again?—Yes.

50043. What took place then?—Police-constable 27 CR called on me to take the man into custody. I did so.

50044. Had you heard the man say anything to the woman while you were following them up?—Yes.

50045. What did you hear him say?—I heard the man say, "All right ——; go quietly."

50046. Did you hear him say anything else at all?—No.

50047. Did you take him into custody?—Yes.

50048. Where was it you took him into custody?—In Regent Street.

50049. Whereabouts?—Outside Swan and Edgar's shop.

50050. Which end of it?—Near Air Street.

50051. Having taken him into custody, did you say anything to him?—Not that I remember.

50052. What did you do with him?—Took him to Vine Street Station.

50053. Did he go quietly?—Yes.

50054. How did you go into Vine Street?—Walked along Regent Street, and went down Half Moon Passage.

50055. Were there any constables in Half Moon Passage when you got there?—I did not notice any.

50056. Did you stop at the entrance to Half Moon Passage?—No.

50057. Went straight through?—Went straight through.

50058. Did anybody in Air Street say, "Don't let that man with a cap come in," or any words to that effect?—No, I did not hear anyone.

50059. Was Mr. Y wearing a cap, do you remember?—I think he was, as far as I remember.

50060. There was no stop at all, you say, at the entrance to Half Moon Passage?—No.

50061. Was there any stop at all at the entrance to Vine Street Police Station?—No.

50062. Were there any constables outside there beyond the man on the door?—Not that I remember.

50063. Did you go into the station with your prisoner?—Yes.

50064. Did he say anything to you on the way after you arrested him?—No.

50065. Did he say anything about bail to you?—No.

50066. Did you see Police-constable 27 CR ahead of you as you were going along?—Yes.

50067. How far was he ahead of you?—A few yards.

50068. How long would it be after Police-constable 27 CR and his prisoner went to the station that you went to Vine Street with your prisoner?—About two or three minutes.

50069. Do you remember at all what you said to the Inspector about your prisoner?—No, I cannot remember now.

50070. Did you say that you arrested him at the Fountain, Piccadilly?—No.

50071. Did you yourself know either of the two women?—No.

50072. You had never seen them before?—No.

50073. Have you seen them since?—No, and I do not think I should know them if I was to see them.

50074. (Earl Russell.) Would you know the man Mr. Y if you were to see him?—Yes.

50075. Has anyone told you whether he is in the room or not?—No.

50076. You have not heard anything about him while you have been upstairs?—No.

50077. Just look round, and see if you can see him?—Yes; that is the gentleman there.

50078. You are quite sure of him?—Yes.

50079. When you took this man into custody at Swan and Edgar's you did it because you were asked to?—Yes.

50080. You did not know what reason there was for arresting him?—There was a reason, because the man was trying to take the prisoner away from the other constable.

50081. You did know that?—Yes.

50082. Would you have taken him into custody yourself, if you had not been asked?—Yes.

50083. I am right in saying that your beat was on the north side of Regent Street?—Yes.

50084. And the place where you took him into custody was on the south side?—Yes.

50085. So you had come off your own beat?—Yes.

50086. Because you were called off it, or because you thought yourself you would be wanted?—Because I saw a large crowd and the policemen, and I thought it was my duty to go.

50087. You say because of the way Mr. Y behaved you would have taken him into custody yourself without being told to do so?—Yes.

50088. At the time you took him into custody was he giving trouble to 27 CR?—Yes.

50089. Are you sure he was not quite quiet?—Yes.

50090. Not quite quiet?—Not quite quiet.

50091. Was he still holding the woman?—He had the woman by the arm.

50092. Are you sure of that?—As far as I remember.

50093. At the time you took him into custody?—Yes.

50094. At the time 27 CR asked you to take him into custody had he the woman by the arm then?—As far as I remember he had.

50095. It would not be correct to say that he had left off pulling the woman, and was not interfering with his hands between the prisoner and the constable?—As far as I remember he had the woman by the arm.

50096. You think so?—Yes.

50097. The place where you arrested him was quite close to Air Street?—Yes.

50098. And the total distance from there to Vine Street Police Station is a matter of 50 to 80 yards?—Yes, I should say it would be something of that sort.

50099. Did you arrest him instantly when 27 CR told you to?—Yes.

50100. Without any hesitation?—Yes.

50101. You did not stop to think about it?—No.

50102. Did you tell him when you laid hands on him what you were arresting him for?—No.

50103. You laid hands on him and did not say a word?—Yes.

50104. Sure?—Yes.

50105. Did he say nothing?—No, I do not remember his saying anything.

50106. I see you have not been very long in the Force. I suppose you have arrested other people?—Yes.

50107. It was not your first arrest?—No.

50108. Do you find, as a rule, if you go up to a man and lay your hands on him and arrest him, and do not say anything to him, he will remain quite quiet and not say anything to you?—I do not usually arrest a man without speaking to him.

50109. You did this time?—I was called on by the other police-constable to do so.

50110. I am not saying whether you were right or wrong, but I am speaking of the fact. You did arrest this man without speaking a word?—Yes.

P. C. W. H. J. Wood.

18 June 1907.

50111. You are quite sure of that?—Yes.

50112. He did not speak either?—Not that I remember.

50113. He made no complaint?—Not that I remember.

50114. He went to the police station with you like a 'amb?—He went quietly.

50115. He was a very obliging member of the public, was he not? Now tell me this: Where was 27 CR when you arrested the man? Had 27 CR walked on? Did he just tell you to arrest the man and walk on, or did he wait to see you do it, or what?—I do not think so. After calling on me to arrest the man, I did so immediately, and he walked on.

50116. Did 27 CR see you arrest him or not?—That I could not say.

50117. Was he within three or four yards of you when you arrested him?—Yes.

50118. Did you follow him down immediately?—Yes.

50119. When you started walking to the station with your prisoner, how far behind you were Police-constable 27 and his prisoner?—Quite a short distance.

50120. The inside of ten yards?—Yes.

50121. Then you must have entered the police station almost at the same moment, must you not?—Just after him—a very short time after him.

50122. You said you went to the police station two or three minutes after 27 CR?—Yes.

50123. It would not take you as long as two minutes to walk 80 yards, would it?—It is a matter of a very short time.

50124. It would not take you very long to walk it—rather less than a minute—if you had no trouble. Did you walk at an ordinary slow speed of about two to three miles an hour?—Very slow.

50125. There was no check on the way you have told Mr. Muir. Mr. Muir asked you particularly, and I understood you to say there was no stop on the way?—But you could not walk fast.

50126. But I suppose you could walk as fast as a constable with a woman could walk?—Yes.

50127. Do you wish to tell us you got to the police station practically at the same time, or two or three minutes after him?—Just after him.

50128. Do you mean within a few seconds?—Yes.

50129. Did you see 27 CR and his prisoner enter the door of the police station?—No, I could not say that I did.

50130. Where is the door that you enter? Does it open upon Vine Street, or does it open upon Half Moon Passage?—On to Vine Street.

50131. Coming the way you did, up Half Moon Passage, it would be round the corner to your right. Is that so?—Yes.

50132. Did you see 27 CR and his prisoner in front of you in Half Moon Passage as you came down?—No.

50133. Did you see him turn into Half Moon Passage from Regent Street?—No, I did not.

50134. I want you to explain this: From the mouth of Half Moon Passage to Air Street where you arrested your prisoner is only a matter of 50 yards?—Yes.

50135. You say when you arrested your prisoner 27 CR and his prisoner were walking in front of you towards the station—the inside of ten yards in front of you. Is that right?—Yes.

50136. You started walking along Regent Street behind him in the same direction?—Yes.

50137. Less than 10 yards behind him?—Yes.

50138. Why or how did you lose sight of him. Can you tell me that?—He was so far in front of me, and there was such a large crowd that I could not see him.

50139. He was so far in front of you and the crowd was between you and him. Was that large crowd there when you arrested Mr. Y?—Yes.

50140. Were you delayed by the crowd at all? Did they obstruct you at all?—I could not say that.

50141. You do not suggest that the crowd was worse for you than it was for him, do you?—No.

50142. You both went to the station at about the same pace. When you got to the station you took your prisoner straight into the charge room?—Yes.

50143. Did you see 27 CR and his prisoner there?—No, I did not see him there. I do not remember seeing him there.

50144. You kept your man in custody until you produced him to the Inspector, and charged him?—I did not charge the prisoner.

50145. But you had this man in custody, had you not, when you reached the charge room?—Yes.

50146. Did you keep him in your custody until you handed him over to the Inspector in the dock to be charged?—Yes; he stood there in the charge room.

50147. You did not know what to charge him with, did you?—I should have known.

50148. But you surely took notice that 27 CR was there when the charge was preferred against him?—No, I did not notice him when I walked into the station.

50149. Did you notice him afterwards?—I noticed him afterwards.

50150. Did you see any of these other people charged. Did you see the woman ——— charged whom 27 CR had taken in?—I saw her placed in the dock.

50151. And charged?—Yes.

50152. You know what charging means. You read the charge over to them, and you ask them what they have to say?—Yes.

50153. Did you see the woman ——— who had been brought in by 22 CR charged. Did you see the female prisoner who was brought in by 22 CR charged?—Yes.

50154. You saw two women charged, one by 27 CR and one by 22 CR?—I saw the two women.

50155. Your attention was first attracted to one of these women in the custody of 22 CR in Piccadilly Circus, was it not?—Yes.

50156. Where abouts do you say you were standing? (Mr. R. D. Muir.) By the County Fire Office.

50157. (Earl Russell.) That is part of the Regent Street frontage, which is near to Glasshouse Street?—Yes.

50158. You were standing there?—Yes.

50159. Did you see the arrest of this woman, or did you not notice it until after the woman was arrested?—No, I did not see the arrest of the woman.

50160. You saw 22 CR crossing the Circus with a female prisoner. That is what you first saw?—Yes.

50161. And you saw a crowd?—I saw a crowd behind the constable.

50162. Did the crowd not interfere with your view at all?—Not with 22 CR.

50163. Not with your view of 22 CR?—No.

50164. Were you able to see 22 CR and his female prisoner all the way across from the pavement to the fountain?—I did not take notice of 22 CR; I saw him pass on.

50165. Tell me how much you did notice. Mr. Muir asked you the question, and this is what you said. You said you saw 22 CR with a female prisoner crossing the Circus by the fountain. That is what I understood you to say?—Yes.

50166. That is correct, is it?—Yes.

50167. Then I ask you did you see that he had a female prisoner with him?—Yes.

50168. Were you able to see him, and did you see him, the whole way from the pavement to the fountain?—Yes.

50169. And his female prisoner?—Yes.

50170. Did you see any man interfering with them at all?—No.

50171. Did you see that woman behaving badly at all?—No.

50172. Did you see her throw herself on the ground, or anything of that sort?—No.

50173. Did you see her struggle or fight?—No.

50174. You saw nothing more for the moment of 22 CR and his prisoner after they reached the fountain. Is that right?—Yes.

50175. But you saw 27 CR and his prisoner?—Yes.

50176. What did the prisoner of 27 CR do? Did she give any trouble?—Yes, she was resisting.

50177. Did you step off the pavement and come close to 27 CR and his prisoner to see what was going on?—I stepped off the pavement into the roadway.

50178. Did you see the prisoner of 27 CR throw herself down?—No.

50179. Did you hear her scream?—No.

50180. If she had screamed you would have been bound to hear her from where you were standing, would you not?—I may have done.

50181. When he was half way across to the fountain you were within a few yards, were you not?—Yes.

50182. The woman could not have screamed loudly without your hearing her, could she?—I cannot say that I noticed the woman screaming.

50183. You did not notice the woman screaming?—No.

50184. You are sure that she did not, in fact?—I did not hear her.

50185. You saw Mr. Y. Where did you first see Mr. Y, whom you afterwards took into custody?—In Piccadilly Circus.

50186. Close behind 27 CR and this woman?—When I first saw him he was in Piccadilly Circus, and he had the woman by the arm then.

50187. In the roadway or on the pavement?—In the roadway.

50188. Was it before or after 27 CR had reached the fountain?—Just about the fountain.

50189. What was he doing with the woman's arm?—Trying to pull her away from the constable.

50190. Did you hear what he was saying, or were you not close enough for that?—Yes, I heard Mr. Y say "go quietly ———," or something of that sort.

50191. Did he say something of this kind: "It is no good struggling; you will have to go; go quietly?"—I heard him say "go quietly."

50192. He said something of that kind?—Yes.

50193. Did you hear him say anything about "It is no good struggling?"—No.

50194. Did you hear him say later "Don't be silly; don't struggle; I will come and bail you out"?—No.

50195. You never heard him tell the woman not to be silly?—No.

50196. Did you see Mr. Y take a pocket-book out of his pocket and write in it?—No.

50197. Did you see him writing with a pencil at all?—No. I did not.

50198. Be careful. Did you not see him writing down either on a piece of paper or in a pocket-book the numbers of the constables in Piccadilly Circus, including yours?—No, I did not see him.

50199. You did not see him write anything?—No.

50200. Did you hear him say anything about the numbers?—No.

50201. I suggest to you that you saw him writing the numbers down, and that you said to him "You are writing it upside down." Did you say that?—No.

50202. "I should write it properly; it will be a lot of use to you when you get in the cell." Did you say that to him?—No.

50203. Nothing of the kind?—No.

50204. And you never saw him write anything?—No.

50205. Did you see him write anything in the police station?—No.

50206. Did you not see him write any numbers down there?—No.

50207. Did you have any conversation with him like what I have put to you at any time, either at the station or in the Circus?—No, there was no conversation at all.

50208. Never said anything of the sort?—No.

50209. And never saw him write anything at all?—No.

50210. Did you not hear him say anything about having an appointment with these women?—No.

50211. You heard what was said, I suppose, when he was charged, and when the women were charged at the police station?—No, I cannot say that I did.

50212. You were not paying any attention?—No.

50213. As to what happened in the station, you say you do not remember anything, do you?—No.

50214. Nothing at all?—No.

50215. (Mr. Dickinson.) You told us that after you took Mr. Y up he went quietly?—Yes.

50216. That was from Air Street as far as Half Moon Passage?—From where I arrested him in Regent Street.

50217. When you say he went quietly, did he not talk to you?—I do not remember his saying a word to me.

50218. Did he not argue with you at all?—No.

50219. We have had a witness who said he saw him arguing with you?—He was not saying a word to me.

50220. Did he ask you why you had arrested him?—I do not remember.

50221. Had you got physically hold of him at that time?—Yes. When I arrested him I caught hold of his right arm in the usual way.

50222. You say he went quietly. Would it be apparent to a person, seeing you and him together, that he was arrested or not?—They could see I had hold of the prisoner, and that I had him in custody.

50223. You had hold of him in such a way that anybody seeing you would know that he was under arrest?—Yes.

50224. Were there no policemen at the entrance to Half Moon Passage when you turned in?—No, I do not remember seeing any.

50225. Where was the crowd? The crowd was round about you and him, I suppose?—Yes.

50226. Do you remember whether he had a cap on?—A far as I remember, he had a cap on.

50227. What did you do with him when you got him to the station? What was the first thing you did?—I took him inside the station and let him stand there in the usual way.

50228. What do you call the "usual way"? Where did you put him—on a seat?—No, he stood up, and he was charged, and was there the whole time.

50229. In the charge room. Was there anything going on in the dock at that time?—Yes, I think somebody was being charged.

50230. Where were these two girls?—The two girls were being charged, as far as I remember; there was someone in the dock.

50231. As far as you remember, the girls were in the dock, when you came in, being charged?—Yes.

50232. Then did you put this man in the dock immediately afterwards?—No, Police-constable 27 CR put him in the dock.

50233. You said nothing to the prisoner on that occasion?—No.

50234. Can you remember what you said you had arrested him for?—No, I am afraid I cannot remember.

50235. You cannot remember how you arrested him, why you arrested him, or what you arrested him for?—No.

50236. Who was it who charged him?—Police-constable 27 CR.

50237. (Chairman.) Had you ever seen either of those women before?—No.

50238. Had you been on patrol duty for some little time before this occurrence?—I had been engaged on patrol duty from time to time.

50239. When had you begun your patrol duty?—On this night we were out specially.

50240. I rather gathered you were out on special duty?—Extra patrol.

50241. May I take it, being a Saturday night, a good many extra patrols were about in that part of the division?—On this occasion there was a large football match, and there were extra police.

50242. Then you were one of a considerable number of extra men who turned out to patrol that night?—Yes.

50243. So that in case there was any disturbance

P.C. W. H. J. Wood.
18 June 1907.

anywhere there were plenty of constables near by who could come quickly?—Yes.

50244. I mean, I suppose if opposite, say, the church in Piccadilly there was any disturbance, an affray of some kind, a noise, and some shouting, plenty of constables were at hand to rush to the place?—Yes.

50245. More than usual; at any rate, you say a good many more were turned out on special duty on this night?—Yes.

50246. I think I may take it, may I not, that if at any point there was a disturbance, as there was here outside Swan and Edgar's (we are told by you and the others that the woman who had been arrested was behaving violently, and somebody was endeavouring to rescue her), the constables would come up from every direction?—They may have come.

50247. You yourself were attracted by it?—Yes.

50248. As I understand it, you were standing near the County Fire Office, and you yourself voluntarily went when you saw your colleague was having some trouble with the prisoner?—Yes, when I saw the crowd.

50249. Did you notice whether any constables were marching that way as well?—No, I did not notice that.

50250. As I understand it, before you actually arrested Mr. Y and marched off with your prisoner, a large number of members of the public got between you and 27 CR and his prisoner?—Yes.

50251. You told Lord Russell there was a large crowd round 27 CR and his prisoner while you were ten yards off with Mr. Y. Is that so?—Yes.

50252. I may take it then that when you commenced to take your prisoner to the police station, 27 CR was ahead of you near Half Moon Passage with his prisoner, and there was a crowd between you and him. Is that so?—Yes.

50253. You did not actually see him, I understand, turning into Half Moon Passage?—No.

50254. Did the crowd give way before you, or did you have to order them off?—No, I simply walked through the crowd.

50255. Did you notice any constables in the crowd at that point besides the members of the public?—I did not notice any.

50256. A witness has told us that he saw a disturbance outside the Pavilion Music Hall—"There were several policemen's helmets in the crowd. I said to my friend, 'Here is an arrest; let us see what happens.'" I need not trouble you with the next sentence or two, but he followed the crowd into Regent Street. Then he said, "There is a big hoarding there." That is a hoarding we are told which was erected and was visible, in connection with the new hotel. You know the new hotel?—Yes.

50257. The hoarding is removed now. "There is a small passage way to Vine Street Police Station. Just up there the crowd were stopped by several policemen—I should think about six or seven of them—at this passage way. We got through, and were much surprised to see ——— arguing with a policeman." When you got to the corner of Half Moon Passage were there members of the public crowding round the entrance and trying to go down the passage ahead of you?—They were going down the passage.

50258. Following 27 CR and his prisoner?—Yes.

50259. Then, as I understand it, you took your prisoner into the passage, and the crowd made way for you, or did they continue on?—The crowd still walked down, and I walked down with them.

50260. Through the passage?—Yes, through the passage.

50261. When you got in front of the station with your prisoner, and these members of the public were crowding round, did you come across any members of the public in Vine Street. Was there a crowd in Vine Street?—Yes, there were some in Vine Street.

50262. Round the door of the police station?—Towards the police station.

50263. Were there constables amongst the crowd?—I did not see any.

50264. There was a man on the door, I suppose?—Yes, there is usually a man on the door.

50265. Of course, this is a good long time ago now, and I understand you made no note at all of what you saw or said, or of what was said to you that night?—No.

50266. So I rather gathered. You gave evidence at the police court?—Yes.

50267. And I suppose you had not heard anything about the matter until the other day—Friday or so?—Last Friday was the first I heard of it.

50268. Then Sub-divisional Inspector McKay spoke to you, I presume?—Yes.

50269. What I understand from you is that from the moment you arrested Mr. Y, and constable 27 CR went off with his prisoner, there was a surging crowd round him and round you as well. Is that so?—Yes, there was a crowd round him at the time.

50270. 27 CR and the crowd went into the passage, and you followed with your prisoner?—Yes.

50271. Was it a disorderly crowd in any way?—Simply a curious crowd.

50272. Were they booing, or making any noise?—No—simply in the ordinary way following in.

50273. They were not simply following you. A good many of them were preceding you, and following somebody else, as far as I can make out?—They were all going towards the station, or making towards the station.

50274. Was Half Moon Passage very full of people when you passed through it?—There were a lot of people passing there.

50275. On the whole it was rather a confused scene, was it—people walking before you, and walking round you, and more or less pushing you and your prisoner?—I do not say they were pushing me and the prisoner; some were going one way and some the other.

50276. Was the crowd so thick that you could not avoid touching them?—We touched them as we passed.

50277. But they made way for you. There was no attempt to rescue your prisoner?—No.

50278. Am I to understand he said nothing to you at all after the moment you arrested him until he was charged?—I do not remember his saying anything at all.

50279. Did you pause at all on the way. Was the block so great that you had to wait a moment at any point on the journey to the charge room?—No.

50280. A witness said: "Just up there"—that is when they got to Half Moon Passage—"the crowd were stopped by several policemen—I should think about six or seven of them—at this passage-way." Did you notice any constables trying to prevent the crowd from going into Half Moon Passage?—No, I did not see any at all.

50282. If he was behind you he could have seen you taking the prisoner up the steps into the station?—Yes.

50283. Are you sure that outside the station there was not any pause at all, and that you had no conversation with Mr. Y there?—No conversation whatever.

Sergeant Robert Samuel Lougton, C 20, sworn.

Sergeant R. Lougton.
18 June 1907.

50284. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Are you a police sergeant, stationed at Vine Street Police Station?—Yes.

50285. Did you join the Metropolitan Police Force on the 6th June, 1898?—Yes.

50286. Have you a clean defaulter's sheet?—Yes.

50287. Have you had the regular advances of pay?—Yes.

50288. Were you promoted to the rank of sergeant on the 18th July, 1904?—Yes.

50289. Did you have your first six years of service at Notting Hill?—Yes.

50290. Since then you have been on duty at Vine Street?—Yes.

50291. That is since the date of your promotion to the rank of sergeant?—Yes.

50292. On the night of the 21st April, 1906, were you on duty from 7 p.m. until 1 a.m. the following morning?—Yes.

50293. Were you in charge of the extra patrols?—Yes.

50294. Would it be your duty to see that the constables were doing their proper patrols?—Yes.

50295. Had each of them got a proper patrol allotted to them?—Yes.

50296. Were you outside the Pavilion Music Hall about half-past 12 on the morning of the 22nd?—Yes.

50297. Did you see two women in the custody of two constables?—Yes.

50298. The constables being 22 and 27 CR?—Yes.

50299. Did you notice the behaviour of the woman who was in custody of 22 CR?—After he arrested her outside the Piccadilly Restaurant she started to struggle a little way, and when opposite the fountain she struck him in the face.

50300. Did you see the actual arrest?—Yes.

50301. Was anybody with the woman at that time?—I never saw anybody.

50302. Was that woman taken away by 22 CR?—Yes.

50303. Did you see the woman who was in the custody of 27 CR?—Yes.

50304. What was she doing?—They started off, and they got about ten yards towards the Circus when she gave a scream, which caused a large crowd. They all rushed towards the spot and she struggled, and then she went quietly for some distance from Swan and Edgar's to almost Air Street. I was some distance behind, but there were a good many people and then they suddenly stopped again, and 27 was struggling with her, and the man who was subsequently arrested was trying to get this woman away. 155 then appeared on the scene at the same time as myself, and was told by 27 CR to take that man into custody.

50305. Who was that man?—The male prisoner Mr. Y I believe his name is. At the same time I got hold of the woman's arm and assisted them right into the station.

50306. How did you get into Vine Street?—I went straight up by Air Street, Regent Street, and down the passage. There was a temporary wooden platform erected at the time.

50307. Were there any constables at the entrance of Half Moon Passage?—No.

50308. Was there any obstruction to your getting down to the police station?—None whatever.

50309. You went into the station?—Yes.

50310. With 27 CR and his prisoner?—Yes.

50311. Did you see 155 C arrive?—He brought in the man.

50312. How long after you got in?—A matter of a few seconds, I might say—not more.

50313. Would it be true to say that Mr. Y was arrested at the fountain in Piccadilly?—No, it would not.

50314. Did you hear anyone say so at the police station or the police court?—I never attended the police court, and I never stopped in the police station.

50315. Did you go out to your duty of looking after the patrols after that?—Yes.

50316. You were in charge of the extra patrols?—Yes.

50317. Were there any extra patrols stationed across the entrance to Half Moon Passage?—No.

50318. (Earl Russell.) You saw the arrest of the two women?—Yes.

50319. You saw 27 C from the time he left the pavement to the time he reached the fountain in Piccadilly Circus?—Yes.

50320. You did not see Mr. Y there?—No.

50321. Do you know him by sight?—No, I should not know him.

50322. Will Mr. Y stand up. Would you recognise him?—No, I could not recognise him.

50323. But you did see him in the charge room at the station?—I only went to the door of the charge room with 27 C and his prisoner, and at the same time 155 was bringing in Mr. Y. They passed me on the steps, I believe.

50324. That is how you knew he was Mr. Y when you came in the station?—Yes.

50325. I put it to you that you just had time to go in the charge room with your prisoner and walk out again, and he was actually coming in in charge of 155?—That is right.

50326. You saw him then and you saw him outside Swan and Edgar's?—Yes.

50327. You knew when you met him on the steps of the station that he was the same man you had seen outside Swan and Edgar's?—I could not swear to that. I could not swear for certainty. 27 said, "Bring that man in," or words to that effect, and 155, who was there at the time, took him into custody.

50328. You swear to him not because he is a man you knew by sight, or because his name is Y, but because he was the prisoner of 155?—Yes.

50329. That is how you identify him?—Yes.

50330. You would have known him if you had seen him before that night taking a part in these disturbances?—Oh, yes.

50331. Are you quite sure he was not with these two women when they were arrested?—I never saw him. These two women were by themselves when they were arrested.

50332. Are you quite sure he was nowhere near 27 or his prisoner when he was crossing the Circus to the fountain?—I never saw him if he was. There was a large crowd in the Circus at the time.

50333. I began by asking you whether you were able to see Constable 27 from the time he left the pavement to the time he reached the fountain with his prisoner?—Yes.

50334. Were you able to see him?—Yes.

50335. To have a proper view of him the whole time?—Yes.

50336. Could you have seen any man who had spoken to him or spoken to the woman?—Yes.

50337. Did this man Y or any other man either speak to the constable or speak to the woman?—No.

50338. Did no other man come near him or come near the woman?—No.

50339. Between the pavement and the fountain?—No.

50340. Are you quite certain of that?—Positive.

50341. Then if Constable 27 says that half way between the pavement and the fountain this man Y took hold of the woman's arm and tried to pull her from him, that would not be true?—I never saw him.

50342. I do not ask you whether you saw it. That would not be true, would it?—I cannot say. I did not see him myself do so.

50343. Could it have happened without your seeing it?—Oh, yes.

50344. You think now it could?—It could have happened.

50345. I have asked you carefully twice. Do be careful. I have asked you to tell me if you could see anything that happened while they were crossing. You told me you had a clear view of them. Is that true or is that not true?—There were a lot of people about, and there may have been a lot between us, but I could see 27 quite distinctly.

50346. Had you got a clear view of 27 and his prisoner, or had you not?—You could not say exactly a clear view, because there were so many people about at the time.

50347. You told us exactly that you had a clear view?—I could see 27.

50348. A minute ago you said you had a clear view. What do you mean?—I could not have exactly a clear view.

Sergeant R. Longton.

18 June 1907.

50349. Now I have told you what he says you think you had not a clear view?—Not a positively clear view.

50350. You think that now?—Yes.

50351. But you did not think it a minute ago, did you?—(No answer.)

50352. Now tell me about 22, and how much you saw of him?—I saw but very little of him. As soon as he arrested his prisoner he went straight away till he got to the fountain.

50353. You are in a hurry to tell me about 22?—He went on first.

50354. You had a very bad view of him indeed?—Yes, I cannot say I had a good view of him.

50355. Did you see 22 at the moment when he laid his hand on the woman on the pavement outside the Pavilion?—Yes.

50356. Did you see him again when he reached the fountain in Piccadilly Circus?—Yes, I did.

50357. Take as long as you like in answering, but be sure about it. Did you or did you not?—Yes, I did.

50358. You are sure?—Yes.

50359. Did you see him all the time in between?—Not all the time to the station.

50360. Did you see him all the time between the pavement and the fountain?—Yes.

50361. You did?—Yes.

50362. And you saw everything that happened to him?—Yes.

50363. How far was he from 27 when they were crossing from the pavement to the fountain?—I should say a matter of 10 or 15 yards.

50364. The whole distance is only about 24 yards?—I should say about 10 yards.

50365. You may take it from me the distance is about 24 yards. Would you say that No. 22 was half way across with his prisoner before No. 27 started after him?—Roughly speaking, I should say 10 yards.

50366. Do you know what had delayed No. 27, and why he was not able to start and come up with No. 22?—Because 22's prisoner went quicker than the other one.

50367. But the one was still at the starting point when the other had got 12 yards?—Not exactly at the starting point. They started on the way to the station.

50368. By the time that 27, that is the one with the second prisoner, was half way across from the pavement to the fountain where do you think 22 was then?—He would be nearly at Swan and Edgar's corner then.

50369. You think while the one had gone 12 yards the other had gone about 50 or 60?—Not as much as that.

50370. 22 had no delay with his prisoner at all?—Not what you may call delay.

50371. No delay at the fountain at all?—When she struck him in the face no doubt he did hesitate a little while then, but only a matter of a few seconds.

50372. How did she strike him?—He was on the left side of her, and she struck him with her right hand. He was on the left side of her all the way up Regent Street. He had one hand like this (describing), and one at the back of the neck.

50373. Where did she strike him?—In the face.

50374. Which part of the face?—Across the mouth.

50375. With her open hand?—Yes.

50376. A stupid sort of silly woman's blow, with no strength in it?—That might be. She was not a very strong woman.

50377. Should you call that an assault on the police?—Yes.

50378. You would have charged her with an assault if you had been him?—Yes.

50379. Do you say it was one blow or two?—I only saw one blow.

50380. If he had the trouble of this blow and of catching the woman's hand at the fountain, will you tell me how it was the other constable, 27, was so far behind him. Surely the other constable must have been at least half way across before 22 left the fountain?—Unless, on account of the scream, the crowd had got in between them and impeded the second constable. That is the only reason.

50381. I think you said you saw the prisoner of No. 27 throw herself on the ground?—No.

50382. Struggle?—Struggle.

50383. Is it correct to say that was about half way from the pavement to the fountain?—Nearly half way, I should say.

50384. Had the first constable, 22, reached the fountain by then?—Yes, he was just about the foun tain.

50385. And therefore he was about 15 yards or 10 yards away?—About 10 yards.

50386. Did the woman scream at the same time?—The second prisoner of No. 27 did.

50387. Did she scream loud?—You would not call it a loud scream, but she screamed.

50388. I do not call it anything at all, but No. 27 did call it a loud scream?—She screamed.

50389. Was it a loud scream or not?—I have heard many scream louder.

50390. If 27 says she screamed loudly you would not agree with him?—We may differ in opinion as to the power of a scream.

50391. How far off were you when you heard her scream?—I was on the pavement then.

50392. Fifteen yards away?—Nearly that, I should think.

50393. Do you think it possible that 22 could not have heard her scream?—I do not know. There was a lot of traffic about at the time, and there was a great tumult there.

50394. There was just the same tumult between you and 27 as between 22 and 27?—Yes.

50395. I want to know what happened opposite Swan and Edgar's Were you following these prisoners up?—Yes.

50396. Which one in particular?—27.

50397. Because you heard the screaming and the struggling?—Yes.

50398. Were you following them up on the same pavement as they were, or were you in the roadway?—I believe I was on the pavement.

50399. Outside Swan and Edgar's was the first time that you saw Mr. Y?—Yes.

50400. The first time you saw him?—Yes.

50401. That you are quite sure of?—Yes.

50402. What was he doing there?—There was a great rush again, and I made my way as quick as I could to 27; his prisoner was struggling then, and this man Y, the male prisoner, had hold of her arm.

50403. How close were you at that time?—Close up.

(Chairman.) I do not want to shorten your cross-examination, Earl Russell, if you think the questions you are putting will seriously aid the view of the transactions which you are suggesting to us, but I do not think any good purpose is served by simply going over the same ground again and again.

(Earl Russell.) I am in the hands of the Commission, but it seems to me that when the sergeant says he had a full view of the transactions, and says that nobody, neither Y, nor any other man, approached 27, and his prisoner during that occurrence, whereas 27 swears definitely he did, it is rather material. But if you think it is not worth pursuing I will not pursue it.

(Chairman.) I thought you did make one point that there was a contradiction, or a seeming contradiction, between the evidence of 27 CR and the evidence of the sergeant. Then you go on to certain other things.

(Earl Russell.) I am in the unfortunate position that I cannot tell what contradiction will arise until I have probed the evidence, and I was not at all sure there might not be a contradiction with regard to what occurred outside Swan and Edgar's. But if the Commission do not desire me to pursue it I will not pursue it.

(Chairman.) I did not intend to stop you if you think your case is in any way assisted by it.

(Earl Russell.) As I say, I am in the position that I can never tell until I have asked questions what answer I may get.

(Chairman.) I do not stop you.

50404. (Earl Russell.) I will take it as shortly as I can. Would you just tell me when you saw Mr. Y and were quite close, what he was doing?—He was catching hold of the right arm of the female prisoner.

50405. What was he doing with it?—Trying to get her away.

50406. Pulling it?—Yes.

50407. Was he pulling her away from the other policeman?—Yes.

50408. Was he saying anything?—No. I never heard him say anything.

50409. Could he have said anything without your hearing it?—Yes.

50410. Although you were so close?—Yes.

50411. You think he might have been able to say something that you did not hear?—Yes.

50412. Then if he says he was advising her to go quietly you could not say that was not true?—I could not.

Sergeant R. Lougton.

18 June 1907.

50413. (Mr. Dickinson.) Who had hold of the right arm?—The prisoner, Mr. Y., had the left arm and 27 had the right.

50414. (Earl Russell.) You are not in a position to contradict any statement as to what he said at that time?—No.

50415. He might have said something that you did not hear?—Yes.

50416. He was not attempting to assault the policeman in any way?—No.

50417. I think you said you did hear Police-constable 27 order him to be taken into custody?—Yes.

50418. And 155 was in sight. Did you see 155?—He came there at the same time as I did.

50419. You did not watch to see whether he took him into custody or not?—No.

50420. You do not know what happened after that?—No.

50421. You went on with your prisoner?—Yes.

50422. That is the extent of your knowledge of it?—Yes.

Inspector ALBERT BEX, sworn.

Inspector A. Bex.

50423. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Are you an inspector of the F Division?—Yes.

50424. Are you stationed at Notting Hill?—Yes.

50425. Did you join the Metropolitan Police Force on 8th July, 1889?—Yes.

50426. Have you a clean defaulter's sheet?—Yes.

50427. You have had three rewards for police duty?—Yes.

50428. You have been inspector for two years and eight months?—Yes.

50429. And of that time two years and six months were at Vine Street?—Yes.

50430. That is up to the time you were removed to Notting Hill?—Yes.

50431. Did you take the charges against these three persons on the early morning of the 22nd April, 1906?—Yes.

50432. You see your handwriting on the charge sheet?—Yes.

50433. Had you gone on patrol duty before the women were bailed?—Yes.

50434. But you bailed the man out?—I bailed the man out at 2 o'clock.

50435. Have you any recollection at all of this case?—I have no recollection of it. All that I can go by is the records. I can see my handwriting here.

50436. How does it come that these charges are on three different charge sheets?—I should imagine that I should use this charge sheet first, and then I should put the charge on that, as there is just room for it, and I started a fresh sheet for this one.

50437. (Earl Russell.) I have no question to ask except with regard to the time. One charge is timed 12.30 and the other 12.35. Can you tell the Commission what would be the smallest difference that would arise between them. You do not book anything between the five minutes, I understand?—Not as a practice. If it is about five minutes I generally put it down.

50438. Can you tell me how near they were to each other. Would they come into the station within three minutes of each other, or would it be five minutes between the two charges?—I could not say. There might be a difference, but what the difference was I could not say.

50439. Could they possibly have come in within a minute of each other?—No, it would be nearer to 35 than to 30.

50440. You do not quite understand my question. One charge is given as 12.30 and the other is given as 12.35. It is not possible they could have come in together?—No.

50441. If they had they would be the same time then?—Yes.

50442. I want to know what the smallest difference between them is that would account for the difference of five minutes in putting them down?—I take it to the nearest five minutes of the clock.

50443. Then they might have been within one minute of each other?—Two and a-half. Possibly it may have been 2½ minutes over the 35, and I should have dated it back to the five minutes.

50444. You cannot really tell by simply looking at it?—No.

50445. Is the time that is written down here the time at which you put the person in the dock, and start taking the charge from the time when the person is first brought into the charge room?—The date and hour he is brought to the station when he comes into the station.

50446. Who books that?—I do. I take notice of it.

50447. You take notice of that even before you start formally taking the charge?—Yes.

50448. Supposing you had two prisoners, or were dealing with two prisoners, when one of these cases came in, you still would take the time he came in at and not the time at which he is charged?—I should say he came in at such and such a time if I looked at the clock, and I should put those two at 12.30. The clock is up high in the charge room, and you have almost to get up to look at it. Then I might say it is a few minutes after for this one, and I should put 12.35.

50449. Even if you did not charge him for five minutes or so, you would put down the time he was brought into the station?—Yes.

50450. (Mr. Dickinson.) You do not remember anything about this case?—No, I cannot recollect any of the incidents of the case.

50451. When was it first mentioned to you?—I think it was on Thursday evening.

50452. Have you tried to refresh your memory about it by looking at the records?—Yes.

50453. You could not recollect anything?—No.

50454. Did you have any conversation with any of the other policemen who were concerned in this case?—No, I did not.

50455. You have no recollection about any question of bail?—No. I see by the records that I myself bailed the man. That is in my handwriting.

50456. You have no recollection of any difficulty with regard to bail?—No.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That is all the evidence I have, Sir, except Inspector McKay, who will produce the records to show what has already been proved by Sergeant Lougton, that there were no special patrols on duty at the end of the passage.

(Chairman.) We will take that statement from you.

Inspector A. Bex.
18 June 1907.

It is not a statement you would challenge, Earl Russell?

(Earl Russell.) No.

(Chairman.) Will you make that statement, Mr. Muir?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Sergeant Lougton proved it. He was the officer who was actually on duty in charge of the special patrols.

(Earl Russell.) You are quite aware of the suggestion, Sir. It was not suggested that special policemen were ordered deliberately to stand across the passage as a permanent thing all night. That is not the suggestion.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It was rather suggested in the evidence of Mr. Y. that there was a string of men stationed there for the purpose. I want to prove that that was not so.

(Chairman.) There is no evidence of that besides that statement. It may have been a mistake.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) That is all the evidence I have to call in this case.

(Earl Russell.) I do not know, Sir, whether you propose to take any steps about the man ——— or about the cross-examination of the other witnesses.

(Chairman.) We will consider that. If we require ———attendance for examination we will summon him. We will take time to consider that.

(Earl Russell.) He has not been called upon at all yet, Sir.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) And the same would apply to the cross-examination of the complainant and his witnesses. You will let us know.

(Chairman.) We will let you know.

FIFTY-NINTH DAY.

Friday, 21st June 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).

Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esq., K.C., M.P.

Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at-Law).

Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esq. (Barrister-at-at-Law).

J. W. St. Lawrance Leslie, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).

J. F. Waley, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant-Secretary).

Patrick McCarthy, sworn.

P. McCarthy.
21 June 1907.

50457. (Chairman.) Your full name is Richard McCarthy?—No, Patrick. My name is a nickname.

50458. But you are commonly called Dick McCarthy?—Yes.

50459. You reside at 25, Pearman Street, Lambeth?—Yes.

50460. Do you know Alfred James Platt who has given evidence before this Commission?—Yes.

50461. Are you any relative of his?—Brother-in-law.

50462. Do you mean that you married his sister?—Yes.

50463. What is your occupation?—General dealer.

50464. Have you got a shop?—Yes.

50465. What do you sell?—Flowers, fruit, and all manner of things.

50466. Your shop is at 25, Pearman Street, is it?—No—25, Yardley Street.

50467. How long have you been engaged in the occupation of a general dealer?—Four or five years.

50468. What is your age?—Twenty-nine.

50469. Have you been engaged in the business of street bookmaking as well?—Only once.

50470. Will you tell us how you came to engage in it, and what kind of transactions you embarked upon?—The brothers Fisher came and asked me if I would take over their pitch, they were in a bad state, and me and my brother-in-law took it over.

50471. You said "the brothers Fisher." You were at school, I think, with one of the Fishers, were you not?—Yes.

50472. Which of the Fishers were you at school with?—I forget now—Bob or Bill—I forget which.

50473. How many of the Fishers did you know?—Only two of them.

50474. Two of them?—I know three of them, but I did not know the other one before I did business.

50475. We have had one named Christopher Robert; that is Bob, I suppose. What is the other one that you knew?—William.

50476. And what is the name of the other one that you now know?—I do not know his name. I believe it is Tom.

50477. You do know a third Fisher?—Yes.

50478. Before you went and took over this pitch from the Fishers had you known what business your brother-in-law, Platt, was doing?—Yes, he was a bookmaker, I think.

50479. A bookmaker, you think?—He was, I know.

50480. That was in 1906, I understand?—I cannot say when it was. I do not remember a thing like that. It was nothing to do with me when I was out of the business, I let it slip by me.

50481. In what year was this partnership or these transactions?—About twelve months ago, perhaps.

50482. That would be 1906?—Yes.

50483. How did you come to go into the business? Who first talked to you about it?—A little chap I had working for me.

50484. What was his name?—Frank Baxter.

50485. In consequence of something he said you went and saw the Fishers?—I believe Robert Fisher asked him at the time to ask me whether I would stand for him. I went up and saw him about it, and we took over the papers the very same day.

50486. "We took over the papers"?—Yes.

50487. Who are the "we"?—Me and my brother-in-law.

50488. Did you take over the pitch without seeing Platt on the matter at all?—No; Platt was there.

50489. Then, as I understand, after this message had come to you from Fisher you saw Platt?—No. Platt happened to be with me at the time that Baxter told me of it.

50490. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Baxter gave you the message when Platt was there?—Yes. Then we both went up to Fisher.

50491. (Chairman.) Then you and Platt went and saw Bob Fisher?—Yes.

50492. What was the arrangement come to between you and Bob Fisher?—We asked him how much he owed on the pitch. I believe he said £7 or £8, but I will not be certain now.

50493. What was the conversation. Tell us what you recollect about it. I have no statement from you, and therefore I cannot suggest anything to you. Will you tell us what took place?—I was not very well up in the business, and I left it all to Platt. We arranged to go half each.

50494. McCarthy and Platt were to have half each. Is that what you mean?—Yes.

50495. Fisher was to have nothing?—No; we paid him a wage.

50496. Then he was not a partner at all?—Who?

50497. Fisher?—No, he had a weekly wage.

50498. Was that arrangement altered afterwards?—I do not think so.

50499. What you wish us to understand is that Bob Fisher was not a partner with you and Platt at all, but that you and Platt were the two partners, and Bob Fisher was simply an agent or servant?—That is so.

50500. Paid weekly wages?—Yes. £2 a week he got.

50501. Were any other of the Fishers to come in at all in any way?—No, I believe Bill got 30s. and Bob got £2. Then we had to give Bill £2, I think.

50502. How did you manage the business? Did you give Platt any money at all, or did you and Platt jointly put up any money, put it in a bank or deposit it in any way?—No; we trusted one another. If we lost £10 we should have to put £5 each, and if we won we should have half each.

50503. What happened at the end of the first week?—I cannot recollect that. It has gone out of my head now.

50504. With regard to this partnership arrangement between you and Platt, or the arrangement that you and Platt made with the Fishers, did you put it into writing at all, or make any note of it?—No, I do not think so.

50505. Did you and Platt keep any books to show how you and he stood?—Yes, there were one or two books.

50506. Who kept those books?—We had one each, I think.

50507. You had one, and Platt had one. What did you put in those books? What was the purpose of those books?—I forget now—expenses, and one thing and another.

50508. You did not keep the names of the punters, or anything of that kind, in your book, I suppose, because you did not actually go on the pitch yourself very much?—I did not go there very much.

50509. Did you ever go on the pitch and take slips and money yourself?—I took the papers and money after the race time—after the time of the race.

50510. But you did not stand on the pitch?—No.

50511. And you did not keep a note of the names of the punters or anything of that kind?—No.

50512. I want to know what was put in your book?—I do not know now.

50513. Have you got it?—No; I destroyed everything after I had done with the business. I never expected anything of this.

50514. Have you ever seen Platt's books?—At the time I used to see his books. We took one another's word for it.

50515. I am talking of the book that you refer to that you had, and of the book that Platt had to show how you and Platt stood together?—It might show how we got on on the week, or anything of that kind. I cannot be certain of what it was now.

50516. What was the course of business after you commenced it with Platt? Did you go every race day to near the Sutton Arms?—Nearly every day.

50517. Was Platt there as well?—Yes.

50518. What part did you play? Did you stand on the pitch with Bob Fisher or with Bill Fisher?—No, I might just have a walk round till it was time to go and collect the papers. That was all.

50519. Did you collect the papers after every race or at the end of the day?—Just at the time of every race I would take the papers from him.

50520. What did you do when, at the end of the day's racing, you went and got the papers from Bob Fisher, supposing he was the man on the pitch?—We would put them in a bag and go home, and Platt and Fisher used to reckon them up.

50521. You did not get any money. You only got the slips?—No, not till we got home to Fisher's office.

50522. Does that mean not till you got home in Lambeth?—No—to Robert Fisher's.

50523. Then the course of business was that you or Platt collected after every race the slips. You took the slips away to Bob Fisher's place?—Yes.

50524. Then you waited for him to come?—He would go with us. We would wait till the last race, and we would have all the papers given in at the different times.

50525. Then during the time that Bob Fisher was on the pitch you used to collect the slips from him, and, when the racing was over for the day, you all three went to Fisher's?—That is it.

50526. What did you do when you got there?—They had to reckon up the papers and see how much money they had taken.

50527. Who kept the books? Was there a book produced each day?—I am sure I cannot say for certain now. It is 12 months ago. I have not bothered about thinking of such a thing as that.

50528. What I am thinking of is this. You have all three got to Fisher's, and you and Platt have got between you a lot of paper slips. That is so, as I understand it?—Yes.

50529. That you had collected during the day from Bob Fisher. Then Bob Fisher had the money, I suppose?—He would count it out on the table.

50530. He would count it out on the table. What was the course of business when he had counted it out?—We would take it, and, if we had lost, we should have to put something to it.

50531. We have not yet arrived at the question of whether there was any loss or not.

50532. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) What he put on the table did not correspond, according to what we have heard, with what the slips showed?—No.

50533. (Chairman.) Somebody entered the names of the punters in a book, and the amount of the bets, and so on?—Yes, what was owing.

50534. Then Fisher produced all the money he had got?—Yes. Several days there were £3 or £4 deficient in the papers. The papers would, perhaps, tally up to £20, and there would be perhaps £16 on the table.

50535. How did you arrange about the deficit?—After we took the papers the first day we were £9 7s. deficient in the takings. The papers were there, but the money was not.

50536. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The first day?—Yes.

50537. (Chairman.) The first day you were £9 wrong?—Yes.

50538. What happened on that?—Then we asked him to make out a list of how much he did owe, and I think it came to £40 odd, or something like that.

50539. That was at the time you were taking over Fisher's debts?—Yes. I asked him at the time before we took it over how much he owed, and he said £7 or £8.

50540. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You mean you found the first day he had paid out some £9 for the old debts out of the money which he had taken for you?—The people coming to have a bet had no money, and we were in the cart the first day on taking over the papers, so we had to go through with it.

50541. (Chairman.) I think I understand the general course of business. How long did that arrangement go on?—What—owing money?

50542. No, how long did your partnership with Platt last?—I think about six weeks—five or six weeks—I would not be certain.

50543. How did it come to an end?—I found I was not too well up in it, and it was too much work for me, and I left it.

50544. Do you mean it simply came to an end because it was too much work for you, or because you lost money on it?—I did lose money on it. I should have carried it on, but I thought it was too much work. I had to get up very early in the morning.

50545. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) To attend to your business?—Yes.

50546. (Chairman.) Did Bob Fisher come to you and say Platt owed him money? What he has told us is that Platt made off on the last day, only giving him a very small amount of money, and disappeared, leaving him to discharge the debts of the punters?—I do not know anything about that, much. I believe I heard something of it.

50547. Tell us in your own way how your partnership with Platt came to an end?—I lost all I could afford, and I turned it up; I let him have it.

50548. Did you see Platt and tell him that, or did you see Fisher and tell him, "You are no longer my servant?" As I understand the arrangement, Bob Fisher was your weekly servant?—Yes, Mr. Platt told him that I was out of the business.

50549. That was all. You did not see Bob Fisher again?—No, not for a week or two afterwards. He came to Covent Garden Market.

50550. When he came to you a week or two afterwards, what did he say?—He told me Platt had kept £20, or something like that.

50551. Was that all? Did he demand the £20 from you?—No. He knew I had nothing whatever to do with it.

50552. Both you and Bob Fisher remained friendly?—Yes.

50553. Did you sometimes hear talk between Platt and Bob Fisher as to the cause of the deficiencies or the difference between the money on the table and the amount mentioned in the slips?—I might have heard something, but I cannot really remember it now.

50554. Do you ever remember Platt saying something like this, for instance, "Give me a list of expenses"?—Yes.

50555. When the money was on the table, and the amount of money due to the punters was also made up, and you found there was a deficiency—on the first day you said it was £9—we know that that was very likely due to the transfer of the business; but on other days, as I understand it, there was sometimes a deficiency?—Yes.

50556. Then, I suppose, some excuse or some explanation was given by Bob Fisher?—Yes.

50557. Do you remember hearing Platt say, for instance, "Give me a list of expenses"?—Yes, I do.

50558. Did he use words like that?—Yes.

50559. Did you ever hear the matter of expenses discussed between Platt and Fisher in your presence?—No, I cannot say I did. I would not remember that now.

50560. Did you ever look at the list of expenses written in a book or on a slip of paper produced?—He would perhaps say "10s. expenses" or something like that. I would take no notice of it.

50561. That is rather what Fisher would say—something about 10s. Did you not inquire what the expenses were?—No, I do not know that I did now.

50562. What expenses would there be, do you think?—I cannot say now what they would be.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It was your money he was dealing with?

50563. (Chairman.) It was a vital thing for you?—There were only perhaps 8s. or 10s. a day, and we always looked for expenses.

50564. What were the expenses for? Did you understand that you were to pay for Platt's dinner or to pay for Fisher's dinner?—Yes, it might be that.

50565. Or any other outgoings they might incur or make?—Yes, it might be that.

50566. What outgoings? Did you ever hear any of the items discussed?—I cannot say for certain now, it is so long ago.

50567. Am I to understand that you did not really take much interest in the matter, but that you left it to Platt and Fisher, and you sat by?—Yes, I mostly left everything to Platt.

50568. You trusted Platt?—Yes.

50569. And it never occurred to you to ask what the expenses were for?—He might tell me at the time.

50570. Of course he might do so, but just think. You have told us you were carrying on the business, and you had for six weeks a try at it, and you lost money over it. Do you mean to say you did not during these weeks at all inquire what expenses were being incurred each day, if the word "expenses" was mentioned, as you say it was?—There would not be expenses every day, at least, nothing to speak of.

50571. But what were the expenses?—Drinks, or to give punters a little commission, or anything of that sort—drinks, and one thing and another.

50572. Were any other expenses referred to in the conversation?—I cannot remember now.

50573. Did you ever hear the word "tecs" mentioned or see in the paper or book "tecs"?—I might have heard so.

50574. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That means you did, does it not?—I believe I did.

50575. Yes, of course, it does. It means you did.

50576. (Chairman.) What did "tecs" mean?—Policemen, I suppose.

50577. Did you ever see in the list of expenses, or on any piece of paper ever produced at these interviews the word "coppers"?—Yes.

50578. What does "coppers" mean?—Policemen, I suppose.

50579. Did you ever look at any of the books that were kept by the Fishers?—No, I did not.

50580. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did you understand that there were payments being made to "tecs" and "coppers" as part of the expenses?—Yes. I knew there was that going on.

50581. Is that what you understood by the entries of "tecs" and "coppers" to account for the moneys that had been paid out?—Yes.

50582. (Chairman.) Look at that book. (Handing.) Look at it outside first. Do you recognise the book at all?—Yes, I believe this was Platt's book.

50583. You will see there is a little slip of paper put in. Look at the top of the page there, and just run your eye over it. Do you see there a list of expenses and various names put down?—I am not a very good scholar.

50584. Can you not read?—Not much.

50585. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Can you read that?—Yes—Leach.

50586. Do you remember anything about that?—I remember his mentioning something about it one day.

50587. What was it he mentioned?—He paid Leach 10s., or something of that.

50588. (Chairman.) What did that mean to you? Your own money was in question, remember.

50589. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You would want to know who Leach was, would you not, and what the 10s. was for? They were paying out your money?—I stood upon what Platt said. If he said he paid out 10s., I said "All right," and took no more notice of it.

50590. But you would want to know who Leach was, and why they were paying out 10s. They would tell you that in the ordinary course, would they not?—Yes, he might have said, "I gave a 'tec' 10s."

50591. When you say he might have said that, do you recollect his saying it?—He did say that.

50592. "I gave a 'tec' 10s." You mean that is the explanation of the entry of "Leach, 10s."?—Yes.

50593. That is what you understood?—Yes.

50594. Is that right?—Yes.

50595. I see that is the only entry of 10s. on that day. Did you know Leach?—No.

50596. Now will you look at this book. This is A.P.1. Do you know whose handwriting that is?—No.

50597. We are told that it is Fisher's handwriting. Do you see that entry?—Yes, I see it.

50598. "Expenses—L——g." Do you remember anything about that?—No.

50599. Altogether £1 9s. is accounted for there?—I cannot remember it now. I have forgotten all about this thing.

50600. You have forgotten about these particular items?—Everything. I wiped it out of my head just after I finished. I might mention the thing on the day and it would be settled.

50601. (Chairman.) Am I to understand that the police or detectives were referred to at these interviews when you were settling the accounts?—Yes; they might say, "I gave some man 10s. or 5s.," or whatever it might be.

50602. What I want to know is whether it was part of the business that payment to detective officers, as you gathered from these interviews, was a regular matter of expense each day or each week?—Yes, I believe it was.

50603. And you left all that matter to Platt?—Yes.

50604. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Was it Platt who always paid out the money?—No.

50605. I understood Fisher had to bring the money back which he had taken?—Yes.

50606. And you, Platt, and Fisher met, and then an account of the money was given for that day?—Yes.

50607. He would say, "I have taken so much; I have so many slips; So-and-So has not paid; the balance of the money is money spent"?—Yes, that would be answered for on settling up.

50608. What I want to know from you is this. Did you understand, during the course of these meetings in the five or six weeks you were in the business, from Fisher that part of the expenses were payments to the police and detectives?—Yes, he mentioned it several times—"I gave So-and-So 10s. or 5s."

50609. You say "So-and-So"?—I cannot remember the name.

50610. You cannot remember the name, but you mean it was the police or detectives?—Yes.

50611. Who was it who mentioned this?—Robert.

50612. Robert Fisher?—Yes.

50613. I suppose you understood that that was part of the system, did you not?—I knew it had to be done.

50614. Anyhow, whether it was right or wrong, you were new to the business, and you were told by one or other of them that that had to be done. Is that right?—Yes.

50615. Who told you, do you remember?—Robert Fisher.

50616. Do you remember what he told you about it—I do not mean the exact words, but nearly, as far as you can recollect, what was the substance of what he said about that?—I believe Platt asked him did he have anybody round there all right, and he said "Yes."

50617. "Did he have anybody round there all right"?—On his beat.

50618. I am not sure that I understand what that means. "Did he have anybody round there on his beat all right"?—Did he have the police all right he meant.

50619. What did you understand that to mean?—To let him bet.

50620. What did Fisher say?—He said "Yes."

50621. Did he say how he had got them all right?—We knew how he had got them all right.

50622. I do not quite understand. He said what?—He said, "We will have to give them half-a-sovereign now and again when they come round."

50623. Who said that?—Robert.

50624. (Chairman.) Then I understand that the deductions for expenses included sometimes a commission to some punter or to somebody who obtained a punter for you?—Yes.

50625. There were these other expenses for "tecs" or "coppers," or 10s. for one of them when they came round, and that sort of thing?—Yes.

50626. Were any other deductions made?—I cannot say for certain now.

50627. Were any other excuses made for the non-production of more money or of the right quantity of money?—A man might have a bet and owe it.

50628. You mean a bet on the nod?—Yes.

50629. A punter gave the slip, but he did not give the money at the moment, and Fisher trusted him. That is what you mean?—Yes.

50630. Then this business, as far as you were concerned, came to an end in about six weeks—at the end of June?—Yes, in five or six weeks.

(Chairman.) Have you any questions to ask, Mr. Muir?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) No, thank you, Sir.

(Chairman.) Mr. Platt, would you like to ask any questions?

(Mr. Platt.) Yes, Sir.

50631. These books were made up every evening?—Yes, at the table.

50632. In your presence, in Robert Fisher's presence, in William Fisher's presence, and in mine?—Yes.

50633. When the money was put on the table, and the slips accounted for, they had to account for the list of their expenses, which was made in your presence?—Yes.

50634. And you heard each and every item called over?—Yes.

50635. All these items under the list of expenditure was what Robert Fisher and William Fisher had to satisfy you and I of the moneys they were deficient of?—Yes.

50636. And what is there in their own handwriting is the truth?—Yes.

50637. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do I understand that you used to see these little books?—The items were called over on the day.

50638. What were you yourself actually doing at these meetings? Did you write out anything or call anything out?—No, I simply got the papers—the 2s., the 3s., and the 4s. papers—and pinned them all together.

50639. Having got them all together you would call out the names?—No, they would mark the paper 4s.—they would be marked—and, after that, they would go through them and reckon up how much they came to.

50640. Those were the papers with the names on?—Yes, the punters' names.

50641. Then there was a list of punters in those books?—The amounts paid out.

50642. Do you remember at all when these books were written out?—They would be written out every night—what we had to pay out.

50643. They were written out at these meetings?—Yes.

50644. When you all sat down at the table?—Yes.

50645. Then I suppose you did not see these books?—They were put in a bag.

50646. Did you check them at all to see whether they were right?—No.

50647. I do not know whether you can read sufficiently to read the first item on that page (handing). What should you say it is?—I do not know.

50648. You cannot make it out at all?—No.

50649. It is 16s. 6d. for something that looks like "tea." Do you remember ever having been charged for tea? Was it usual to charge for tea?—We used to pay after we settled up the papers.

50650. Would you say that item was at all likely to be an item for tea? Would it be likely for you to pay a sum like that for tea?—No—3s. or 4s., or 4s. or 5s.

50651. Fisher said that that word means "tea." Do you remember anything being put down for coffee?—No, never.

50652. Was there ever any suggestion that coffee was to be paid for?—I do not know that we ever had coffee.

50653. Did you know you were losing money during that time?—Yes.

50654. How soon after you started did you find it was not a paying business?—I do not think we ever won there; we might have won one day and lost the next, and so it went on.

50655. Were you at all anxious about the future?—No.

50656. You thought you would take your chance?—Yes.

50657. Did you have to put down money of your own?—If we lost £10 a day, I should have to find £5, and Platt would have to find £5.

50658. You actually had to find money of your own?—Yes.

P. McCarthy.
21 June 1907.

50659. All this time did you think that Platt was treating you honestly?—Yes, I thought so.

50660. Do you know at all whether he made a profit at that time?—I do not think he did. I know exactly how he had to get his money.

50661. Then you know he had to draw on his money to make good his losses?—Yes.

50662. Did you ever raise any objection to this system of paying the police?—No, I do not think I did.

50663. You looked upon it as usual?—I left it all entirely in Platt's hands. I did not understand the business much, and I left it to him.

50664. I understand from you it was Fisher who told you it was usual. Was that so? It was not Platt?—No, not Platt.

50665. Fisher said it was usual?—Yes.

50666. We have only had a certain number of these books before us, but do you know how often an expense like that would be put down? Do I understand, first of all, that you had this account every day?—Not every day "Police" I should think.

50667. You had to make up the books every day?—Only these items.

50668. That was every day?—Yes.

50669. How often in the course of the week would an item like this—"Police" or "Tecs"—be brought to your notice?—I cannot say for certain now, but once or twice.

50670. Once or twice a week or once or twice during the whole time?—Once or twice a week.

50671. Then you looked upon it as a regular expense?—Yes.

50672. And not as an occasional expense?—No.

50673. What sort of a book was it that you kept yourself?—Similar to that. The one was like the other.

50674. One like this?—Yes.

50675. In that book did you make any calculations so as to show what amount of money was due to you, and what amount of money was due to Platt?—No.

50676. How did you settle up as between you and Platt?—If we lost £5 on the day, that was all I knew of it. I left everything else in his hands.

50677. You paid it up?—I paid 50s.

50678. Supposing you won?—I would have half the winnings.

50679. In cash?—Yes. If there was £20 taken, and we had won £10, we would know that at the table.

50680. You would put it in your pocket on the spot?—I might give £5 to Platt.

50681. Then you did have a bank or he had some capital to go on with?—Yes.

50682. Supposing you had made £10 in a day, £5 of that would be yours and £5 would be Platt's?—Yes.

50683. Then it might happen he had not enough money in hand, and you might hand over £5?—Or he might hand it to me.

50684. Would there be any account of that transaction put down?—We never bothered; we took one another's word for that.

50685. You would remember how much?—Yes.

50686. Did you try to make your book agree with his book? In this book there are many entries which are not merely entries of expenses?—He would make the two books out practically the same.

50687. He would make the two books out, and you would keep one of them?—Yes.

50688. (Chairman.) Just one or two more questions. I think you told me positively that neither of the Fishers became a partner with you and Platt?—No.

50689. Are you certain of that?—Yes.

50690. I think it was William Fisher who sent the messenger to you?—I would not say whether it was Bill or Bob, but one of them.

50691. Was the interview on a Monday?—It might have been; I do not know now—on Monday or Tuesday.

50692. I rather think you agree with this which was said by Bill Fisher: "I sent word that I would like to see him, and he came one Monday morning with Platt, and met me near Sutton Street"?—Quite right.

50693. That is true, is it?—Yes.

50694. Before that time did he know Platt? Did you know whether they were acquaintances?—No, I do not think he knew him.

50695. You were the person who introduced Platt to Bill Fisher or Bill Fisher to Platt, putting it whichever way you like?—Yes.

50696. Then Bill Fisher said this: "He" (that is Platt) "asked us the position we were in, and I gave it to him as well as I could. In arranging terms he said, 'What do you think if I give you £2 a week and a third of the profits, would you think that would be satisfactory?' I said that would do nicely." Bill Fisher said that. Do you recollect those words being used?—No.

50697. Did Bill Fisher then take you to see Robert Fisher or Bob Fisher?—I would not be certain whether Bob Fisher was not there—both of them.

50698. When the conversation commenced were you four together or three together?—I could not say for certain now.

50699. What Bill Fisher has told us is this: "I said 'If you will come to my brother, he is just round the corner, and see him as well, and just settle it, no doubt it will be all right.'" You and Platt having met Bill Fisher do you remember that he suggested that you should go and see Bob?—Yes, I believe that was it.

50700. You think that is so?—Yes.

50701. Now that your recollection has been refreshed are you quite certain nothing was said about one-third of the profits to go to Bill Fisher?—No.

50702. What is your answer to my question?—There never was such a suggestion as that.

50703. You are quite certain about that?—Yes.

50704. Did you hear the names of any of the punters discussed at any of the interviews, or the nicknames?—No, I cannot say I did. I do not remember now.

50705. (Mr. Dickinson.) Were you in the habit of having tea on Saturdays?—Yes, I think we were.

50706. Where did you have tea?—At William Fisher's place.

50707. Do you remember whether they charged for that?—Yes.

50708. They did charge for that?—Yes.

50709. That is what you say they charged 4s. for?—4s. or 5s. some days.

JAMES EDGAR LLOYD, sworn.

J. E. Lloyd.

50710. (Chairman.) Is your name James Edgar Lloyd?—Yes.

50711. Do you live at No. 10, King's Cross Road?—Yes.

50712. You were formerly a billiard marker at the Union Tavern, King's Cross Road, I understand?—Yes.

50713. How long were you employed there?—Sixteen months.

50714. From what date to what date?—From Easter Tuesday, 1905, I think it would be, until about July, 1906.

50715. I suppose a good many people came and used the billiard room?—I had several regular customers, but very seldom strangers—now and again.

50716. I suppose now and again a stranger would come to the place habitually for perhaps a week or a fortnight, or a little longer, and then disappear, and then you would see no more of him?—Yes, that would happen occasionally.

50717. Do you remember a dark man coming there to play with whom you had conversation, and whom you gathered to be a detective?—Yes, I do.

50718. About what time was that?—It was sometimes in the afternoon and sometimes in the evening.

50719. It was between April 25th, 1905, and July, 1906. About what time of the year would it be?—It would be nearer Christmas.

50720. You cannot say whether it was in December or January?—It was before Christmas; I should think it would be between October or November and Christmas.

50721. Did you find out the gentleman's name?—No.

50722. Or did he tell you his name?—No.

50723. What did you gather his particular business in that neighbourhood was?—My idea was that he was perhaps shadowing somebody at Rowton House.

50724. Is that opposite the tavern?—Yes, right opposite the billiard-room window.

50725. Was that notion formed from conversation you had with him?—No.

50726. From his manner?—Yes. That was my idea. I never asked him the question.

50727. Did you have a conversation with him?—On one or two occasions simply on billiards.

50728. Do you see him in Court now?—No, I do not recognise him.

50729. I myself do not know whether he is in Court, but you do not recognise him?—No.

50730. That is to say, you do not see him in Court now?—No.

(Mr. Platt.) Might the witness have a closer view?

50731. (Chairman.) Yes?—Will you step down and have a closer view?—(The witness having looked round the Court.) I cannot recognise him at all.

50732. Do you remember his playing once with a man who might be described as fair?—Yes.

50733. Who was that fair man?—The fair man is that man. (Pointing to Mr. Platt.)

50734. He played how many times, do you think?—I only remember him playing once, but I remember the other playing perhaps three or it may be four times.

50735. Was the dark man a tall or a short man?—A tall man.

50736. You are certain that the tall man is not now in Court?—I am not certain that he is not here, but I fail to recognise him.

(Chairman.) Is Sergeant Bex in Court?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) Yes.

(Chairman.) You do not see anybody whom you recognise as being the dark man.

(Witness.) No, I do not.

(Chairman.) Will Sergeant Bex stand forward? (Sergeant Bex stood up in Court.)

(Witness.) No, I do not recognise him now.

50737. (Chairman.) Have you any questions to ask, Mr. Muir?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) No, Sir, thank you.

(Chairman.) Have you any questions to ask, Mr. Platt?

50738. (Mr. Platt.) Yes, Sir. On the night that he played billiards at the house in King's Cross Road there was an altercation over the money that should be paid for the billiards?—Yes.

50739. The dark man left the house to get the money and to come back to pay you?—And you left with him.

50740. I left with him, and we came back?—Yes, and the dark man paid me.

50741. (Mr. Dickinson.) Just tell me a bit more about that altercation. Do you remember anything about it?—I think, as near as I can remember, there might be seven, eight, or nine games owing for, which made 7s., 8s., or 9s., and after the game was over I had a trouble to get the money.

J. E. Lloyd

50742. From whom?—From either of them. There were nine games played, and that represented 9s.; but whether it was five and four or six and three I do not know. I could not get the money in the room, and I followed them down into the bar, and there they sat talking together for some time. Then the dark man said to the fair man, "Pay up." Whether he said "Pay your share" or "Pay up" I do not know, but the dark man seemed to think that the fair one ought to pay his share. That is what I concluded from the conversation. After some time they left, and I thought I should never see them again. I was anxious about the money; but they came back again, and the dark man paid the money that was owing. I thanked him very much, I had a drink, and I do not remember seeing him again.

50743. The fair man I understand you to say is Platt?—Yes.

50744. That you have no doubt about?—No doubt about.

50745. The dark man is the man you said you had seen on occasions there?—Yes.

50746. What did you know about this dark man?—Nothing at all, only that he came there to play billiards twice or three times, and I had spoken to him once or twice.

50747. What did you say just now to the Chairman about Rowton House?—I thought he was watching somebody at Rowton House, because he would sit there sometimes before playing.

50748. He had not said anything to you about it?—No.

50749. Is Rowton House opposite?—Exactly opposite the billiard room window.

50750. When did the idea occur to you that he was watching Rowton House?—I can scarcely explain myself, but I had an idea in my own mind that he was watching somebody there, and that it was important to watch anybody going in or out.

50751. That idea occurred to you about October?—Yes, between October and Christmas.

50752. Has anybody ever mentioned this matter to you?—No.

50753. Not at all?—Yes, I have had a gentleman round at my place in King's Cross Road asking me if I had been marker at the Union Public-house, and I said yes.

50754. Did he mention anything to you about Rowton House?—No.

50755. Is this the first time you have said anything about Rowton House?—No, I made a statement, and in my statement I said I thought he was watching Rowton House.

50756. (Chairman.) Did the dark man play with anybody except Platt?—He might have had one or two games with other people. There were two tables there.

50757. He must, must he not; because you said on one occasion he did play with the fair man, and he came in several times?—Only to my memory, but I was not always in the billiard room. I am a silversmith by trade, but work fell off, and, as I have several children, I took over the billiard room to earn wages to assist me. Sometimes I did not get there till seven o'clock in the evening, but I left a deputy in the room, or a friend, who would see to the room for me during my absence at times.

50758. Did the dark man ever play with your friend?—He may have done, but not in my presence.

HARRY CHAPMAN, sworn.

50759. (Chairman.) You are Harry Chapman, of 72, Cornwall Road, Lambeth?—Yes.

50760. What is your business?—A newsagent.

50761. Have you got a shop at this place, Cornwall Road?—Yes.

50762. You sell newspapers?—Yes, tobacco and sweets.

50763. Have you been, during the last few years, doing any other work than that?—I have been a street bookmaker.

H. Chapman.

50764. Do you know Platt?—Yes.

50765. How long have you known him?—Since 1903, on and off.

50766. Where did you carry on your bookmaking

H. Chapman. 21 June 1907.

operations in Lambeth?—In different parts of Lambeth.

50767. Where was your usual pitch?—In 1903, do you mean?

50768. Yes?—In Millman Place, Bloomsbury.

50769. Were you arrested? I think we have seen your name?—Yes.

50770. How many times?—A number of times—I have not kept count.

50771. Was it in your case that there was an appeal to Newington Quarter Sessions?—Yes.

50772. Your name has been sent to us as a witness who could throw light upon the suggestion that bookmakers in that part of the metropolis bribed the police. What have you to say about it?—Nothing much, only my own case.

50773. What was your own case?—I was summoned for frequenting Millman Place.

50774. Have you heard the allegations made by Platt against the police in the L Division?—I have heard that he alleged that they had been bribed.

50775. What do you say to that?—I have not had anything to do with that. I have never bribed the police.

50776. Did you know Constable Deed, who was afterwards dismissed from the force?—Yes, I knew he was dismissed.

50777. Was he the man who arrested you?—No; he summoned me.

50778. He was the man who summoned you, and he was the principal witness?—No—204 L. Deed was dismissed before my case came on for hearing.

50779. Then all you come forward to tell us is that you know nothing about the police having received money from yourself and others?—Only what I have heard.

(Chairman.) Do you, Mr. Platt, wish to ask this witness any questions, because I have no statement from the witness. His name was handed to the Commission, and we have asked him to come.

50780. (Mr. Platt.) Yes, Sir. All the transactions with the police were done with your late stepfather?—Yes.

50781. You know that at 72, Cornwall Road, you have had Deed in your shop?—Yes.

50782. You know it is compulsory with us in the L Division to give each and every one of these men on that special duty money?—I have heard so.

50783. You have known it yourself?—No, because I was only a clerk.

50784. In November, 1903, did you pay a fine of £15 6s. for one of your men?—Yes.

50785. Did you pay the money yourself?—I did.

50786. You know it is the usual thing for us men in the L Division to give this money?—I have heard it.

50787. You know everyone does it. You know that every man of my avocation does it?—I have heard of it.

50788. (Chairman.) I do not quite understand how you know it unless you have actually seen somebody give the money?—I have never seen it, but they say they have done it.

50789. Who say—the police?—No, the police do not say it.

50790. Then who say it?—Other bookmakers have said it.

50791. Other bookmakers have told you?—Yes.

50792. Have you seen any bookmaker give any sum of money to any policeman in that division?—No.

50793. Or in any other division?—No. I have only been in one division.

50794. Did you ever stand upon the pitch yourself?—Yes, every day.

50795. Has any policeman ever suggested to you that you should pay him anything?—No.

50796. Then, if it is a custom to pay something to the police, how is it that you have not done so?—Because I thought it was not worth while, and because there are so many bookmakers round there that they could not all escape.

50797. I do not quite understand your position. You come to tell us you believe that other bookmakers are in the habit, or have been in the habit, of paying money?—I have heard that they have been in the habit of doing it, but I have never seen it, and I have never done it.

50798. No policeman has ever suggested that you ought to do it?—No.

50799. And the only basis that you have for your opinion is that bookmakers have told you that they have paid money to the police?—Not exactly bookmakers, but other people in the street have said they have seen them in company with bookmakers.

50800. At any rate, you have never seen anything of the kind yourself?—No.

50801. You are often with other street bookmakers, I suppose?—Not now, but I have been in the past.

50802. In 1903 and 1904 you were active, as I gather from the questions?—Between November and January I was doing nothing, because I was waiting for my appeal to come on.

50803. You were a good deal with street bookmakers then talking to them?—No.

50804. Did you not know the others?—I knew them.

50805. You knew Platt?—He was nowhere near me.

50806. And the others?—Yes, I knew them by sight and by name, but I did not have much to do with them.

50807. You were acting for your stepfather?—Yes.

50808. What was his name?—Frank Ettwell.

50809. He had been arrested?—Yes.

50810. I thought his name was familiar to me. You were sometimes about with him?—I used to do it for him; I was only his clerk.

50811. Have you ever seen him with a policeman?—No.

50812. You have never seen him paying any money to policemen?—No, never.

50813. Did you keep his books?—He kept his own books.

50814. How long did you act for him?—Seven or eight years.

50815. And during all that time you yourself never paid anything to a policeman?—No.

50816. And never heard of your principal having done so?—I did not know what he did—I was only an employee.

50817. Do you suggest that he did so?—I could not tell you.

50818. (Mr. Dickinson.) Who was your step-father?—Frank Ettwell.

50819. When did his business cease?—Last October, when he died.

50820. What are you doing now?—I have a newsagent's shop.

50821. Have you given up street bookmaking?—Yes—after his death.

50822. Then during all that time you were merely his subordinate?—Yes.

50823. In this appeal case Platt came and gave evidence, did he not?—Yes.

50824. Did he say anything then about having bribed the police?—Yes, to the Chairman, in his evidence.

50825. Had you heard anything of that before the case came on?—At the police court.

50826. I do not quite understand what you meant when you said you did not bribe the police or offer them money because you thought it was not worth while because you could not all escape. What did you mean by that? Did you mean they were taken up less often than you were?—The police were more after me than they were after them, so I had a good escape.

50827. You were not caught many times?—No, the others gave me warning of the approach of the police.

50828. Did you think that the other bookmakers were taking other means of escaping from the police?—No.

50829. They did not get off so well as you?—No.

50830. I do not yet quite understand what you meant by saying you could not all escape?—They took more trouble to come for me than they did the other bookmakers.

50831. That would have been rather a reason for you to have paid them money, would it not?—It was against my grain to bribe the police.

50832. I suppose you knew the police who were engaged there on this work?—Yes. There were different men. Do you mean in this case when I was summoned?

50833. Yes?—They had had me in custody before.

50834. Did you know that the police were in the habit of turning out in disguise in order to catch bookmakers?—Yes; they have been out after me in disguise.

50835. So that you were awake to that?—Yes.

50836. Did you keep watch on the police station?—No; I could generally find out who were coming out.

50837. It looked as if the police in that Division were trying to catch bookmakers?—Yes.

50838. Had you ever heard any suggestion that the time of arrest was arranged?—No.

50839. In the gossip you heard you had not heard that?—No. When I was arrested I was taken away at once.

50840. Is that a system you know nothing about?—I have heard of it in this case, but not before.

50841. You never heard of any suggestion that they arranged the time?—No.

50842. You have only heard of what Platt has said?—Yes.

50843. I suppose you were afraid of the police?—Yes.

50844. (Chairman.) How many bookmakers do you think there were carrying on their avocation in Lambeth?—Lambeth is a big district. There were only two beside myself generally there.

50845. Were there a good many others in other parts of Lambeth?—Yes, in different parts.

50846. I am asking you these questions because you told me when I was examining you before there were a great many bookmakers. What did you mean by the words "great many"? Do you think there were 100 or 150?—No, not so many as that. There may have been a lot in the district. Lambeth is a big place. H. Chapman. 21 June 1907.

50847. It is. You were engaged in the business for seven or eight years, were you not?—Yes.

50848. Were you always on the same pitch?—I had to go away somewhere when the police were there.

50849. Had you opportunities of finding out who the other men engaged in arresting the bookmakers were?—Yes.

50850. You made no secret amongst yourselves as to what your business was?—No.

50851. How many bookmakers do you think were carrying on business there in 1903 and 1904?—I should say about a dozen all round.

(Mr. Platt.) May I ask the witness another question?

(Chairman.) You must put it through me, and I will put it if I think right.

50852. (Mr. Platt.) Was there another bookmaker of the name of Durant within a few yards of where this Mr. Chapman's late stepfather betted who gave the police money?—Yes.

50853. You never saw any money pass?—No.

50854. But you knew they gave them money?—I did not know. I heard so.

50855. (Chairman.) That does not carry it any further. You never saw this man Durant pay any money to the police?—No.

50856. And you never saw it in any book that was kept by you?—No. I did not keep the books.

50857. You never had to enter any payments of that kind in any book kept by you?—No. Mr. Ettwell kept his own books.

HARRY JONES, sworn.

50858. (Chairman.) You live at 151, Gray's Inn Road?—Yes.

50859. What is your business?—A bookmaker.

50860. That is your sole business?—No, not my sole business; I have a hand in another business at Covent Garden.

50861. That is an ordinary Covent Garden business?—Yes.

50862. How long have you been carrying on this business of a street bookmaker?—A matter of about seven years. I might tell you that I am not a street bookmaker now.

50863. Is that since the new Act has come into force?—Yes.

50864. But for seven years before this year you did carry on the business of a street bookmaker?—Yes.

50865. Are you a Londoner born and bred?—Yes.

50866. What is your age now?—32.

50867. What had you been doing before you commenced your business of a street bookmaker?—I was in business with my father.

50868. What kind of business?—In Covent Garden—in the fruit business.

50869. Did you some time ago make the acquaintance of Alfred James Platt?—Yes, I made the acquaintance of him.

50870. When did you first make his acquaintance?—I could not say to the date.

50871. The year?—I suppose I have known him about 18 months.

50872. From now?—Yes, about 18 months; it might be a month more or less one way or the other.

50873. That would be about the end of the year 1905?—Yes, about that.

50874. You never met him before that?—Not that I know of.

50875. Was it after Christmas, 1905, that you met him?—I cannot say for certain.

50876. How did you come to make his acquaintance?—The first time I met him, to my knowledge, was when I was having breakfast one morning at a place in Covent Garden. H. Jones.

50877. You got into conversation with him?—Yes.

50878. Was it a public-house?—No, a coffee shop.

50879. What took place between you?—Nothing—simply conversation over the breakfast table—nothing of any importance—talking racing matters and one or two other matters.

50880. Had he betted with you anywhere before that?—No.

50881. You found out that he was interested in racing matters like yourself?—Yes.

50882. That was your first meeting?—That was my first meeting with him.

50883. What did that lead to? Did it lead to anything like a friendship between you?—No, no particular friendship, except that we knew one another.

50884. Did you meet about Covent Garden?—I saw him about Covent Garden, and used to engage in conversation with him, principally on racing matters when we met, but not the slightest sign of friendship. I mean to say I never accompanied him in any pleasure outing or anything like that.

50885. Did you know Bob Fisher or Bill Fisher at that time?—I knew Bill Fisher, I had known Bill Fisher a matter of about four years, but I did not make the acquaintance of Bob Fisher until after Platt had severed his connection with them.

50886. But Bill Fisher you had known?—For about four or five years.

50887. Had you had any business dealings with Fisher before last year?—No, nothing at all.

50888. Not even made a bet with him or anything of that kind?—No.

50889. Did you know that he was a street bookmaker—Yes.

H. Jones.

21 June 1907.

50890. And you knew which part of London he carried on the business in?—Yes.

50891. Did you ever see him at it at all?—No.

50892. When did you have the first business deal of any kind with Bill Fisher or Bob Fisher?—The first deal that I had with Bill and Bob Fisher was after this man Platt severed his connection with them. He came to me in Covent Garden one Saturday morning and told me that he was in terrible trouble with regard to this man Platt running away with some money, and they did not know how to face the punters, and could I take him in hand in any way to see him through the thing as he did not wish to get a bad name. I beg your pardon, but I am telling you wrong. The brother Bill came to me on the Friday night and was inquiring if I knew where he could find Platt. I said "No, I did not think I did; I could not tell him." Then on the Saturday morning when I was at home Bob Fisher came to me and told me all about this man Platt running away with the money, and could I help him in any way to see the thing through as he did not wish to get a bad name with the punters. We talked over the matter; he said it was a money matter, and they wanted some £24 or £25 (I would not be certain of the amount), and could I put them right. I wrote them out a cheque immediately, and they went to cash it at the bank, and paid the deficiency of what Platt had left them short for his punters. Since then they have been in my employ, and they have made a book for me at the same place as they made a book for Platt and McCarthy.

50893. Near the "Sutton Arms"?—Yes.

50894. I gather from your dropping the name of "McCarthy" in your answer that you had heard of him also?—Yes.

50895. Do you know him personally?—Yes.

50895. How long have you known McCarthy?—I have known McCarthy a matter of 12 or 14 years.

50897. Had he been doing any street bookmaking with you?—No, he had been doing no street bookmaking with me.

50898. I think he has told us he did not do any street bookmaking before he had this partnership with Platt?—To my knowledge I do not think he did.

50899. We know that it was on the 23rd June that McCarthy ceased to be a partner with Platt. Perhaps you did not know that?—No, I did not.

50900. It was on the 30th June, at the end of another week, that Platt terminated his connection with the Fishers. Was it on Saturday, the 30th June, you saw him?—Saturday morning was the morning he came to me. I could not say whether it was the 30th June or not.

50901. I think the 30th June was a Saturday?—That was the day he came to me—on a Saturday. I will not say the date.

50902. I think that was the date on which he said Platt had gone off with the money. You have no note of the Saturday?—No.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It was a Saturday.

50903. (Chairman.) Bob Fisher continued business with Platt up to Saturday, the 30th June, and then he told the story of how Platt had gone off with the money. Then I suppose it must have been before the Saturday?—I should say it was on the Friday.

50904. Who came to you—Bob or Bill?—That was my first meeting with Bob Fisher.

50905. You had known Bill Fisher before?—Yes.

50906. When Bob Fisher came to you, did you know who he was?—I had heard of the brother Bob, and there was a bit of a likeness between them.

50907. Your story is that Bob Fisher came to you and said, "I am in great trouble," or words to that effect?—Yes.

50908. "Platt has gone off and we have £24 or £25 to pay"?—Yes.

50909. Where was this interview?—This interview took place at my house.

50910. That is in Gray's Inn Road?—No, where I was then living. That is a new address.

50911. Where were you living then?—22, Millman Street.

50912. You and Bob Fisher came to some arrangement? Yes, we came to some arrangement that he should work the connection for me.

50913. On what terms was he to work the connection for you?—I think the terms were that he got 50s. a week wages; I will not be certain now, but I think it was about 50s. to £3 a week; it was one of those two amounts.

50914. Was that for Bob Fisher?—Yes, that was for Bob Fisher.

50915. Was Bill to be in the concern at all?—You see, he worked another pitch just a bit away; but his papers were sent to his brother Bob, and then they were brought on to me by somebody who represented me.

50916. Then Bob Fisher and Bill Fisher were both your agents?—Yes.

50917. Only that you worked the thing through Bob Fisher?—Yes, Bob was the responsible party.

50918. The arrangement made then on the Saturday was that you were to pay Bob Fisher either 50s. or £3 a week?—Yes; I am not quite certain what they started on.

50919. Did you begin on the Monday?—Yes, but we did not make arrangements with regard to what the wages part of the programme should be until a little later on in the week, because I wanted to see first of all what the amount of the takings was, and whether it was worth while.

50920. The representation was that they were £24 or £25 short?—Yes.

50921. On Saturday you gave him a cheque for £20?—£20 something—not exactly £20.

50922. And he cashed that cheque?—Yes, he went to my bank and cashed it.

50923. So that he was able to meet the punters as arranged?—Yes.

50924. Then two or three days afterwards you arranged the wages?—Yes.

50925. As I understand it, from the first week in July down to the end of the year you employed the Fishers in this way?—Yes, to just about the end of the year.

50926. Did you have any trouble or dispute with them of any kind?—No.

50927. They settled up properly?—Yes, as properly as could be.

50928. Was the business fairly profitable?—I cannot say it was fairly profitable; I lost money, it is true, but I can guarantee that everything was carried on straightforwardly; it happened that people backed winners, but still that cannot be helped.

50929. You had other pitches and other businesses as well?—I had a pitch of my own. They were very unfortunate, but I may tell you that they acted straightforwardly in every way, or else I should not have stood them so long.

50930. No punters came to you to complain that they had not been paid?—No.

50931. You paid the wages and settled up with them, I suppose?—Yes.

50932. Until you terminated the connection?—Yes.

50933. You wish us to understand that, as far as you know, the Fishers were honest?—Very honest indeed.

50934. Did they keep any books?—Yes, they kept a book.

50935. Did you settle up with them? Did you settle up on each racing day or at the end of the week?—We settled up as regards the day's racing at the end of the day. You see, the slips were brought to me, I totalled up the amount that was on them, and I received the sum off them; if there was anything to be made up I gave it to them, and anything that came my way I kept. They entered up everything in their books.

50936. Either Bob or Bill Fisher came to you every day?—Yes.

50937. Which was it who came to you?—Bob.

50938. He came to your place?—Yes.

50939. Then he produced the slips?—Yes.

50940. Who wrote down the names of the punters, and the amount to be paid to the punters, if any?—Bob Fisher.

50941. In a book that he kept?—Yes.

50942. Then, of course, you asked for the money and he gave it to you?—Yes.

50943. Supposing at the end of the day there was a deficiency, what happened?—In what way?

50944. Supposing the amount of money he had on the table was less than the amount of money which he had received according to the slips?—If there was any deficiency he made it up—I mean to say there hardly was unless it was a matter of a shilling, or sixpence, or two shillings, or something like that.

50945. Let me make what is in my mind perfectly clear; I think you understand it, but I want to make it perfectly clear. The slips, of course, would show the amount of money he had received from the punters?—Yes.

50946. Or ought to have received from the punters?—Yes.

50947. Then he would produce the money he had in his pocket?—Yes.

50948. Unless he had allowed some punter to make a bet on credit the amount that he produced on the table ought to correspond with the amount of money which the punters had backed horses for?—Yes. As I tell you, the amount of money was there with the exception of a shilling, or there might be sixpence difference; but, taking the amount of money which they began to take when they were in my employ, if a shilling or sixpence or two shillings went wrong, it might be given back in the matter of change or something like that, or, a man giving him 10s. for a bet, he might only get 9s.

50949. Did you take the money from Bob Fisher?—Yes.

50950. When were the punters to be paid?—They were to be paid at night time and the next day.

50951. And you gave Bob Fisher the money to meet the proper demands of the punters?—Yes, if there was anything short—if we had a losing day.

50952. If it was not a losing day he kept enough money to pay the punters, and you took the balance?—Yes.

50953. Supposing there was £5 to the good, you would take the £5 and leave him enough money to pay the punters that had won?—Yes.

50954. Did he ever say, "I have paid so much for commission"?—We had two men who used to bring their papers from a place, and we used to allow them so much a week, or rather so much in the pound for the takings.

50955. Who paid the men this commission?—Bob Fisher paid them, but I allowed it to him on the Saturday; it was a weekly affair; it only showed on the Saturday.

50956. Were there any other expenses which were allowed for at the end of the week?—No. The only expenses which we allowed for was "lookers-out."

50957. What did they come to every week—what was the average?—It would average from about 2s. 6d. to 3s. a day each, and an extra 1s. on the Saturday, or something like that.

50958. Was any allowance made in respect of standing drinks to anybody?—No, I did not allow that.

50959. Bob never claimed anything of that kind?—No.

50960. Was there any allowance for any other expenses?—No.

50961. Not for "tecs," for instance?—No.

50962. Or "coppers"?—No.

50963. Did Bob Fisher ever tell you he had been put to any expense in having to bribe policemen or detectives?—No.

50964. Never heard of it?—No, I never bothered about it; I mean to say it was never put to me, and that was the finish of it.

50965. Did you yourself have any occasion to make any payments to policemen?—No, never at all. I might tell you that I paid £235 myself in fines last year, so it does not look as though any bribery took place there.

50966. £235?—£235, to the best of my recollection, I paid for fines last year.

50967. Were those all summonses?—No, on arrests.

50968. How many times were you arrested?—To the amount of £5 each time.

50969. That 47 arrests?—Yes, and I tell you I was taken more times than I had my dinner; in fact, it was wonderful that I was ever there at all.

50970. And yet you kept it up till Christmas time?—Yes, I kept it up until the new Act. I might tell you that those arrests were not all single arrests. There was a man I had working for me, and sometimes he was taken, and sometimes I was taken. When I could get away I got away, and when he could get away he got away.

50971. But you yourself were arrested 47 times?—No, I say between us; the major portion of them would be mine; it would not be more than four or five times for him.

50972. You may as well tell us his name, because we can get it in another way?—Isbell is his name.

50973. (Mr. Dickinson.) Where was his address?—Just off Theobald's Road.

50974. In what police division is that?—Bow Street—the E Division.

50975. (Chairman.) Have you at any time ever given money to the police?—No.

50976. Has it ever been suggested that you should do so? Did it occur to you, being arrested in this way, that you might soften their hostility to you?—No.

50977. Have you ever been in a public-house with any one of them?—I might tell you that on one or two occasions when I have been to a music hall I may have met somebody there enjoying the entertainment, and spoken to them, but nothing further.

50978. Did you know any of the detectives? You got to know those who arrested you, at any rate?—Yes, I had to know them.

50979. You say when you saw them in a public-house you saw those who had arrested you?—I hardly ever saw them in a public-house.

50980. A place of amusement?—I went there, and no doubt they were there on the same errand. That is where I generally met them if I met anybody at all.

50981. Were you on good terms, or did they speak to you?—Nodded—a nodding acquaintance.

50982. Do you remember reading about Platt's evidence before the Commission in October last?—Yes.

50983. Do you remember what day of the week it was that Platt gave his evidence?—No, I do not.

50984. I suggest to you that it was Thursday, the 18th October. Do you think it was that date?—I cannot tell you. I read it in the usual way, and never took any notice.

50985. You read it in an evening paper?—Yes.

50986. Did you know it was the Platt you had been in business with?—I have had no business with Platt.

50987. You took over his business?—I took over his business, but I have had no business with him.

50988. You did not see Platt at all in the transaction?—No. I saw him a little time afterwards, but never mentioned anything to him.

50989. The arrangement made with Bob Fisher in the way you have described was made quite independently of Platt?—Yes.

50990. Did you see Bob Fisher on the Thursday evening after the evidence which Platt had given had appeared in the evening papers?—I cannot say for certain whether I saw him, but I may have done; I mean you are taking my memory back.

50991. I agree. I am not suggesting anything against your memory. I am only trying to find out what you know about the matter to lead up to another question. Did you see Bob Fisher or Bill Fisher after Platt had given his evidence?—I may have done, but I cannot say on that night.

50992. Did you see him soon after?—I usually saw him at night time, but I cannot say I saw him on that particular night.

50993. Did you see him soon after?—Yes.

50994. Did you have any conversation with Bob Fisher about Platt's evidence?—It might have been a topic of conversation as regards the evidence, but nothing in particular.

50995. Was anything said as to Platt having written down some of the names of some of the constables?—No.

H. Jones. 21 June 1887.

50996. Did Fisher say anything about any entries in his books?—No, not to me.

50997. Did he say it to anybody?—Not that I know of.

50998. You are making a full disclosure to us, are you, of all you know about it?—That is all I know. I never had any business with Platt. I have never bribed the police in any way, and, as I tell you, my record should very nearly prove that.

50999. As far as I know, there is no attack made upon your statement, and your record certainly confirms it?—All I can say is if I did they did not take much notice.

51000. You are certain that at an interview with Bob Fisher after Platt had given his evidence Fisher did not say anything to you as to his having books which contained entries?—No.

51001. (Mr. Dickinson.) What was this interview about?—What interview do you mean?

51002. You said Fisher did come to you, and that you did have a conversation with Fisher about Platt?—It was not a particular conversation, like. I might say to him, "What do you think of that case to-day?" or something like that.

51003. (Chairman.) What I understand you to say is that you did see Bob Fisher every day?—I saw Bob Fisher every day. He did not call by appointment.

51004. (Mr. Dickinson.) What did you say about this case? You knew it was going on, of course?—I knew what the evidence was according to what I had read in the paper, but we made it no topic of conversation except that we might say "What do you think of that case?" or something like that. There was no particular conversation. If you ask me to tell you particularly what was said, I cannot tell you. It was only in the course of conversation, like. I suppose everybody who was interested in racing, when this evidence was in the paper, would pass a remark of some kind.

51005. You do not know what in particular he said to you?—No, I cannot remember. I suppose he would say, "What do you think of this?" or "Platt's business," or something like that.

51006. (Chairman.) You had seen, of course, that Fisher's name had been brought into the matter by Platt?—Yes, I had seen that.

51007. I will not tell you what Platt did say about the G Division, but he did tell us he employed some men called Fisher?—Yes.

51008. You knew pretty well, therefore, that the men referred to by Platt were the Fishers that you were employing?—Yes.

51009. You knew that?—Yes.

51010. Did you notice that Platt had written down the names of some of the constables?—How should I know it? It had nothing to do with me.

51011. You had read the account in the evening newspapers, I understand?—Yes.

51012. You had seen the names of the Fishers. Did you also notice that Platt had written down the names of some of the constables who were alleged to have received money?—Yes, I read that in the paper.

51013. You knew then that the allegation was that one of the Fishers had been paying money to some constables whose names were written down?—Yes, I could see that by reading it.

51014. Did you and Bob Fisher have no conversation about that? Did Fisher deny it?—He certainly denied it.

51015. I thought a moment ago you told me you had nothing except a very passing conversation?—As I tell you, you are taxing my memory with a thing, and I had so much business of my own to do that I did not have time to bother about theirs very much.

51016. It did not happen every day. You have told us you did not bribe the police at all?—I did not.

51017. You were employing the Fishers. Did it not strike you as rather odd that Platt should say that the Fishers had on his account been paying money to the police?—It might have struck me as odd, but I did not take any notice.

51018. Do you mean to say when you met Fisher nothing was said about it? I am not suggesting there is anything wrong in your talking about it, or that you said anything wrong?—I tell you I cannot remember anything except a passing conversation.

51019. (Mr. Dickinson.) You say Fisher denied it. What did he deny?—I might have said to him, "Is this right, Bob?" or something like that, and he would say "No, a lot of rot."

51020. He did say that?—No, I cannot say that he did.

51021. (Chairman.) See if you cannot remember a little more about it. Bob Fisher was your servant; you had taken over Platt's business in the sense that you had paid his debts, and then you suddenly read in the papers that Platt said that your agent or servant, Bob Fisher, had been bribing the police for him. You say you saw an account in the papers, and therefore you knew that Platt had written down the names of the men whom Bob Fisher had bribed on his account?—As I tell you, it was in the course of conversation, but I cannot tell you exactly what took place. As far as I am concerned, I know that they never had anything off me for the police, and I have never bribed the police in my own division.

51022. I am not concerned with that for the moment, but I want you to refresh your memory by pondering a little as to this conversation. It does not strike me as the sort of thing as to which a man would have a passing conversation. If it had been some other bookmaker whom you had never met who had made the statement I could understand a passing conversation about it, but here was your own man Bob Fisher who had been acting for Platt?—Yes, I knew that. As I tell you, in the course of conversation, I might have said "Is this right, Bob?" and he might have said "It is a lot of rot," and finished up with that. I had other business to do. I never spoke much on the business except that when I read it I did not take much notice. I thought it was a lot of rot myself.

51023. What was rot?—Platt's evidence.

51024. Then you had never heard of any bookmakers bribing the police?—Not that I know of.

51025. Have you ever heard that these things take place?—No, not with any of the bookmakers that I became acquainted with.

51026. You became acquainted with a good many, I suppose?—Not a great many. When my work was done for the evening I was off home except once and again I would go to a music-hall. I never mixed with any bookmakers very much.

51027. Were there many in the E Division carrying on that business?—No, there were not many near me. There were some on the other side of Covent Garden way, but none near me, and you see they were at work at the same time as I was so we had not much chance of getting together at all.

51028. Did you know any of the C.I.D. men in the G Division?—I knew them, a nodding acquaintance, and may have spoken to them when I was inside the station, but not further.

51029. Do you know Leach?—No, I do not know Leach.

51030. Or Laing?—You see he was in a different Division to me.

51031. I asked you about the G Division, and I understand you did know them to nod to?—Not in that Division.

51032. Only in the E Division?—I know some in the E Division.

51033. Am I to take it you did not know any of the constables or the C.I.D. men, plain clothes men, or uniformed men in the G Division?—No, with the exception that I knew Laing when in uniform; but that is a matter of nine or ten years ago, I believe.

51034. Do you know Wright?—No, I do not know him.

(Chairman.) Mr. Platt, do you wish to ask this witness any questions? We told you we would investigate the matter and we have brought Jones here?

51035. (Mr. Platt.) Yes, Sir. You used to meet the brothers Fisher morning and night?—When do you mean?

51036. Each morning and night?—When they were working for me in the streets, do you mean?

51037. Yes?—No, I met them of a night time and not morning and night.

51038. On the night that my evidence was published in the papers ——?—Half a minute. Don't you shout at me, please.

51039. On the night that my evidence was published in the papers did you have a communication with Robert Fisher?—No, I did not. Did I have a communication with Robert? I cannot say I had a communication. I have just told the Chairman I may have had a conversation, but I cannot say the date.

51040. Robert Fisher came and told you that Laing and Leach had been to him?—Nothing of the kind.

51041. On their pitch?—He never told that to me.

51042. (Chairman.) Did Fisher tell you that Laing and Leach had come to him on his pitch?—Not to me.

51043. (Mr. Dickinson.) To whom?—I do not know who to. He did not tell it to me.

51044. (Chairman.) You say he did not tell you?—No.

51045. (Mr. Platt.) In the morning early you told another witness, McCarthy, that they had been to him, and what a fine thing I had done?—I told McCarthy? I say that I did not. I may have said to McCarthy that it was a fine thing you had done, but as regards telling him that Leach and Laing, or whatever the gentlemen's names are, had been to him, I could not tell him because I did not know.

51046. Was anybody sent to stop the Fishers going or to watch the Fishers going to Messrs. Wontner's, the solicitors?—Not to my knowledge.

51047. Therefore the meeting on the bridge as the officers proposed ——?—Look here, I know nothing about the meeting as the officers proposed, so you must not ask me any questions about it.

51048. You never told Richard McCarthy that these officers had been to these men on their pitch?—No, I tell you I never told him because I did not know.

51049. You did not know?—I did not know.

51050. What was the cause of your taking the pitch over?—The cause of my taking the pitch over was the man came to me and told me the position you had left him in.

51051. Did you find the money for this man?—I do not know that I particularly found the money.

51052. Did you find his share?—No, I do not know that I particularly found the money for his share. On various occasions I have lent him money, but not for the purposes of bookmaking.

(Chairman.) When you say "this man," do you mean McCarthy?

51053. (Mr. Platt.) Yes. I mean that each and every one of these books this man in the box had seen every night and morning, or at night, in the presence of these men?—How could I see them if they were in your possession?

51054. On Saturday, the 30th June, you know that you were in my company with McCarthy in a certain public-house in Covent Garden?—Yes, very likely. Half a minute, before you go any further. I do not recollect that that would be the 30th June, but it may have been.

51055. You knew that I had always tried to stop the Fishers, you knew I always said their expenses were too heavy, and your opinion was asked what should be done?—That I know nothing about.

51056. Did you not know that I was not going to give them a penny of that money on that Saturday?—No, I did not.

51057. Was I not within a hundred yards of you when Bill Fisher came to you for me?—Not that I know of.

51058. Do you not know what answer you gave Bill?—No, I gave Bill no answer at all. I certainly saw Bill, but, as regards the other, I do not remember it at all.

51059. Do you remember there was a telegram sent to a certain address saying that I was not going to pay a penny?—No, I do not know anything about such a telegram.

51060. The telegram might be produced?—The telegram might be produced, but that does not go to show that I know anything about it.

51061. It was through your knowing all the under current, through your knowing as much as I did myself, that you took the Fishers over?—Nothing of the kind.

51062. You know that McCarthy and myself had paid nearly £60 bad debts for the Fishers, and you got it for £20?—I tell you I know nothing of the kind. You keep saying I know, but I know nothing of the kind.

51063. You know by the conversation that morning that if they had done it to you you would have kept every penny?—I might tell you I never carry on my business in that sort of way, and anybody who knows me will tell you that I never did any dirty action of any kind. That was one of my principal names—that I never did anything of that kind. I never invited anybody to rob anybody.

51064. Is that the reason that you took the Fishers over?—No. They came and told me the position they were in, and they said they had a fine prospect of working the connection, and I advanced them the money. I did not know there was any advancing to be done till he mentioned it. He said there was £24 or £25 owing, and I gave him a cheque to put it right.

51065. Have you never given a uniformed man or a C.I.D. man money?—No.

51066. Your own words "back to my face"?—My own words "back to your face" is what you are putting up. You will say anything.

51067. Thank you, Mr. Jones?—Thank you, Mr. Platt.

51068. You never gave Sergeant Hancock money?—I never gave Sergeant Hancock a penny in my life.

51069. Has not he been greedy?—I have never given the man anything, so I do not know whether he is greedy.

51070. Do you know or will you not know?—I do not know.

51071. How much did you subscribe to the testimonial that was presented 18 months ago?—Who to?

51072. I do not want to mention the officer's name. Is it a usual thing for you to give a little bit to an officer's testimonial?—I will tell you one thing about it. I do not know whether it is a usual thing, but there was a testimonial got up for a man who was leaving the force, and to the best of my recollection I gave a sovereign; there was a card handed round.

51073. You never gave the officer anything?—I did not give it to the officer. I gave it to the man who was collecting for it.

51074. (Chairman.) Why did you give a sovereign towards this testimonial?—You see, the tradesmen in the neighbourhood gave a sovereign, or something like that; it was a testimonial to present a man with a watch.

51075. In the Covent Garden district in the E Division, where you carry on your business?—Yes.

51076. I understand your answer to Mr. Platt's suggestion is that you subscribed as the other people did?—Yes. I never gave it to the man. The man who was out with the subscription card asked me if I would like to give anything, and I said "Yes."

(Mr. Platt.) It was only a bookmakers' testimonial.

51077. (Chairman.) Is that so? Was the testimonial got up by bookmakers?—No, it was got up absolutely by tradespeople. I could give you the names of various tradespeople who gave money.

51078. What did the officer do to secure such respect as to give him a testimonial?—He was a man who had done a lot of good service in the force; he had been there, I believe, a fair length of time, 25 years or something like that, and they made a collection to give him a gold watch and chain, and they came round in this way.

51079. What kind of duty had he been doing at Covent Garden?—He was a detective.

51080. What rank?—He was a sergeant. There were big accounts in all the papers at the time he was leaving the force.

51081. Do you mean as a detective officer he had been useful in preventing robberies from your stalls or shops?—Yes, he had done a lot of good service with regard to robberies of all kinds; and there was a full account of it in the papers, so you can guess he was a man of a bit of note.

51082. How many people subscribed?—That I cannot tell you.

51083. Fifty?—I could not say.

51084. You say they were giving him a watch and that you subscribed a sovereign. Subscriptions from 50 or 60 people would go a good distance towards that testimonial?—I cannot tell you exactly the amount that was subscribed for the testimonial, but I saw the watch and chain, because it was presented to him at a concert.

51085. Mr. Platt has suggested to you that you were financing McCarthy before the 30th June?—On various occasions I have lent McCarthy money as a friend. He has said to me, "Harry" (he knows me very well), "I want to borrow a pound or a couple of pounds," or something like that, and I have lent it to him.

51086. Before he went into this street bookmaking business?—Yes, years before.

51087. Nothing to do with that?—Nothing to do with that at all.

51088. From the beginning of May to the 30th June did you lend him any money?—I cannot say I did. I think on one occasion I lent him £5.

51089. What for?—I would not ask him the question.

51090. Nothing to do with your being a secret partner of McCarthy or of Platt?—I was no secret partner. As I told you, I had no business with them.

51091. The suggestion is, apart from yourself, that Platt and McCarthy entered into a partnership to carry on a bookmaking business in the G Division, and that they employed Bob and Bill Fisher as their agents?—Yes.

51092. The suggestion now is that you were behind Platt and McCarthy in that matter?—No.

51093. Then I do not quite understand why you paid £20 because Platt made default in payment?—I paid the £20 because the brothers Fisher were in trouble, and I thought it was worth it, because I should get my money back.

51094. But you were not a friend of theirs in any sense then?—I was a bit acquainted with Bill Fisher, but, as I told you, I did not know anything of Bob. At the time Bob came to me he was in terrible trouble, like a man would be who had to meet a lot of people with no money, and he said, "Put me right in this matter, and we will settle the matter."

51095. Is it a common thing among bookmakers to take over a pitch or to take over a business, or call it what you like, in that way?—I have often heard of plenty of men taking over a pitch, but I have never heard the conditions under which they have taken them on.

51096. We have it in this case that Platt and McCarthy took over somebody else's pitch from the Fishers or helped the Fishers; I am not sure that they were not running it on their own account. You have never heard of a transaction apart from that, have you?—No, I have never known the conditions, but I have often heard of their taking over one another's pitches.

51097. Those are the suggestions made by Mr. Platt. Mr. Muir, would you like to ask the witness any question?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) No, Sir.

51098. (Mr. Dickinson.) Do you know that Fisher went to Messrs. Wontner and told them about this business?—Yes, I knew that he went and saw Messrs. Wontner.

51099. Did he tell you he was going to see Messrs. Wontner?—Yes, he did a good time after the case was first started.

51100. You mean after we had begun to hear about Platt?—Yes.

51101. I suppose you have followed in the papers the proceedings that have taken place before us?—Sometimes I have picked a paper up and read it, and sometimes not. I never took much interest in it.

51102. What did Fisher tell you? He told you he was going to Messrs. Wontner?—Yes.

51103. What did he tell you he was going there for?—Nothing particular; he simply said, "I will go to Messrs. Wontner"—they wanted him. I did not know which side it was on.

51104. You remember his saying that he was going to Messrs. Wontner?—I remember on one occasion his saying he was going to Messrs. Wontner.

51105. Why did he tell you that?—I do not know why he told me; I do not know why he should say it.

51106. Did you not know what he was going to Messrs. Wontner about? You knew about the case?—Yes, I knew about the case.

51107. What did he tell you he wanted to tell Messrs. Wontner?—He never told me anything that he wanted to tell Messrs. Wontner. As I tell you, I had no interest in the case at all.

51108. I understand you knew what was going on?—Yes, I knew what was going on by what I read.

51109. And I think you knew at that time what Platt had said about bribing the police?—By reading the papers.

51110. I suppose Fisher said something about it?—The only thing I remember his saying was, "A lot of rot," or something like that.

51111. Was that the time he told you he was going to Messrs. Wontner?—No, that was before; that was when the first reading of the case came out.

51112. How soon after that did he tell you he was going to Messrs. Wontner?—I cannot remember.

51113. Cannot you recall the time?—No, I cannot remember the day or the time. I should not think it would be far from the first opening of the case, but as to the day I cannot tell you.

51114. Did you know that he wrote to Messrs. Wontner?—No, I cannot say that I did.

51115. Where are you living?—I live at 151, Gray's Inn Road.

51116. Where does Robert Fisher live?—I believe he lives in Northampton Buildings, but I cannot tell you the number.

51117. Have you seen Platt at all lately?—I have seen him on one or two occasions in Covent Garden Market.

51118. Have you spoken to him?—Yes, and had a drink with him.

51119. Have you told him anything about this case?—I told him I thought he had made rather a mess of it the way he has been going on.

51120. In what way had he made a mess of it?—I cannot tell you exactly, but the way he has been going on I thought he had made a mess of it.

51121. Did Fisher tell you what had happened after he had been to Messrs. Wontner?—No.

51122. Did you know that Fisher was coming here to give evidence?—Yes.

51123. Did he tell you what he was going to say?—No, he never told me what he was going to say.

51124. He did not tell you that he was going to deny the statements of Platt?—No.

51125. (Chairman.) How long ago is it since you had a conversation with Platt about this matter; I mean about his evidence before the Commission and his attack on the police?—Saturday morning is the usual time that he comes to Covent Garden, and we have gone to have a drink or a cup of coffee, or something like that. The last meeting I suppose would be three weeks or a month ago.

51126. Did he ask you whether you were going to give evidence before us?—No, he never asked if I was going to give evidence, because I had no idea that I was going to give evidence.

51127. Not four weeks ago?—No, in fact I was thunderstruck when I received the letter asking me to be here.

51128. At that conversation about a month ago, was this matter referred to; was his attack on the police mentioned between you?—No. It was referred to in this way, that I hoped I was not brought into the case, simply because I am in business, and I am not seeking notoriety in the papers; the next thing that happens is it interferes with my business greatly.

51129. Then the matter was referred to at Covent Garden?—It was referred to. I said I hoped I was not brought into the case, as I did not want my name bandied about.

51130. Who started that topic of conversation? Did he or did you?—I think he began it, but I would not be certain as regards that.

51131. You think he began it?—Yes, but that I would not be positive about.

51132. Was it at that conversation that you said to him that he had made a mess of it?—No.

51133. At which conversation was it that you used the words "You have made a mess of it"?—A little after the case came out—a month or five weeks, or something like that.

51134. That would be in November or December last. On October 18th Platt gave his evidence here. You say it was five or six weeks after that?—About that.

51135. You told him, "You have made a mess of it"?—I said, "You have made a nice mess of it, Alf," or "You have made a mess of it, Alf."

51136. How had he made a mess of it? What did you mean by your observation?—I meant to say I thought it was a lot of rot the man going on with such a thing as that.

(Mr. Platt.) You knew what the Fishers had gone and said and done.

(Chairman.) Sit down, Mr. Platt.

(The Witness.) As I tell you, I thought the man had made a lot of rot of it as regards what he had been saying. I said, "Alf, you have made a mess of it, have you not?" but nothing more. I was going through Lincoln's Inn Fields on my way home, and I met him; he said "Good morning," and I said "Good morning." He said, "What do you think of the case?" I said, "You have made a nice mess of it," and walked on.

51137. (Chairman.) Did you mean he had not put his case forward well?—I meant that he had gone and made a lot of statements that I thought were not true.

51138. That is not making a mess of the case, necessarily?—If a man goes making a lot of statements which you think are not true you think he has made a mess of it.

51139. Did you think by that there was nothing in it at all, and that he had been guilty of a great blunder in coming to complain of the police at all?—That was my opinion.

51140. Is that what you meant?—That was my opinion.

51141. You see making a mess of it is rather a thing with a double meaning, is it not, under the circumstances?—Yes.

51142. You understand that, do you not?—Yes, I understand that.

51143. If you meant that he had been telling a pack of lies, that was rather an odd phrase to use, was it not?—It is not an uncommon phrase—making a mess of it—but I meant he had made a mess of it by appearing in such a thing and giving evidence which I thought was not right. I could not think for the life of me he could have been thinking what he was doing of.

51144. I can understand your saying that if you meant that he had made a mess of it by coming before the Commission and telling a pack of lies?—I did mean that.

51145. Did you mean that?—Yes, I did mean that, and I mean it now.

51146. But it seems to me it is rather an odd phrase to use, "You have made a mess of it," in order to express that notion?—It is rather an odd phrase, but I may tell you when you are talking in the street like that you do not define yourself too well, do you?

51147. I do not know. You had been following the case, I understand; you had read the report; and you knew, for instance, that Platt had allowed his wife to get hold of a book and burn it?—Yes, I read that.

51148. Was it in reference to that incident you used the phrase, "You have made a nice mess of it"?—No, it was not in reference to that incident.

51149. If it was not with reference to that incident was it with reference to his conduct in the case altogether?—It was with reference to his conduct in the case altogether.

51150. The way in which he put his case, do you mean?—No, the way in which he got up and said these things which, in my own mind, were not true.

51151. What you wish me to understand you meant to convey to Platt by those words was that he had been telling a lot of lies to us?—I thought he had been making a great blunder.

51152. How had he been making a blunder here? To come and perjure himself in this Court is not a thing which you would describe as a blunder, is it?—As I tell you, I did not believe the evidence I had read.

51153. You think it was a blunder for him to come. Is that what you mean?—I will put it in that way.

51154. It is something worse than a blunder; it is a crime, is it not?—I do not know whether you make it a crime, but, as I tell you, I do not believe it to be true.

51155. The form of words you used was, "You have made a nice mess of it"?—Yes, they would be about the words.

51156. Was that the only conversation which you had about the matter?—Yes.

51157. Until the conversation four weeks ago?—We have met on several occasions, but we may not have spoken on the case.

51158. When you met a month ago you told him "I hope I shall not be mixed up with it"?—Yes.

51159. What made you say that?—I thought this man would most likely mention my name.

51160. It was six months afterwards. Had Platt ever said that he had mentioned your name?—No.

51161. What made you think that you might have something to do with the case?—I thought in giving some of that evidence he might have mentioned my name, or something like that, saying that after the Fishers had disconnected with him they had gone to a man of the name of Jones. I thought he might have mentioned my name, and I said to him, "Alf, I do not want to be brought into the case."

51162. You did not say that in the preceding interview when you told him he had made a mess of it?—No, in the preceding interview I did not say that; it never dawned on me. As I tell you, I was in a bit of a hurry to get home, and the conversation was not more than two or three minutes.

51163. What did not dawn upon you?—It never crossed my mind that I should have anything to do with the case at all.

51164. That was in December?—Yes.

51165. What made you think four weeks ago that you might be brought in?—I do not know what made me think of it, but I know I mentioned it at the time. I said, "I hope you do not draw me into it," because I had an idea that he might mention my name in the course of his evidence.

51166. You were not afraid that the Fishers would draw you into it?—I am not frightened of being drawn into it at all except for the inconvenience of my work.

51167. I mean you did not fear that the Fishers might bring you into it?—No, I did not wish to be drawn into it at all.

51168. I cannot understand why you said to Platt, "I hope I am not drawn into it"?—I did mention it, because I thought he would mention my name.

51169. Did you not know that your name had been mentioned?—No, I did not.

51170. You are certain you did not know it?—I am certain that I did not know my name had been mentioned.

51171. This conversation took place you say a month ago?—I will not say a month ago, but within about a month.

51172. I call your attention to the fact that on the 17th April, which is just about two months ago, Fisher said, "That is my present employer." I said, "We have heard of him before." Fisher said, "That is right." Then I said, "He has given it up because it is so expensive.—(A) No, he is still betting. (Q) What is his name?—(A) Mr. Henry Jones, 151, Gray's Inn Road"?—But that was not in any paper.

51173. I do not know that; but you did not know that it was mentioned?—No.

51174. The Assistant Secretary points out to me that at an earlier stage your name had been mentioned in the cross-examination of Platt by Mr. Muir, the learned counsel for the police?—I only took the paper for it, and I did not see it in the paper.

51175. What Platt told Mr. Muir was this, in effect,

H. Jones.
21 June 1907.

that when Platt terminated his connection on the 30th June with Fisher, he, Platt, had left Fisher enough to go on with, and then Fisher, a day or two after, arranged that a mutual friend should take over the pitch. The mutual friend there referred to was yourself?—I cannot say about that. I cannot tell you what conversation there was, but that is what I told him at the time.

51176. I may have to come back to that point again. It was some considerable time ago, at the beginning of the year, that reference was made to the mutual friend. Then again on the 45th day, that is the 17th April, your name is mentioned. You were seeing Platt several times in the course of this case?—Yes.

51177. If I am to believe your evidence, you said to him, apropos of nothing, "I hope my name will not be brought into the case"?—Yes, I did say to him "I hope my name is not brought into the case."

51178. Was that an aimless remark? What made you think your name would be brought into the case?—I thought Platt might mention my name.

51179. He had in fact, or the Fishers had?—That I did not know. I thought he might mention my name, and I did not want him to mention my name. I said to him, "I hope you do not bring my name into it, Alf," simply because I did not want him to mention my name.

51180. I cannot myself quite understand why you should have made that observation. It was months after the case had started?—Yes, that is true. You see, I did not know that my name had been mentioned, and I did not want him to mention it, so I said, "I hope you do not bring me into the case. "

51181. (Chairman.) When we adjourned you remember I had been asking you about the interview you had with Platt a month ago?—Yes.

51182. You had said, "I hope I shall not be brought into the matter," or words of that kind?—Yes.

51183. Now I want you to come back to the conversation that you had just after Platt had given his evidence before us. Remember I told you it was on Thursday, the 18th October that Platt had given his evidence. You remember reading Platt's evidence, and you said, quite properly, you could not remember what he did say. At that time (on Thursday, the 18th October) Bob and Bill Fisher were still in your service?—Yes.

51184. You told me that you generally saw them every evening on racing days?—Yes.

51185. They brought you the slips?—Yes.

51186. You also told me that you remembered Bob Fisher referring to Platt's evidence, and that you said "Rot," or something like that?—No, he remarked that.

51187. Was that, do you think, on the Thursday night, the night of the day upon which Platt had given evidence here?—I could not say whether it would be on that particular Thursday night.

51188. Did Fisher refer to the fact that his name had appeared in the paper?—I read that.

51189. I know you told me that you had read Fisher's evidence in the paper, and that Platt had written down the names of some of the officers whom Fisher said he had bribed?—I do not remember whether that was in the account of the case or not—like the first day that the case opened—I do not remember whether Platt had mentioned the names of the officers he had bribed.

51190. He did not mention any names, but he wrote down some names. I thought you told me that you had read that, and that you remembered that?—Is that the first time? If it was the first time, I must have remembered it.

51191. At any rate, that was present to your mind when Fisher referred to the matter?—Yes.

51192. Did Fisher seem concerned at all about it, or did he seem to mind about it?—No.

51193. Although his name had been mentioned?—No, he did not seem to take too much notice.

51194. Were you at all concerned in the matter? Did it occur to you that it might have an influence on your business or might affect your arrangement with Fisher?—No, it did not occur to my mind at all.

51195. Did Fisher consult you as to what he ought to do?—No.

51196. Did he tell you whether he had done anything?—No.

51197. And you were not sufficiently interested to make further inquiry about the matter?—I had no interest at all in the matter.

51198. I thought you told me something about his having gone to Messrs. Wontner?—That was later.

51199. Do you mean a day or two later?—A little after—I will not say whether it was a day or two—it might have been a week. I know on one occasion he did go to Messrs. Wontner; he told me he was going to Messrs. Wontner.

51200. (Mr. Dickinson.) He said he was going to Messrs. Wontner?—Yes.

51201. (Chairman.) Did he tell you whether he was going to write to them before he went to them or not?—No.

51202. Did he tell you he was going to write to the Commission?—No.

51203. Do you know that he did write to the Commission on the very 18th October? Have you ever heard that from him subsequently?—No, I have not heard that he wrote to the Commission. He never told me that. He may have written, but he never told me that he had.

51204. Did you see him on the Friday and on the Saturday of that week? Did you generally have a settling up at the end of the week?—No, it was purely a daily settlement.

51205. Not quite, because I think you told me that certain matters were left over always until the Saturday?—That was for about two weekly people; that was all. That would come in like with the ordinary Saturday's business.

51206. After Platt had given his evidence, do you remember whether there was any conversation about the case?—No, I do not remember any conversation.

51207. Did he not say he had written to Messrs. Wontner on the Friday?—He never told me so.

51208. The matter was entirely dropped between you?—Yes. I told you the interest in the case with me died out.

51209. The interest in the case with you died out?—I mean to say I was not interested.

51210. The interest you took in the case died out?—When I say the interest I mean to say I read it and that is all. I took no interest in it.

51211. You had what you call a passing conversation, a matter of a few words, and then your interest in the case died out?—As far as I was concerned, because I never asked him any questions on the case; he came up at night time, did his work, I settled with him, and away he went.

51212. Only a very short time after that you had the conversation that I have asked you about, in which you said to Platt, "You have made a nice mess of it, Alf"?—I said to him, "You have made a mess of it," not taking it in any particular——

51213. I am not going back to that, but your interest had not entirely died out?—I had no interest; it was nothing to do with me.

51214. You wish us to understand that beyond that conversation on the night on which the evidence had been given in which Fisher referred to Platt's evidence as "What rot," or something of that kind, nothing further took place between you and Fisher?—No, only the remark passed that he was going to Messrs. Wontners, the solicitors. That was all.

51215. Was that said to you the first time?—No, later on.

51216. That is all that passed between you and Fisher about it?—That is all.

51217. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you know that Fisher went to the Clerkenwell Police Station?—No, I did not.

51218. You have followed the case in the papers, have you not?—Yes, sometimes. I generally read my paper when I go to bed at night, but sometimes I have been tired and read something, and not got as far as that.

51219. Do you know what Fisher's account has been to us? You have heard what he has said?—In what way?

51220. He has told us the reason why there were entries in the books of "Tecs 10s." was that he had been told by Platt to put that down in order to mislead McCarthy. Did you know that?—No.

51221. Did you know that he had put anything down?—Not at all; I knew nothing of their business because I never saw their books.

51222. Not at that time, but I am asking you about it since. Were you not aware that his story has been that he put down entries in the books in order that Platt might be able to defraud McCarthy?—No, I cannot say that I read that.

51223. Have you not heard that at all?—No.

51224. Has he not told you anything about that?—No.

51225. Have you ever heard that there were these entries found in the books?—No, not entries as regards the police money or something—what you are talking about.

51226. You have heard that the books do show various entries—so much for "coppers" and so much for "tecs"?—No, I do not remember reading that; I do not remember anything of that part that might have appeared in the day's paper when I did read the case.

51227. You say Fisher has not mentioned it to you?—He has not mentioned it to me.

51228. Has not Fisher ever given you any explanation of what he was doing at all?—No. I tell you I never bothered about the case; I never asked him anything about the case, and I never got it from him. It was not of any interest to me.

51229. You say you have given up street bookmaking?—Yes.

51230. Have you given up bookmaking altogether?—I am bookmaking.

51231. Platt asked you about something about a testimonial that you subscribed to?—I believe it was collected by two or three gentlemen, I know one gentleman who had a big interest in the affair was member of Parliament for St. Pancras.

51232. You said somebody came and asked you to subscribe and you gave a sovereign?—Yes, I think it was a man of the name of Dunham who brought me the subscription list.

51233. Did you know that Fisher had written to the Commission?—No, I did not know that he had written to the Commission.

51234. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) At the time that you read about Platt's evidence first the Fishers were with you?—Yes.

51235. Still working for you?—Yes.

51236. And taking money and accounting to you for it?—Yes.

51237. You saw from what was stated there that money had been accounted for as having been paid to the police when he was working with Platt?—In the first reading I think that was.

51238. Did he render you an account showing any expenses?—With the exception of the "lookers' out" expenses, that is all.

51239. You have not any notes, have you?—No. You see I never kept the books.

51240. He kept the books?—He kept the books. I mean to say it was only an ordinary pocket book, and there was the amount due to each punter, and I reckoned it up. He reckoned it up, and I reckoned it up to see that it tallied, and the money was given to me.

51241. The money would not tally because there was something for expenses?—I tell you there were only the "lookers' out" expenses.

51242. Those were the only expenses which would come off the money that was paid. All the rest was handed to you?—Yes.

51243. Nothing was deducted for dinners, drinks, or anything like that?—No.

51244. Did you ask him whether anything of the kind had taken place since they had been with you?—It had not been taking place, as far as I was concerned.

51245. That I quite understand you to say, but did you ask the Fishers whether anything of that kind had been taking place since they had been working for you?—No, I did not.

51246. You had been told that that was being done when they were working for Platt?—I read so.

51247. Did you think something of the sort might be done by them? Did that occur to your mind at all?—No, the subject was never put by me to them; I never even asked the question.

51248. I want to get clear when it was you first saw Fisher after Platt had given his evidence and after the papers had come out on the 18th October?—I told the gentlemen before I do not know whether I might have seen him on the night of the case or the night afterwards.

51249. You do not remember which it was?—No.

51250. Now tell me what it was that took place when you saw him?—I said, "Is this all right, Bob?" He said, "A lot of rot," or something of that kind. I was busy at the time working out some tricky papers, as betting papers sometimes are, and we did not force the conversation on either side.

51251. Did it not occur to you it might be an important matter if it was true?—It did not occur to me, because, as I tell you, I had no interest.

51252. The story which had been told, and which you read, with reference to a man still working for you, was that he had retained moneys for the police?—As I tell you, I had read that story, but I knew they were drawing nothing off me for the police, so I never had to bother.

51253. Did you say anything to him about paying money to the police when he was with you, or that he must not do it?—No, I did not tell him he must not do it, and he never mentioned it to me as regards whether he should do it or not.

51254. Were they convicted during the time they were working for you?—Yes.

51255. Which one?—Bob Fisher.

51256. That was on one occasion?—On one occasion.

51257. How long had he been working for you?—June 30th was the date when he finished with Platt.

51258. About that time?—Right up to nearly the end of the year, just before the new Act came in.

51259. About six months?—About six months.

51260. Did you know where his pitch was?—Yes, I knew where the pitch was, but I had never been there while they were at work. I had a pitch of my own, and I had to work that.

51261. Did Fisher always go to the same pitch?—In the same street, I believe.

61262. For six months?—Yes.

61263. Did they do much business?—They began to do a fair business at the finish.

61264. How many bets would they take a day?—I do not know. A man might walk up with ten slips; that would not account for ten people coming up.

51265. About how many slips would you get in a day?—I could not tell you the quantity of slips: they never were counted. I could tell you about the money.

51266. Perhaps that will do?—The takings on a big race day would come to about between £50 and £60; the takings on an ordinary day would be £25, and on Saturdays they would take about £35 to £40.

51267. About what would be the usual run of the sum that you paid for each bet?—I could not tell you. The papers would average, I suppose, from 2s. to 3s., and sometimes a sovereign on one and the next one 1s.

51268. Sovereign bets were rare, were they not?—They had one or two people who used to bet that way when they knew something.

51269. One or two, but the rest of them were in these smaller amounts of 2s. or 3s.?—Yes.

51270. There were a good number of people betting during the day?—Yes, a fair number of people.

51271. About what time would be the busiest time of the day?—The busiest time is from 1 to 2.

51272. Then anybody who knew how the business was carried on would know the busiest time of the day?—Yes; that is the busiest time of the day.

51273. Do you know how many lookers-out they had when they were working for you?—Two regularly, and occasionally another one on a big race day.

51274. As I understand you, they were working this way for about six months for you in the same street?—Yes.

51275. There was one conviction?—Yes.

51276. The busy time was from 1 to 2, when the slips were handed in on a race day. Is it not rather curious that there was only one conviction?—No. I think they were exceptionally lucky, as far as they were concerned.

51277. You had a bad time?—I had a very bad time.

51278. Why do you think that was? Do you think you were not quite so clever as they were?—I do not think I could run so fast. I had no chance of getting out. You see, I was right in the main road.

51279. Had you lookers-out?—Yes, I had some lookers-out.

51280. I suppose the lookers-out used to come and tell you if the police were coming?—If they knew it.

51281. They were good men, I suppose?—They were good men, but the police disguised themselves.

51282. It might be that the police were looking out for Fisher?—Yes, they were looking out for everybody.

51283. Did it not cross your mind that the Fishers might be doing something of the kind, considering how exceptionally lucky they were with you?—No.

51284. Did you ask them how they managed to keep clear when you did not?—No, I never bothered; I was glad they did, for it was bad enough for me.

51285. You mean it never occurred to your mind at all that something of the kind might have been going on when you read this story, and when they had been exceptionally lucky?—It never struck me for a minute.

51286. You did not even ask them the question?—I never bothered to ask them.

51287. Did you see McCarthy at all about this time?—When do you mean?

51288. Just after you read the account of what had taken place?—Yes, I occasionally saw McCarthy—three or four times a week.

51289. Did you have a talk with him about Platt's evidence?—No.

51290. Never mentioned it?—I cannot recollect ever mentioning it. We have generally met one another and had a cup of coffee or a drink or something.

51291. Just think about it. You had read this in the paper, and it made a stir amongst bookmakers?—No doubt it made a bit of a stir.

51292. Particularly with you, because the man had been betting for you?—He had not been betting for me.

51293. But you knew him?—I knew him, but that did not say he was betting for me.

51294. The man who had been doing it for Platt was working for you?—Yes.

51295. I suppose, as far as you were concerned, you were more directly interested than anybody else. The men whom you were paying at that time, and who were working with you, were the men who were said by Platt to have done this?—In the course of conversation I might have passed a remark, but I cannot recollect anything that was said with regard to the case with McCarthy.

51296. Do you remember having a conversation with him about who were the officers whose names Platt had written down?—No.

51297. You never had any talk with him at all?—Not about officers' names having been written down.

51298. Did you mention to him that you had seen the names had been written down and handed up to the Commission?—No.

51299. It is very likely you would mention it?—Whether it was likely or not, I did not mention anything about it.

51300. You had read it in the paper?—But I might not have read that part where the officers' names had been written down by Platt.

51301. Did you not say before that you had read that?—You ask me to say that I had read the officers' names myself. I had not read myself of the names having been written down.

51302. I have not asked you any such question. What I asked you was whether you had read that the names of officers were written down on a paper which was handed up to the Commission?—Yes, I believe that was in the first lot that I read.

51303. You did read that?—I read that in the first edition of the case.

51304. Did you say anything to McCarthy about that?—No.

51305. Or to Fisher?—No. The only mention of the case with Fisher was when I said, "Is that right?" He said, "A lot of rot." That is all.

51306. Do you mean you never had any other conversation with Fisher about it?—No, except when he told me he was going to Messrs. Wontner.

51307. Are we to understand you are telling us that you never had any conversation with Fisher about that matter except just these words: "Is that right, Bob?" and he said, "A lot of rot"? Did you have any other conversation about it?—I do not remember any special conversation.

51308. I did not ask you about a special conversation?—I do not remember having any conversation at all with him on the matter.

51309. Did he tell you he had been to Messrs. Wontner?—I do not think he did.

51310. Did you not want to know whether he had been to Messrs. Wontner?—How did it interest me? I did not ask him whether he had been or not.

51311. He did not tell you?—No, he did not tell me.

51312. How often were you seeing him?—When would the case come on?

51313. Never mind when the case came on. How often would you see him?—I would see him every evening up to the time of the new Act coming in.

51314. You would be seeing him every evening from the 18th October to the end of the year?—Yes.

51315. Did you not know that Fisher took part in this matter?—I read an account of his being drawn in, and I knew from his saying he was going to Messrs. Wontner that he was interested in the case.

51316. Did you not make any inquiries?—I made no inquiries at all.

51317. Did you see him every evening?—Yes. There were two brothers. I did not know how they arranged it, but I always got my papers all right, so I did not know how his time was taken up.

51318. Do you wish us to understand that you had no other conversations with Fisher about this matter than those two you have told us about?—I have no recollection of any other conversation on the matter.

51319. Did he ever mention Leach and Laing to you?—Never to me.

51320. Had you ever heard their names before?—I had heard of the name of Laing.

51321. Did you know him?—I knew him when he was a uniformed man, and before I was a betting man at all.

51322. How long ago was that?—Quite ten years ago.

51323. Did you know he was in the G Division?—Yes, because at one time I lived in the G Division.

51324. That was the division where Fisher was betting?—Yes.

51325. Did you ever see Laing at all?—I saw him, I tell you, when he was a policeman.

51326. But after the ten years ago when you knew him did you ever see him during the years Fisher was betting for you?—No.

51327. When did you first know that the officers' names were written down and handed in to the Commission?—I cannot tell you when I first knew.

51328. You mean you first knew it by reading it in the papers?—Yes.

51329. Did you know anything about the meeting at the bridge?—No.

51330. He seems to have told you nothing at all about what happened?—No, I never asked what happened, and he never told me.

51331. He was in your employ?—Yes, he was in my employ.

51332. Did you know that there were some entries in the books?—I never heard of Leach and Laing, and I did not know about any entries in the books.

51333. Did you read that there were entries in the books about "coppers" and "tecs"?—No, I cannot say I particularly did read about those two words, "coppers" and "tecs."

51334. You did read sufficient to show you that there were entries in the books which would appear to show that the statement was made?—Sometimes I would pick the paper up and read it, and then on the next occasion would not read it. Sometimes I would take it up and read it, and sometimes I would not read it.

51335. Did you read that there were entries in the books which were produced to the Commission which showed that payments had been made to the police?—No, I do not know that I recollect the words "coppers" and "tecs."

51336. It showed you, anyhow, that, according to the books, payments were being made to the police?—Yes, I read that.

51337. Did you ask Fisher anything about that?—No.

51338. It is in Fisher's handwriting when Fisher was in Platt's employ?—Yes, but I do not remember that the payments were in Fisher's handwriting.

51339. You knew they were payments with regard to which Fisher was said to be involved?—Yes, but I did not know they were in Fisher's handwriting.

51340. Never mind about Fisher's handwriting. You knew they were payments with regard to which Fisher was said to be involved?—Yes.

51341. Did you ask nothing about it?—No.

51342. He did not give you any information at all about it?—No, not at all.

51343. Although he had been so exceptionally lucky?—He had been exceptionally lucky, as you say, and there was an end of it.

51344. It never struck you in any way, if it was true, that that might have accounted for it?—No, it never struck me at all.

51345. If it was true, it might have accounted for it?—If it was true, it might have accounted for it.

51346. But it never occurred to you to ask if it were true?—No.

51347. He went on betting for you?—He went on betting right to the end of the year.

51348. Were there any convictions after that date of the Fishers? After the time when this evidence was given, can you tell me whether the Fishers, who you told me were betting for you up to the end of the year, were convicted after October? Can you tell me, Mr. Muir?

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I am afraid I do not remember the dates, but I can look it up in a minute.

(Mr. Platt.) One.

(Mr Rufus Isaacs.) One there was, I think.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) The 6th October, 1906, seems to be the latest.

51349. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As I understand you, Fisher never mentioned to you Leach and Laing?—No.

51350. Neither before nor after the 18th October?—No.

51351. Suppose it is said to us that Fisher told you that he was asked by Leach and Laing whether their names had been mentioned, what do you say as to that?—Supposing Fisher had said so?

51352. Supposing we were told that Fisher had seen you and told you that Leach and Laing had been to see him and asked him whether their names had been mentioned?—Supposing it had been told to me—who by?

51353. By Fisher. Is there any foundation for that at all? Can you recollect anything like it?—No, I can recollect him saying nothing to me about it at all.

51354. Would you be prepared to swear it is not true that Fisher told you that Laing and Leach had been to him and asked him whether their names (that is, Laing and Leach) had been mentioned at the Commission?—I should be prepared to swear I had no recollection of Fisher telling it to me.

51355. I understand you have no recollection, but I want to understand more than that. Are you prepared to swear that no such thing took place?—That Fisher should mention it to me?

51356. Not that Fisher should, but that Fisher did?—I am prepared to swear that Fisher did not mention it to me.

51357. You understand the question?—That Fisher should mention to me that Laing and Leach had been to him to ask him if they were in the case?

51358. If their names were in the case?—Yes, I am prepared to swear that Fisher never said that to me.

51359. That is what I want. You are quite clear that that never took place?—That never took place.

51360. (Chairman.) Does that answer apply to Bob Fisher only, or to Bill Fisher as well?—To either one of them.

51361. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) If anybody says that to us, then, as far as you are concerned, that is an untruth?—That is an untruth, as far as I am concerned.

51362. It never did take place?—It never did take place.

51363. Fisher never said anything of the kind?—No.

51364. Did you ever hear anything of it?—No.

51365. You had no such conversation or anything approaching it?—No.

51366. Now tell me about the conversation with Platt which you had. When was it you saw him after he had given his evidence on the 18th October?—I cannot say. It might have been a month or five weeks or six weeks. I know one morning I ran across Platt, and he said to me, "Did you read my case?" and I said "Yes, you made a nice mess of it." That was all, and I went home.

51367. According to what you understood, he had been swearing to a lot of lies?—I thought that the case was not true. I did not think the evidence was true.

51368. That is what you mean us to understand, is it?—That is what I thought at the time.

51369. That is what you thought after what you had read, and after what you had heard from Fisher?—Yes, after what I had read.

51370. Is that all that took place between you and Platt about it?—Yes, I had almost got by him when I noticed him.

51371. Have you had any other conversation with him since?—I have met him on several occasions, but the last conversation I had with him that I can recollect, was about a month or five weeks ago, when I said, "I hope my name is not brought into the case."

51372. Why did you say that?—Because I thought he might mention my name, and I did not want him to mention my name—not that I was not willing to come here and give evidence, but it interferes with my business.

51373. The business being that of a bookmaker?—I did not want my name to be mentioned in any way; I did not want my name to go into the papers; and I thought if he had not mentioned it it might have saved him from mentioning it.

51374. Is that all that took place?—Yes.

51375. What did he say in answer to that, do you remember?—I think he said, "I do not suppose your name will be mentioned," or something like that.

51376. Is this a month or five weeks ago?—Four, five or six weeks ago.

51377. Did you not know by this time that it had been mentioned?—No.

51378. You had not heard?—No.

51379. I do not quite understand about this letter. This is on the 18th October, and that is the day on which the evidence was given. Fisher wrote to the Secretary of the Commission about this matter. Do I understand you to say you knew nothing at all about his having written this letter?—I know nothing at all about his writing a letter.

51380. Or that he was going to write a letter?—No. The only thing I knew was he was going to Messrs. Wontner.

51381. He told you he was going to Messrs. Wontner. That you did know?—Yes.

GEORGE DEED, sworn.

G. Deed. 21 June 1907.

51382. (Chairman.) You were formerly in the Metropolitan Police Force?—Yes.

51383. And were 180 L, I think?—Yes.

51384. What are you doing now?—A porter in a fruit and vegetable line.

51385. What is your address?—10, Eustace Road, Chadwell Heath, Essex.

51386. You know Alfred James Platt, who is sitting there, do you not?—Yes.

51387. When did you enter the police force?—3rd July, 1899.

51388. Did you join the L Division?—Yes.

51389. And you were in the L Division until your dismissal from the force?—Yes.

51390. In the year 1903 were you employed on any special duty?—On plain clothes duty, keeping observation on bookmakers.

51391. When did you begin that duty in 1903?—I could not say. I believe it was before 1903 when I started in plain clothes.

51392. I do not want to go back before the year 1903, but we have been told that constables do that work at intervals. You did not do it continuously from January 1st to December 31st?—No.

51393. Do you remember what month in 1903 you were put on that special observation?—I cannot say for certain, but I believe it was in April.

51394. Had you done that kind of special duty in the L Division before?—Yes.

51395. How long in 1902?—I did it just up to the time of my dismissal—just on three years—three summers.

51396. Then in April, 1903, you were put on that kind of duty again?—Yes.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) The date accurately is the 3rd March, 1903.

51397. (Chairman.) Were you continuously or nearly continuously engaged upon that duty from the 3rd March until the end of October?—Yes.

51398. When the charge was made against you?—Yes.

51399. Did you effect any arrests during that time?—Yes, a good many.

51400. When did you first make Platt's acquaintance?—I could not say for certain; I believe it was about three months previous to this; it may have been four; I could not say to a week or two.

51401. You began in March. When did you make Platt's acquaintance?—It was some time after that when I knew Platt—a week or two afterwards.

51402. I think you arrested Platt under the name of Smith once or twice, did you not?—No, I never arrested Platt.

51403. Do you remember a police-constable named Soer?—Yes.

51404. And a police-constable named Gunn, who were in the same Division?—Yes.

51405. They were at work, were they not, on the same kind of duty?—Yes.

51406. How did you come to make Platt's acquaintance?—I made his acquaintance. I knew standing in Robert Street there was a bookmaker, and I heard his name was Platt. Some said his name was Smith, but I was not certain which it was until at last he was arrested under the name of Smith, and I found out his name was Platt.

51407. Did you have any conversation with him?—No.

51408. Did you ever go into a public-house with him?—No, not whilst in the police force.

51409. Were you with Soer or Gunn at any time when Platt or Smith was arrested?—No, I do not recollect it.

51410. Then you wish me to understand that down to the 22nd October you had had no conversation with Platt at all?—No conversation with him except they nod when you pass by in the street—not to stop and speak to him.

51411. He had nodded to you?—Yes. He said, "I see you are out again, guv'nor," as I passed by just before they started taking the bets.

51412. And that although you were in plain clothes?—Yes.

51413. And you had never spoken to him?—Yes.

51414. Do you think when he made use of that kind of expression he knew you were a police officer?—Yes. We are watched from the station, no matter where we come from, they find out where we are living, and they would find it out to see what kind of a disguise you come out in.

51415. Am I to understand that Platt used that kind of expression to you, "I see you are out again, Guv'nor"?—Yes. He used that in the Lower Marsh one morning about 11 o'clock.

51416. Where is that?—In the Waterloo Road.

51417. That was not on the pitch then?—No.

51418. Apart from saluting you in that way, we are to understand that you never had any business or conversation or anything with Platt?—No, not up to the time that I made the bet.

51419. I am coming to that. Will you tell us, please, in your own way what happened on the 22nd October?—On the 22nd October I had been over the place, I wanted to make a bet, and knowing Platt was a bookmaker (he had his back turned) I went straight up to him (he never saw me coming), and I asked him if he would take a bet. He said, "Certainly, that is what I am here for." I gave him the bet and I left him. I did not see him again until I saw him in the evening at Kennington Road Police Station.

51420. When you say you gave him the bet, do you mean you handed him a slip of paper?—And money.

51421. What was on the slip of paper?—I cannot remember the names of the horses now, I know I gave him two sovereigns.

51422. Were you betting on your own account?—Yes.

51423. Had you often done that?—Not often—I had not.

51424. Had you sometimes?—I had done it on several occasions but not often.

51425. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Do you mean you had made a bet before with Platt?—Not with Platt.

51426. With somebody else?—Yes.

51427. (Chairman.) This was the first time you had made a bet with Platt?—Yes.

51428. Platt had saluted you one day before that, I understand?—Yes.

51429. When he said, "I see you are out again, Guv'nor," or something like that?—Yes.

51430. When you made the bet with Platt you knew that Platt would look upon you as one of the plain clothes men on duty?—I did not know until I went up to him whether he would recognise me. I was dressed very rough. I think I was dressed up as a coal-heaver when I went up to him with the bet.

51431. You were in disguise?—Yes.

51432. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did he know you through the disguise?—He knew me when I gave him the bet.

51433. (Chairman.) What makes you think he knew you?—Because he asked me whether I would have a drink. I said, "No."

51434. What did you put on the slip, do you remember?—I cannot remember.

51435. In addition to the horses name did you put your own name?—I cannot remember now.

51436. How were you to get the money?—I should have remembered the names on the slips, but I cannot remember now.

51437. Where would you have to go to get the money. I suppose before you handed him two sovereigns you took his card, or you knew where to find him?—I asked him "If I should back a winner where do you pay out?" I believe he said "On the corner at the 'Hero of Waterloo.'"

51438. You handed him £2, and that is all that took place?—Yes.

51439. Did the horse win?—One horse won, and one did not run.

51440. When you say you did not see him again until the evening was it at the police station that you saw him?—I had seen him before I went to the police station.

51441. Did you go and try to get your money?—I went and asked him for the money, and he refused to pay me.

51442. Am I to understand that you were betting on your own account and not on account of somebody else?—No, on my own account.

51443. Not on account of a Guv'nor, whoever the Guv'nor might have been?—No.

51444. What did Platt say when you claimed your money?—He said, "Oh I have not got any change now; meet me outside the 'Ship' in Kennington Road."

51445. Did you meet him outside the "Ship"?—I went up there for a few minutes, but he did not come.

51446. About what time was that?—I should think about 7 o'clock—between 7 and 8, as near as I remember.

51447. Did you find out his private address?—Yes, I found that out. He gave his own address when charged before—Bird Street.

51448. I though you had nothing to do with that?—I was not there when he was arrested.

51449. Did you see him at the police court?—No, I did not see him at the police court.

51450. Had you seen him at the police station?—No.

51451. Then how did you know his private address?—By looking through the Charge Book we get the addresses of these people and keep them in a pocket book of our own.

51452. Then having made the bet with him, and knowing him as Smith or Platt you knew him by name, did you?—As Smith or Platt. I did not know which was his name then.

51453. When you got back to the station did you take the opportunity of finding his address?—No. If I recollect rightly, I believe he gave me his address the same day. "Either here or down Bird Street, where I live." I cannot recollect the exact words.

51454. Did you say where you lived as well?—Do you mean my place.

51455. Did you give him your address where you lived?—I believe he gave me the address where he lived. "Either down here, or at my house in Bird Street."

51456. You said "At the 'Hero?'"—Yes, he was standing by the "Hero" when I gave it to him.

51457. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Either at the "Hero" or his private address?—Yes.

51458. (Chairman.) Did you go to his private address that evening?—Yes.

51459. What time did you get there?—I think it was between 7 and 8.

51460. Was he at home?—Yes.

51461. What passed between you?—He said, "I have got no change now; meet me outside the 'Ship' in Kennington Road, and I will pay you."

51462. Did you go to the "Ship"?—I went to the "Ship."

51463. What time did you get there?—I went straight from Platt's house—about a quarter of an hour afterwards.

51464. You did not get your money?—I did not see him there.

51465. When did you next see him?—I walked from there up towards the "Tankard," up the Kennington Road, and I met him outside there.

51466. What passed between you there?—He said he did not mean paying me, and that I made the bet after time.

51467. Was that the case? Have you since found out that he was right?—I still say the bet was a straightforward bet.

51468. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It might have been after time although you might not have known it?—I do not think so.

51469. (Chairman.) You still say you won the bet?—Yes, I do say I won the bet.

51470. According to the rules of the card that he was playing by?—I cannot say that I saw his card; I do not recollect having his card.

51471. Platt's contention, according to what he told us, was that you had given him the bet after the race had been run?—No.

51472. Was there anything on the slip to indicate the time at which you handed the slip to him?—No, I only put the horses' names down. I cannot say what name I put on the bottom of the slip now.

51473. Then, as far as you know, the race may have been run?—No.

51474. Do you know what time it was when you gave him the slip?—2.10.

51475. How do you know that?—I recollect that.

51476. That is a mere estimate?—I thought the race was run at 2.15, but I have not a record of it now. I think the race was 2.26 or something.

51477. I suppose it does not mean the time at which the race is actually run, but the time that it is timed to run according to the racing fixture?—I believe the time was 2.15.

51478. You say you gave the slip at 2.10?—Yes.

51479. It is not very important from my point of view, but still, as far as I can make out, you had nothing to check the time by?—That is true.

51480. Platt said he got the slip after the race was run?—When I gave him the slip I do recollect he looked at the slip and said, "All right"; I do recollect that; and he put the slip in his coat pocket, and the money in his trousers pocket.

51481. Yes, but he said there was nothing on the slip to fix the hour at all?—No.

51482. So that his looking at the slip had nothing to do with the question of whether the race had been run or not. That did not enlighten him. That did not throw any light on the matter at all?

51483. (Mr. Whitmore.) I suppose you named the race?—Yes. As a rule the bookmakers put the time on the slip when they take it.

51484. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Then you would not name the race?—Not necessarily.

51485. (Chairman.) When you met in the evening outside the "Ship" Platt disputed the validity of the bet?—He promised to meet me there, but he did not meet me there.

51486. But you did meet somewhere?—Outside the "Tankard."

51487. That was the first time you say he told you the bet was not won?—Yes.

51488. Because he had had the slip after the race was run?—Yes.

51489. What did you do then?—I could not do anything then. From there I walked home.

51490. Later on you saw him at the police station?—That is right.

51491. The same night?—Yes.

51492. What took place then?—He had been to the station and made a complaint that I had made a bet well knowing the horse had won the race, and demanded the money. I simply asked him for it. I could not make him give it to me.

51493. What you wish us to understand is that before that day you had never spoken to Platt at all?—No.

51494. That Platt had on one occasion said, "I see you are out again, guv'nor," or some words like that?—Yes.

51495. That you had never arrested Platt yourself?—No.

51496. But that you knew he had been arrested?—Yes.

51497. And that you went to him and made this bet?—Yes.

51498. Is it true that at any time you gave him any money?—Only this time.

51499. Except the two sovereigns mentioned?—That is the only time.

G. Teed. 21 June 1907.

51500. I will read you what he says: "This man" (that is Deed), "with others, came demanding a sum of money from me amounting to £22 16s."?—Yes, I think that is quite right.

51501. That was the right amount?—Quite right.

51502. Was there anybody with you?—No, no one with me whatever when I went to Platt's house.

51503. Was anybody with you when you went to him at the "Tankard"?—No.

51504. Was no one with you at the "Ship"?—No, I did not meet him at the "Ship."

51505. Then it goes on in this way. I say, "Let me understand. £22 16s. I think you said was the amount? (A.) Yes, which he tried to obtain by these means." That is by your going to him with other men. "Their pay day, as I term it, is on Tuesday. (Q.) Whose pay day? (A.) These officers. (Q.) Pay day by whom—by you? (A.) Yes. (Q.) Is there a kind of settled pay day between you? (A.) Yes, whatever time suits their convenience. We arranged Tuesday. Of course, I have found them come round with a pitiful tale. They can come twice a week; it is quite possible for them to be greedy. Of course, I paid them the same amount again. (Q.) Had you been in the habit of paying money to Deed on Tuesdays, or on other days?" and he answered "Yes." Is that true?—No.

51506. Then I asked Platt, "What had you been in the habit of paying Deed?" and he answered "A sovereign a week." Is that true?—No.

51507. You say there is not a word of truth in the allegation that you had been bribed by Platt in the summer of 1903?—No.

51508. Had you any kind of arrangement with him as to when you or any other constable might arrest him?—No.

51509. Were you ever inside a public-house with him?—No.

51510. I understand that as a result of the complaint made by Platt you were dismissed from the Force?—Yes.

51511. For what offence were you dismissed?—I cannot tell you the exact wording; I believe it was for leaving the patrol and making a bet with a bookmaker.

51512. You were asked to explain yourself, I suppose?—Yes.

51513. Did you tell your senior officer what you had in fact done?—Yes, I did.

51514. You admitted you had made a bet?—Yes.

51515. Did you explain your view of the transaction with Platt?—Yes.

51516. You explained that in your view he owed you £22 16s.?—I do not say whether I said £22, I know I told the inspector in the office when he was making the complaint. He said, "Do you admit it?" I said "I do admit it." Then Platt said "You said it was for the guv'nor." I said, "I have never said any such thing." Then Platt made a complaint that I had been in a public-house, and that I received 5s. on a Saturday off him, which I denied.

51517. I think I had better put a question to get it quite clear as to what you wish to say to us. Did you ever arrange with Soer and Gunn that Platt was to be arrested once a month or at a settled time?—No.

51518. Or that you and they were to receive what he calls your "pay" on any particular day, or anything of that kind?—No.

51519. Did you ever see him treat Soer and Gunn, or any other constable?—No.

51520. Have you any reason to believe that he did?—I do not believe he did.

51521. You cannot recall any fact which might lead you to think it is possible he was in league with them?—No, I cannot.

51522. Probably you have read the allegations that Platt has made before this Commission against the officers of the L Division?—I have.

51523. Is there anything that leads you to believe that there is any truth in the allegations against any of the officers whose names have been mentioned?—I do not believe one word of it.

51524. You know that even if you have to admit that you yourself have been guilty of some offence we have the power to give you an indemnity against any of the consequences of prosecution for that offence if you make a full and true disclosure before this Commission?—I am making one now.

51525. You have made one?—I have made one.

51526. You know nothing that would assist us in determining whether Platt's charges are true or false?—I could not tell you. Shall I tell you now what happened when I was dismissed from the police force?

51527. Yes?—I was dismissed from the police force on, I think it was, the 23rd October. I went to work for a man named Davis in Farringdon Vegetable Market. While I was working in this market Platt came to see me four times in the market, and he said, "You are out of a job now; I think it is time we got the other b———s, not only in this division, but in the other division as well, and it will not do you any harm if you come with me to Mr. Conway, solicitor, in Westminster, and swear that you, with other officers" (he mentioned their names, but I cannot tell you the names), "have received money off me at different times in different public-houses, and you shall have a 'pony' for it. We made a subscription amongst the bookmakers in Lambeth to give you a 'pony' if you will do it." I said, "Give me the 'pony' first." He said, "No, we shall not give you the 'pony' first; you shall have it afterwards." On the following week I was taken ill, and I was at home a week and three days. During the time I was at home my wife was in the bedroom with me, and my wife's sister—it is true I was out of bed—when they saw Platt coming. I had my boots on, my trousers, jacket, and waistcoat. He had a fish-bag in his hand. I wondered why he was coming. I pulled off my jacket and waistcoat and jumped into bed with my trousers and boots on. A knock came to the door. He said, "Is Mr. Deed in?" "Yes, he is in bed." "Can I see him?" "I do not know; I will ask him." She came and said, "Can Mr. Platt see you?" He came in. He said, "Hullo, old chap, what are you doing? What is the matter with you?" I said, "I do not know what is the matter; I have a pain in my back, I can hardly stand." There was a bottle of lotion on the table. He said, "Is that what you are rubbing yourself with?"

51528. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Cannot you give us the point of it? What did he say about it?—He said, "I have brought a fish for you; this is turbot," or something; "I hope it will do you good. Are you still prepared to come over to see Mr. Conway?" I said, "What about the money?" I said, "Give me the money first, and I will come." He said, "No, you shall have the money afterwards." "Then," I said, "I shall not come." When he was going, he said, "Can I make an appointment for you with Frank the Diver?" That was this young man's father. I said, "I do not know." He said, "Do not let us meet this side of the water; let us meet the other side." I proposed Blackfriars. He said, "Where are you going to work?" I told him. Before I went to work I went to Kennington Road and told Inspector Spencer what had occurred, and said he would send a man (I was not going to put away a man falsely like that) to hear the conversation in the public-house at the time. I promised, I think, to be there at half-past seven. I did not get there until after eight o'clock. I hung back to make sure the officer would be there. When I got there Platt came outside and said, "Deed, there is a bloke inside; I do not like the look of him." I went inside and looked at him, and came out. Platt said, "Do you know him?" I said, "No, I do not know him." It was a police officer Platt alluded to. We had two drinks. Platt said, "We are not going to sit here any longer; we will go somewhere else." We went to a public house in Andrew's Street. He said, "Here is half a sovereign for Frank the Diver," and he put two half-sovereigns down, and I picked them up. I said, "Not before you give me the money you promised will I make the statement." He refused to give me the money, and I refused to have anything to do with it.

51529. (Chairman.) As I understand it, you were willing, if he gave you a "pony," or £25, to give this false evidence against the police?—I should not have done a thing like that, or I should not have gone to the police station and asked the Inspector to send someone to watch there.

51530. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You had kept the money?—He put two half-sovereigns down and I picked them up.

51531. If he had put down the £25 you would have kept it?—I should not have gone and done such a thing.

(Chairman.) You wish us to understand you were drawing Platt on. You were willing to take his money and induce him to believe you would go and help him in the way suggested?

(Mr. Platt.) Yes, with the whole of the police force behind him.

(Witness.) He further wanted me to go to the South London Sessions and swear I had been in public-houses with Soer and different constables.

(Chairman.) Have you anything else to add which you think is relevant?

(Witness.) I do not think there is anything else I have to say.

(Chairman.) Mr. Platt, I think you are entitled to cross-examine the witness.

51532. (Mr. Platt.) You have told the Commission that on the day you made the bet you saw me in the station that same evening?—I believe it was the next morning. Yes, I did say that.

51533. Was it the same evening?—It is a long while ago; I might have made a mistake.

51534. You have just told us it was the same evening?—I said it was the same evening, but I might have made a mistake.

51535. You called at my house in company with others demanding of me money?—No, I never demanded it at all. I was on my own.

51536. That was on a Saturday in October, 1903?—Yes.

51537. Did you come to my house on Sunday?—No.

51538. Did you come to my house on Monday?—No.

51539. Did you not go down on your knees and cry for me not to go on with you?—No.

51540. You have never knocked at my door?—I knocked at your door once.

51541. Once?—Yes, on one occasion.

51542. Who was with you? Who got the winner off the telephone?—No one.

51543. What is your nickname now?—I have got so many, I do not know what my nickname is.

51544. Is it "Telephone"?—Not that I am aware of.

51545. Will you swear that when you were billiard marker and potman at the King's Head at the corner of King Edward Street you have never been called "Telephone" there?—I will not deny that—not to my knowledge.

51546. You know Alfred Platt?—I have reason to.

51547. Is there any one of your friends which I have not mentioned here yet in the L Division that you have brought round to have money off me?—I have not brought one round.

51548. A man very much like yourself?—There are a good many like me, I expect.

51549. Yes, there are. There were plenty of you to receive in the street I was betting in. Is there a brewery there?—Yes.

51550. Did many of the policemen come there for a drink?—I do not think so.

51551. You never had one there?—No.

51552. You never had one there?—No.

51553. You have never had one?—No.

51554. You have never been in the Hero with me?—No.

51555. Where did you give me that money?—Outside the Hero.

51556. But you admit you came inside and had a drink?—No, I did not.

51557. Where did you have the 5s.?—I never had the 5s.

51558. Inside?—I never had the 5s.

51559. Inside?—I never had the 5s.

51560. Never had a dinner in the Hero?—I have had several dinners there.

51561. And so have other officers, have they not?—I do not know.

51562. You know they have?—Not to my knowledge.

51563. You know they have had dinner there?—Not to my knowledge.

51564. While they have waited for me?—Not to my knowledge.

51565. How far did you have to come to me to enable you to make that bet?—I think I was patrolling in the Lambeth Road, if I recollect rightly.

51566. How many bookmakers did you pass?—I do not know. I think I was in the Lambeth Road.

51567. You worked for a bookmaker very near Lambeth Road?—Yes.

51568. You admit working for a bookmaker. How many bookmakers do you know? How many bookmakers have you put your hand out to?—To arrest them, a good many.

51569. No—in that way (illustrating)?—No.

51570. (Chairman.) Did you ever work for a street bookmaker?—No, I never worked for a street bookmaker. I was working at a greengrocer's place, where a bookmaker was, and true I was arrested there once. That was before I was in the Police Force. I was arrested for assisting a bookmaker, but I was not assisting him.

51571. Was that before you became a policeman, or after?—No, after. I was fined £5 at Westminster Police Court.

51572. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Did you plead guilty?—I pleaded not guilty.

51573. You were at a bookmaker's who kept a greengrocer's shop?—No, I was working for a greengrocer where a bookmaker was standing outside the shop. The bookmaker was not keeping the greengrocer's shop. I was only there for a fortnight. I knew there had been several complaints sent in, and I heard there had been several complaints sent in, that I was helping bookmakers, and, that being so, I suppose the police kept observation on me.

51574. Who arrested you?—P.C. Goodwilling and Sergeant Williams.

51575. How long after you had left the Force?—Some considerable time.

51576. What were you charged with?—I cannot tell you now what was on the charge.

51577. You were fined £5?—Yes, at the Westminster Police Court.

51578. Who paid the fine?—The greengrocer paid the fine.

51579. The greengrocer got it from the bookmaker?—He gave it to the bookmaker to pay the fine.

51580. Was that before you went to the police court to be tried?—No, I should think I was in the police court about three hours in the cells.

51581. Then you were fined £5. Was that paid there and then?—No, about three hours afterwards.

51582. Then the greengrocer gave the bookmaker the £5?—Yes.

51583. (Mr. Platt.) The day that you gave me the slip and the £2 who was with you?—No one.

51584. Some gentlemen here would like to find him. There was only the outlet here to the nearest public-house, the Hero. You came along to arrest me, and I gave you a nod to go in to the Hero. Your word to me was "Oh, Alf, I have not come for that"—because I put my hand quick in my pocket to pay you—"I have come and brought you a bet from the guv'nor"?—No, I never used those words.

51585. You gave me two sovereigns?—Yes.

51586. Two sovereigns, and not two shillings?—No.

51587. You look at a paper with two sovereigns on it, but not with two shillings perhaps?—Yes.

51588. I asked you what race the horses were in?—You never asked me any such thing.

51589. I asked you what race the horses were in?—You never did.

51590. Then while you and your friends were having a drink I called your attention to the time?—I may have went and had a drink.

51591. I called your attention to the time?—No.

51592. And marked that paper "2.40"?—No.

51593. Telling you that you were not on anything at all.

G. Deed.
21 June 1907.

(Chairman.) We do not think you need go into that. It does not matter which of you is in the right about that. He says he had no check at all on the time at which he handed the slip to you. You need not cross-examine about that.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It does not throw any light on the question whether you are right or whether he is right.

51594. (Mr. Platt.) Have you ever been in the Two Eagles with me?—Where is the Two Eagles? Anyhow, I have never been in there with you.

51595. It never happened to you when you stuck to another constable's money, and met me in there, that I paid it for you?—No, you can never say that. I should like you to prove that.

51596. Outside the Two Eagles I paid the money you stuck to?—Never.

51597. Have you ever lived in Campbell's Buildings?—Yes.

51598. How far are they from the Pocock Arms?—The Peacock Arms is about 20 or 30 yards.

51599. It is a house near where you were living?—Yes.

51600. It is a house you would go and have a drink in?—Sometimes.

51601. You have been in there?—Sometimes.

51602. Have you ever been in there with 204 L and myself?—No.

51603. They have a double entrance there?—I think they have four entrances.

51604. There is a double entrance. You can go in the house one way and go out another?—There is one.

51605. We have walked in there and walked out the other side?—No.

51606. How was it you went in there?—Engaged by the occupant.

51607. How did you get to know him?—I was not engaged by the bookmaker.

51608. How did you get to know him?—By arresting him. I think I arrested him more times than anyone else.

51609. How far was the station?—About 50 yards.

51610. What was his name?—Burnett, I have known him by the name of.

51611. Jack Burnett?—Yes.

51612. How much have you had off him?—Nothing at all.

51613. Nor his employer?—No; I did not know he had an employer.

51614. You do not know when the barber's shop was raided?—I was not there.

51615. You knew him?—I did not know him.

51616. Have you not played billiards with him?—No.

51617. Before you were out of the Force?—No—afterwards I think.

51618. You are employed now as a porter?—Yes.

51619. When did I last see you?—I cannot tell you the last time you saw me now.

51620. I did not leave half a sovereign that day?—Not the last time you saw me.

51621. No?—I cannot recollect the last time you saw me.

51622. You ought to know?—I do not know the last time I saw you.

51623. The last time I saw you?—I have seen you a good many times.

51624. Each and every word I have said to you you have gone with to Kennington Road Station?—No, only on one occasion, and I think I was justified in doing that.

51625. Twice?—Only on one occasion.

51626. Three or four times?—I do not think so.

51627. You would not say you have not been there three or four times?—I have been there a good many times.

51628. Did I hold out hopes to you to be reinstated.—No, I do not think so. I knew I could not be reinstated after being convicted for working with a book maker.

51629. There are others in the force that have done worse than you have, and have been reinstated within twelve months?—I was unfortunate, and I could not be.

51630. It was unfortunate for you.

51631. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Do I understand you to say that when you went and made this bet (never mind about the time) you did not say anything about its being for anybody else?—No, I did not.

51632. Not for the "guv'nor"?—No.

51633. Nor for anybody?—No.

51634. Quite clear about that?—Quite clear.

51635. Cannot be making a mistake?—No.

51636. There has never been any question of its being for a friend of yours?—No.

51637. And you never said so?—No.

51638. Let me call your attention to what appears in the report. Did you put this question to Platt: "When I met you did I not say to you, 'I have got a bet from a friend of mine'"?—Not to my knowledge; I cannot recollect saying that.

51639. This is signed by you?—I might have dropped it. It is a long while ago. I do not recollect saying it. If I have signed it I must have said it, but I do not recollect saying it.

51640. It is rather important. You were very definite and precise about your never having said about its being for anybody else?—If I have signed it I must have said it, but I do not recollect it. It is a long time ago. I have not thought anything else about it since then.

51641. You profess to recollect the time at which you made the bet. Is that your signature?—That is.

51642. You remember that?—Yes, I remember that.

51643. Now read that question: "When I met you did I not say, 'I have got a bet from a friend of mine, not the guv'nor'"; and did not Platt say, "No, you said it was from the guv'nor"?—I cannot follow that. It was 2.10 when I came by the "Wellington"—I know that much.

51644. It is quite plain that you did say it?—Yes.

51645. Had you a friend?—No.

51646. How came you to say it?—I cannot say; I was on my own then. I had plenty of friends about, but I had not a friend with me then.

51647. Just think a minute?—It is true I had plenty of friends about, but I had not a friend with me.

51648. Think of what you are saying. I am asking you about this incident which took place in October, 1903. You see I have called your attention to the fact of what you did say. You remember there was an inquiry held on Platt's complaint about you?—Yes.

51649. And this was an inquiry which was a serious one for you?—Yes.

51650. I think it was held by Subdivisional Inspector Spencer?—Yes.

51651. Platt made a statement in your presence?—Yes.

51652. And you, in accordance with the rules of the force, then were asked whether you had any questions to put to him. He had stated in his statement that you told him that the bet was for the "guv'nor"?—Yes.

51653. I have called your attention to what you are putting forward. "When I met you did I not say, 'I have got a bet from a friend of mine.'" Was it true that you had a bet from a friend of yours?—No, that was my own bet. I do not recollect saying that.

51654. It is clear you did say it?—Yes.

51655. How did you come to say it, do you know?—I cannot think.

51656. Do you remember on that occasion Platt stating that he had given you 5s. when you gave him the £2?—Yes, I remember him saying that.

51657. You see some importance in that statement about the "guv'nor" or the friend, because according to Mr. Platt's statement you brought him a bet with the £2 which you handed to him which you said was for somebody else. Platt's statement is that when he took it he then gave you 5s.?—Yes.

51658. You heard him say it?—Yes.

51659. Why did you not deny it?—Deny making the bet?

51660. Deny receiving the 5s.?—I did deny receiving the 5s.

51661. Before the Inspector?—I denied receiving the money from him, and I denied going in the public-house with him.

51662. Just think. I am speaking now of the 20th October. You did not ask any question about it, I see?—I cannot recollect what I asked now.

51663. You did not ask anything about that. If you had said you had a friend who told you he wanted to make a bet, that would have been a lie, would it not?—It would have been a lie. When I went to the station I must have said that, but I do not recollect saying it. Whether I said it at the station or no I cannot say.

51664. That is the question you were putting that I was calling attention to. It is much more important than that, and I can understand your being under some excitement. Here is a report of the 24th October which you had to make in reference to the complaint. "With reference to complaint made against me by Alfred Platt, I beg to report that at 2.15 p.m. on the 17th I met a friend at Waterloo Road, when he told me that he wanted to make a bet, but that he was unable to see a bookmaker." Was that true?—No.

51665. "He asked me if I would put it on for him." Was that true?—No.

51666-7. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Will you let me have the original statement of the 20th October? (The original statement was handed to the learned Commissioner.) "I at first refused, but I afterwards consented to do so." In whose handwriting is that?—My writing.

51668. That is your own statement in answer to the complaint made by Platt. You see that—"I at first refused, but I afterwards consented to do so." I need not prolong it. That is your statement. It is your writing, and there is your signature. There is no doubt about it that is an invention. It is so, is it not?—I was not with a friend.

51669. All this story I have just read to you was an invention of yours. There is no mistake about it is there?—No; the simple reason I put that was I did not want the police to know I was making a bet on my own, that is the reason why I did put that.

51670. You were trying to shield yourself from its being thought that it was your own bet, because you knew that was wrong?—Yes, I know I was wrong in making a bet.

51671. I see in this statement, probably the one you are referring to, you say this.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) If you are passing from that point, I think it right that I should interpose a question, if I may do so, on the information I have got.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Yes, I do not object to your putting it.

51672. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) Did you see Inspector Spencer this morning?—Yes.

51673. In the presence of Inspector Noviss?—Yes.

51674. Did Superintendent Noviss ask you for whom that bet was made?—Yes.

51675. Did you tell him?—I did.

51676. Who was it made for?—I do not wish to bring in the person's name.

51677. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Am I to understand that you did make a bet for a person?—Now, yes, but I did not wish to bring the man's name into it.

51678. Then what you have been swearing to me just now was a deliberate untruth on your oath?—I did not wish to bring the man's name in.

51679. For that reason you have not hesitated to tell an untruth on your oath in answer to the questions I have been putting to you. Now, Sir, who is the person you made the bet for?—The late Inspector McCarthy. I did not want to bring his name up. True, the Superintendent asked me and I told him.

51680. You told the Superintendent this morning?—Yes.

51681. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I am much obliged to you, Mr. Muir. It was very right and proper that you should have told us that the information had been given to the Inspector. You have not hesitated to come into the box and to perjure yourself until Mr. Muir gave us the information that was given to him by the Superintendent?—I did not wish to bring the man's name into it.

51682. If that is the case you do not hesitate to perjure yourself. Is that it?—(No answer.)

51683. I do not ask you anything more.

51684. (Mr. Dickinson.) Only one question I want to ask you. Did you ever arrange with Platt that he was to be taken up any time?—No, I did not.

51685. Did you ever know that Platt was going to be taken up at any time?—No.

51686. Did you ever have any communication before about an arrest of Platt?—No.

51687. You were working with Soer for the purpose of arresting them?—Yes, but various men used to go with me and not always the same man.

51688. You were working with Soer for the purpose of arresting bookmakers?—Yes.

51689. I want to know whether you arranged with them when the arrest should take place?—No.

51690. You simply took them when you could find them?—Yes, when we could find them; when we could see them taking bets.

51691. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) When did you see the late Inspector McCarthy last?—I have seen him once since then, that is all.

51692. Now we want the truth this time. Just listen to the question I am going to put to you. We know now that you have been misleading us intentionally before. Now, it will be a serious matter for you if you do that again. Just listen to the questions I am going to put, and answer them frankly and truthfully. When did you see him last?—I cannot tell you the exact time. I have seen him once since that time, and that is all.

51693. Did he ask you to go into the box and say this?—No, all he said was, "Do not bring my name into this."

51694. When did he say that?—The last time I saw him.

51695. When?—It must be over two years ago now.

51696. Just over two years?—Just after the bet was made—just after I got into trouble with the police.

51697. Was it after you had written this report of the 20th October?—That is right.

51698. Do you mean you have never seen him since?—I have seen him once since then, but not to speak to him. I have seen him passing when he was with two gentlemen in Holborn one day.

51699. Do you wish us to understand that in consequence of that statement made two years ago you have gone into the box and deliberately perjured yourself to us. Is that what you wish us to understand?—That is the real truth.

51700. Simply because you were told?—He said, "Do not bring my name in," and I promised him I would never bring his name into it. I told the Inspector this morning about it.

51701. You told the Inspector?—It is true I told the Inspector.

51702. You were not on your oath?—The Inspector asked me this morning, "Who was this bet for?"

51703. And you told him?—I told him. The Superintendent said, "I thought it was something of that."

51704. You were not bound to tell him, you know?—That is the truth.

51705. Why were you concerned in deceiving us on your oath, when you were not concerned in deceiving the Superintendent?—That is what I told him.

51706. (Mr. Dickinson.) What was your relationship to Inspector McCarthy?—I worked under him a good deal in different divisions—in the L Division and in the Paddington Division.

51707. At that time what were your relations with him?—I had no relations with him.

51708. I do not mean as regards relationship, but what was his position then?—Inspector.

G. Deed.
21 June 1907.

51709. In that Division?—No, in the Paddington Division.

51710. How did he come to give you this money?—The Inspector is not only in one place—he is all over the place.

51711. Had you taken bets for him before?—Yes, I had taken bets before for him.

51712. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Was he in the force at this time when you were taking the bet?—Yes.

51713. He was an Inspector then?—Yes.

51714. (Mr. Dickinson.) Did you receive anything for it?—No, I did not receive anything at all for it, the Inspector did not know what to do. I know I did wrong in doing it, but I did do it.

51715. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) See if I understand what happened. Is it right that Inspector McCarthy gave you this money to go and put on with a bookmaker. He was your Inspector, and you say you did not like to refuse, and that you then went and did it, and put the money on; and for that you were dismissed the force?—Yes.

51716. That is right?—That is right.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) You understand McCarthy was in the F Division. He was not this man's Inspector.

51717. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I quite understand that, the point I wanted to get was that he was an Inspector in the force at this time, and that that was the reason, apparently, that Deed went and did it. You were getting nothing for it, as I understand you?—That is right.

51718. Have you known him do that with others?—No, I have not.

51719. But you had done it for him several times?—Yes, I could not say whether it was bets before. I have taken envelopes to bookmakers. On one occasion I had to take an envelope back to McCarthy. When I was at work at Paddington I was still connected with the L Division. I was working at Paddington for three months.

51720. (Mr. Dickinson.) What time of the day did he give you the money?—The night previously he would give me the money, when I left him.

51721. With the name of the horse?—I could not tell you.

51722. But on this particular occasion when you went to Platt?—Yes, he gave me the money. He did not write the names down; I wrote the names down.

51723. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Mr. Dickinson is asking you when it was he gave it to you—on the night before or on the day of the race?—The night before he gave me the money.

51724. (Mr. Dickinson.) You were to get on any horse you liked?—No. He told me the name of the horse to bet on.

51725. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) He gave you the names of the horses, and whether you were to back them one, two, three?—Yes.

51726. Where did he give you the names of the horses on this occasion?—At Paddington.

51727. (Mr. Dickinson.) You were working in the Lambeth Division?—I was stationed there, but I was working in plain clothes in other divisions.

51728. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Do you mean you were sent to other divisions from the L Division?—Yes.

51729. When McCarthy gave you this were you working in his division?—No, I was not working in his division; I was in plain clothes.

51730. (Mr. Dickinson.) You were attached to the L Division?—Yes. I think for three months I was there at various times with other constables.

51731. What brought you down at Lambeth?—I was living at Lambeth. I lived there.

51732. And working at Paddington?—Yes, I have worked in several divisions.

(Mr. Platt.) The list of convictions of this officer in Lambeth will prove where he was on certain days.

(The Witness.) I cannot tell what days I was away. I have not said that.

51733. (Mr. Dickinson.) What work were you told off to do?—To keep observation on different public-houses and clubs for betting purposes—betting inside public-houses

51734. Why were you removed to Paddington for that?—I cannot say why it was done.

51735. You say as a fact you were removed to Paddington?—I was in plain clothes at Kennington Road on this occasion.

51736. You told me you got the money from Inspector McCarthy in Paddington, and you said you were working for McCarthy?—On this night that I got the money I was not working for him.

51737. Where was it that you got that money on that night?—He asked me to meet him on various occasions, and I met him.

51738. Where had you met him on this occasion?—At a public-house in Praed Street, Paddington.

51739. What were you doing at Praed Street on this night?—I was not on duty that night I went to meet him.

51740. How recently before that had you done the same thing?—I cannot say—some time before that. Then there is another thing. When we were working this place we always incurred monetary expense, and on one occasion when 79 L was over there I think he had to draw £4, and he only kept £2. That was one occasion when 79 L and I were together.

51741. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Who kept it?—Inspector McCarthy.

51742. (Mr. Dickinson.) That was before you made the bet?—Yes.

51743. Why did you make it?—I do not know why I made it.

51744. You said you got nothing for it. What inducement had you to do it for him?—Being an Inspector I did not like to go against him.

51745. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You were risking being dismissed the Force?—I did not see it at that time; I do now.

51746. (Mr. Dickinson.) You say you know of other policemen who have done the same thing for McCarthy?—No, I did not say that.

51747. I understood you to say he had done it by means of other policemen?—Not making bets.

51748. Then I misunderstood you.

51749. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I think what he said was that he had done it several times before for McCarthy, and not that other policemen had done it for McCarthy. That is right?—That is right.

51750. (Mr. Dickinson.) When did he first begin to employ you in this way?—I cannot say now.

51751. How long before you left the Force?—I cannot say. I was working in the L Division in plain clothes a good many months; I could not tell exactly how long it was.

51752. You say this happened several times; how long had it been going on?—Not very long—only time I was at Paddington. I could not say exactly how long I was at Paddington. The Inspector could tell you how long I was there.

51753. Was it a year?—No.

51754. What made you tell the Inspector that this morning?—I called in at the station to see three or four friends, and he said, "Now it is all over and done with tell me the truth. Who did you make the bet for?"

51755. What did you go to the Inspector for?—I happened to see the Inspector; I only casually saw the Inspector. I said "I have a letter to attend the Royal Commission, which I had sent me yesterday."

51756. You showed that letter to the Inspector?—Yes.

51757. Then what was said?—I showed the Inspector the letter, and that is all I said to him, I think; I do not think I said anything else to him.

51758. How did you come to tell the Inspector?—He asked me how I was getting on, and he said, "This is all over now; tell me who the bet was really for?" and I told him.

51759. You mean you did not go to the police station because you had received this notice?—No, I went to see three or four friends, and I saw Inspector Spencer. He said "How are you?" I said "All right." He said "What are you doing now?" Then I told him I had received a letter yesterday from the Royal Commission to give evidence, and I showed him the letter; that is all I said to him then.

51760. You went there entirely of your own accord?—Yes, entirely.

(Chairman.) George Deed, listen to me. I asked you the question whether you had made a full and true disclosure to this Commission of all that you knew about this matter. You answered me that you had done so. As a matter of fact it appears that you had not done so even according to your own admission, and but for the accidental fact that in the course of cross-examination by one of the Commissioners Mr. Muir interposed, and put some questions, we should have gone away utterly misled as to what the true position of the facts was. I have to tell you that you have placed yourself in a very serious position indeed, and that it will be the duty of this Commission to consider whether any action ought or ought not to be taken against you. You can go away now. G. Deed. 21 June 1907.

That finishes the evidence that we shall take with regard to Platt's case, and it in all probability closes our Inquiry, except, of course, that Sir Edward Henry will come in due course before us in order that he may resume his examination, and I think the Lord Advocate is also going to give some general evidence.

SIXTY-SECOND DAY.

Friday, 26th July 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir David Brynmor Jones, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).

Rufus Daniel Isaacs, Esq., K.C., M.P.

Willoughby Hyett Dickinson, Esq., M.P. (Barrister-at Law).

Charles Algernon Whitmore, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).

J. W. St. Lawrance Leslie, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Secretary).

J. F. Waley, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant Secretary).

The Right Hon. Thomas Shaw, K.C., M.P., sworn.

51967. (Chairman.) You are the Lord Advocate of Scotland?—Yes.

51968. You are a King's Counsel and a Member of Parliament, and you have had a long experience?—Yes.

51969. You have told us that you can give us some evidence which may assist us in making our Report?—Yes, I am very glad to comply with the request which you were good enough to convey to me, and with regard to my Department, I can only hope that I may be able to afford you testimony which may be helpful. You quite understand that the Lord Advocate's position is one which places him in rather a remote situation relative to those minor offences which I gather are the real subject of your Inquiry.

51970. You have, I think, seen the terms of reference of this Commission, and you will see that our Inquiry is limited to cases of drunkenness, disorder, and solicitation in the streets?—Yes. Your Secretary was good enough to send me a replica of the Remit.

51971. In the course of our inquiries it became evident to us that we might get some assistance from a comparison of the system existing in Scotland, in some great city there, with the system in force in the Metropolis, and we invited the Chief Constable of Glasgow to give evidence before us. I think you have received a copy of the transcript of his evidence?—I have, and, if I may say so, I have read it with great advantage. There are two things I desire to state to you with regard to it. In the first place, I think I may help you perhaps, relative to that evidence, by showing you that substantially the Glasgow powers are in line with or analagous to the general powers applicable to Burgh communities all over Scotland, and I hope to assist you by referring you to statutory provisions with regard to this. In the second place, if I may say so, there are one or two points with regard to Mr. Stevenson's evidence which I should like to have the advantage of your verdict upon in view of possible changes in Scotland, and I shall allude to those when I come to a later part of my evidence. As you know, I have to attend not only to the administration of criminal matters in Scotland, but I have to keep, to the best of my power, a look out so as to make a forecast with reference to the country's needs in future legislation; and I am going to show you, I think, by reference to those, that there are one or two points which you might usefully allude to, if I might suggest it, in any Report you put before the country. It might, in the first place, I think, be of help to you if I stated in a few sentences what I consider to be the broad distinction between the two systems of criminal jurisprudence in the two countries. That distinction arises in this way. In England there is not infrequently—in fact, I understand very frequently—the system of private prosecution. In Scotland that system, I may say, is substantially unknown. The general rule of the Scotch jurisprudence is that when an offence is committed it is committed against Society, and that Society protects itself through the public officers whom I shall mention; and in this way a system of public prosecution universally prevails. It may have certain disadvantages (I do not know them), but at all events you will agree that it has this advantage, that it eliminates from criminal prosecution all idea of the wreaking of private vengeance and all those suggestions of personal antagonisms or hostilities which may be mixed up with, and are always, at least conjecturally, mixed up with private prosecution. Now the head of all that system is the Lord Advocate for the time being, and the Lord Advocate in these matters of criminal jurisprudence represents His Majesty; and in the language of Hume, who is our great authority, in the second volume of the 1844 edition, at page 130, you will find the situation stated with accuracy thus: "Prosecution at the instance of the Lord Advocate": (then he defines it) "the public accuser who insists in the name of the King, and for His Majesty's interest, in the execution of his laws, and in the tranquillity and welfare of his people." That is the situation of the Lord Advocate. That being the authority with which the Lord Advocate is vested, you can see for yourselves that to carry it out executively demands a staff. In my own case, being engaged largely in Parliamentary duties and administrative work, I do not attend in court except in cases of extreme gravity, such as serious murders, poisoning, and the like of that; those cases fortunately in our country are very rare, but I have, with regard to cases even of gravity, the great advantage of the assistance of the Solicitor-General for Scotland, who acts in criminal matters as my Advocate Depute, and who has to pass as Advocate Depute his commission before the court, and in that capacity, being named the Solicitor-General for Scotland, he is at the head of my Advocates Depute. Then there are, in addition, four salaried gentlemen who act as Advocates Depute for Scotland; they receive a salary from the Crown of £700 a year; they are appointed by me; and they have certain travelling allowances when they go upon circuit. But the development in recent years in Glasgow has been so great that it has for many years Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P. 26 July 1907.

Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P.

been the habit to appoint what is called an extra Advocate Depute for the Western Circuit. He has a salary amounting to so much per Circuit, but in all it reaches about £300 a year, and, as he is a rising man, I make it a point in Crown consultations to bring the Advocate Depute for the West, as he is called, into consultation, along with the Solicitor-General, the four Advocates Depute, and myself. Now these four Advocates Depute have Scotland partitioned out amongst them. There is the Western Circuit, the Northern Circuit, and so on; there is a rota of Advocates Depute, and they take, we will say, three months apiece on the particular circuit. The reason of rotation is that upon the West there always is more business, and sometimes on the North there is more business than on the South, and by taking three months they average up their official time in that way. That brings us, you see, to myself as the centre of the various districts of Scotland through the Advocates Depute. The next point upon which I know this Commission is anxious to have information is what is the position of Scotland in its minor units. Now, that position is covered by each county having a Procurator Fiscal. The Procurator Fiscal, be it observed, is also my Depute. He, too, in a minor and local sense, represents the King's interest and the preservation of peace in the locality. The situation with regard to the counties is this: In former days the Sheriff of the county (I suppose you would call him a County Court Judge) held a high administrative position, traces of which to a considerable extent still remain. One of the traces of that position was that he was the person who appointed the Procurator Fiscal. Now that has been seen to be incorrect in point of principle for this simple reason—that once the Procurator Fiscal in the county is appointed, the person to whom he is responsible for the discharge of his duty, and the person from whom he takes his instructions with regard to prosecutions, is the Lord Advocate. Accordingly, with the consent of all parties, if I may bring you up to date, I obtained the other evening in the House of Commons the assent of the House to a Sheriffs' Courts Bill, and in Sections 22. 23, and 24 of that Bill, which I hope within a fortnight or three weeks' time will become part of the law, I have transferred the appointment of the Procurator Fiscal to myself. That is done with the entire consent of all concerned, because the principle is (I have put in the words "From and after the passing of this Act," and so I propose to legislate, if Parliament gives assent to the proposal) that the right of appointing to the office of Procurator Fiscal should be vested in the Lord Advocate. He being thus appointed by me, the position will be the same, his duties being, as I have already explained, duties flowing from the King's Advocate—namely, the person holding my office. I think I have now explained that position with regard to the general situation in Scotland. Now I come nearer, if I may, to the situation of Municipalities and Burgh communities throughout Scotland. It is quite clear that as these rose in importance the number of what I might call Burghal offences (offences against petty police regulations) was so great, and yet the quality of offence was so small, that to take the great national engine of the Lord Advocate, with his Deputes, and to apply it to these things, was found by experience to be, necessarily, cumbrous, and accordingly the Burghs from early days were vested with a certain power of suppressing crime. It is very interesting to notice how that has developed. It is a mistake to think (and please understand Mr. Stevenson's evidence in that view) that Burghal jurisdiction with regard to crime merely arose from private Acts of Parliaments like the Edinburgh and Glasgow Municipal Acts. You will find in the same edition of Hume to which I have referred, upon page 70, a very interesting statement putting it in this way:—"The Magistrates of every Royal Burgh have the care of the King's peace within their bounds, and repress, by suitable punishments, the inferior transgressors against the quiet, police, or good order of the town." So, you will observe, there were two operations going on in the past history of Scotland—the general national operation for the protection of society, proceeding from the Lord Advocate as the head, and then the municipal or urban regulation which has gradually been growing in importance through the development of municipalities. I hope I have made the point clear to you that with regard to minor municipalities called Royal Burghs, they have had historically always a share in the duty of protecting what is called the King's peace; again, be it observed, giving force to what I think is a very valuable principle, which is that, even with regard to minor offences, it is society which is protecting itself, and not the person injured, who has to bring a suit for marking his aggressor as a criminal.

Now as these municipalities developed, it, of course, became necessary, particularly in the cases of Glasgow and Edinburgh, that they should have special statutory sanction for a vast variety of things which might not fall under the category of offences at Common Law, but which would be offences in the purely burghal sense of being offences against bye-laws and the laws enacted for the preservation of good order in the streets, and so on. Accordingly there arose quite a category of Municipal Statutes in Scotland. I do not go into these in detail, but the Glasgow case is a very marked case in point. Glasgow is a municipality, as you know, of the very highest standing; and when I show to you a book written by my friend Mr. Lindsay, the Deputy Town Clerk of Glasgow, published in 1896 (I think there is a more recent edition)—this very large volume is a volume containing the Acts of Parliament relating to the Glasgow police alone—you will see how the applications to Parliament by that municipality have been from year to year of the most elaborate kind. Now practically the leading Statute with regard to the Glasgow Police is the Statute of 1866, followed by the Statute of 1892. Those are the two leading Statutes. I regret that at this moment I have not a reference to the Edinburgh Municipal Act, but, if you will allow me, what I propose to do in order to assist you is to direct my secretary to communicate with the Town Clerk of Edinburgh and with the Town Clerk of Glasgow, and give my personal request that you shall be furnished with a volume of the Statutes applicable to each of those burghs.

51972. That, I think, will be of great assistance to us?—You may find it, with reference to the Police powers, of some help in that way. Both volumes are indexed, and they may be of assistance to you. This volume for Glasgow and the lesser one for Edinburgh show the rise of the municipalities and their powers. On the other hand, it is right to say that I think most of those powers have had to run the gauntlet of investigation by the Chairmen of Committees, and some of those powers they may have supplemented here and there, but they are substantially in accord with the general law. I thought it right, in order to supplement Mr. Stevenson's evidence, to show the Commission what the general law with regard to municipalities in Scotland, apart from these private Acts of Parliament, is. You will find that contained in the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, and perhaps I might give you useful reference to the 1893 edition of Mr. Muirhead's book on "The Law and Practice of Police Government." The first point that I think caused, not unnaturally, a little difficulty in Mr. Stevenson's evidence which I thought I might help you about is this—as to the position of Magistrates in Scotland. Will you now please disabuse your minds of any English ideas on this subject, because one is very often apt to confuse the category of Magistrates. In Scotland a Magistrate of a burgh is what is in familiar language called either the Provost of the burgh (that is the Mayor), or the Bailie. Whether the analogy to a Bailie is an Alderman or not I am sure I do not know; but at all events the Provost or the Lord Provost in the case of a city, and the Bailies are for the purposes of your Inquiry all the Magistrates you have to deal with. They are limited in number. In the larger burghs there is a larger number, but sometimes in the smaller burghs they have a Provost and a couple of Bailies. These are the three Magistrates in the ordinary course, and in a decent sized burgh there is a Provost and four Bailies; that is the team of Magistrates. But it was found as time went on that there was a considerable encroachment upon the time of these men, and therefore it was necessary to have some people to assist them on the Bench, and accordingly the assistance on the Bench was found by a later Statute of the year 1900. I do not think Mr. Stevenson explained this, and I think it is necessary you should know how it stands. You will find under the Town Councils (Scotland) Act of 1900, Section 62, how the matter stands. The shortest way will be for me to read the section; it is not long: "The Town Council may at any time appoint any of their number who have held the office of Provost, Bailie, or Magistrate to sit as Magistrates in the police courts of the burgh for such time as they continue to be members of the Town Council without re-election"

(observe there is a new denomination now; they have to sit as magistrates, and so on), "and during such time any person so appointed and sitting may lawfully exercise all jurisdictions, powers, and authorities competent to or exercisable by any other Magistrate of the Burgh" (observe) "sitting in such court." The reason I make that distinction is this: These men are called judges of police, and they are to sit as Magistrates because they are in the Town Council; they have already held the office of bailie, and have probably resigned to make room for younger men, but still they remain, and therefore the community obtains the advantage of their services sitting on the Bench. They are not Magistrates in any other sense. The importance of that in administration is that with regard to all questions as to licensing, the appointment of the Chief Constable, and so on, they of course have no jurisdiction; they are merely men who help when the time of the Magistrates as judges is fully occupied; but with regard to the matter of your Inquiry—as to the appointment of the police, they are not named. The Magistrates are those, and those alone, whom I have named. I hope I have made myself clear.

51973. (Mr. Dickinson.) Are they all properly elected?—You see, it is in this way. They must be all properly elected to get into the Town Council, then the Town Council elect them as magistrates, then they have experience on the Bench, and then they retire as Magistrates, but remain in the Town Council, and so they are fit to sit as supplementary Magistrates. They must pass a proper election to get into the Town Council before they are Magistrates, and then later on they are the supplementary men.

51974. They must be always elected members of the Town Council?—Yes, always; I am obliged to you. I might add that even with regard to the period when they are judges of police they can only be judges of police so long as they remain in the Town Council. You will be no doubt anxious for me to come now to the question of the jurisdiction of these Magistrates. The jurisdiction of these Magistrates is governed by Section 454 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act of 1892, 55 and 56 Victoria, chapter 55. I give you a reference to the statute for the reason that it would be a waste of time to go into it in detail, but Section 454 gives the Magistrates, whose positions I have endeavoured to explain, jurisdiction to try within burghs minor offences, that is to say, crimes, offences, and breaches of the police regulations or of any other Act in force within the burgh. So standing, it of course might leave them with very undefined, and, it might be, overlapping jurisdiction, and, accordingly, in order to avoid that, if you will be so kind as to refer to Sections 380 and 381 of that Act you will find there a very long category of the kind of offences that are cognisable within burghs by the Burgh Magistrates. (The graver offences and crimes even within Burghs are, I should explain, tried before the Sheriff at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal, or if still graver before the High Court of Justiciary at my instance.) Section 380 is "Offences." Just let me note as I pass along the points where I think it comes nearer the matter of your Inquiry. Sub-section 2 covers the case of the sale or consumption of refreshments of any kind under certain conditions. Sub-section 10 covers committing a nuisance or using any obscene, abusive, or indecent language, to the annoyance of any person. I think it right to give you a reference to that, because it may have some bearing upon the point. Then we come to Section 381. Now Section 381 applies to street offences, and it has a category, I think, of 40 different things. The ones, I think, that come nearest the subject of your Inquiry are Sub-sections 22 and 24. Sub-section 22 says:—"Being a common prostitute or street-walker loiters about or importunes passengers for the purpose of prostitution." I think that is one of the points you are inquiring into. Sub-section 24 says:—"Drunk and incapable, and not under the care or protection of some suitable person." With regard to the subject of prostitution, I should wish to say that the Glasgow Act, to which Mr. Stevenson in his evidence referred, was an Act substantially in the same terms as the General Burgh Police Act; but, as usual, Glasgow was watching carefully the development of decisions of the judge made law on the subject. Accordingly, it may be interesting to you to know that there is a difference of language in Section 18 of the Glasgow Private Act of 1892. That section says:—"Every prostitute or street-walker who at or near any street loiters about or importunes passengers for the purposes of prostitution shall be liable to a penalty," and so on. The difference of language is this—"at or near any street." It so happened that there had been a case in which the purpose of prostitution was secured by importuning from a window, and the Judges, those matters being matters stricti juris, as you know, held that that could not be construed as loitering about under the general section of an Act which referred to street offences. Accordingly, the words "in or near" very properly appear in the Glasgow Statute.

Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P.

26 July 1907.

51975. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Do you know of any case in which a distinction has been drawn between a prostitute and a street-walker?—Yes. I hope I may be able to help you, because I am rather anxious about that subject on general grounds—I mean for the peace of cities.

51976. Take it in your own time, but I am very anxious to get it if you can give it to me?—Yes. I think that was very properly the subject of questions to Mr. Stevenson. I am not quite sure whether Mr. Stevenson was the Chief Constable of Glasgow at the time, but I have the honour of holding a general retainer for the Corporation of Glasgow, and a few years ago there were two of their policemen against whom an action was launched, the issue for trial being the ordinary one applicable to such cases, that the apprehension was wrongful, was malicious, and was without probable cause. That is the issue that goes to the jury, as you know. I was very anxious about the development of that case on other elements than the case itself, because it was represented to me that unless a decision were obtained on behalf of the police there might be great difficulties in the way of administering the statute and preserving order in certain of those low localities. I speak from recollection, because, on account of a circumstance that I am going to allude to, the case did not, as far as I know, enter the Law Reports. In the course of my duty as counsel for the police, on the instructions of the Corporation, I had to present to the Judge certain rulings, which I respectfully demanded from him. Of course, if he had not accepted those, and had not directed the jury in the way I wished, I could have had a Bill of Exceptions, and then it would have entered the Law Reports. However, the Judge did what I wished in the matter, and it was what we all agreed was proper in the end. Therefore I must trust to my recollection. The circumstances were these: These two policemen were what we call defenders in the action. The pursuer, whom you would call the plaintiff, was a woman who was notorious; she had, I was given to understand, been carrying on the business of keeping a very questionable house, to say the least, and she not only did that, but she accompanied the women who lived in her house on to the streets. She took them to the localities where she thought this infamous trade would be best carried on; she herself walked with them on the streets, you observe, and she assisted them in importuning passengers. But the point that was taken against the police, most astutely, was this—that she was not a prostitute; and I may say to some extent, from the Bench to begin with, there was considerable, shall I say, impatience, or at least there was considerable hesitation as to whether I could ever distinguish a prostitute from a street-walker. However, I was determined to do it, because the justice of the thing is, I think, exactly seen in the narrative that I have given to you. You have the offence in its grossest form. I mean you have the offence of importuning in its grossest form; you have the offence actually committed in its steadiest and most continuous form by this woman who was year after year pursuing this infamous trade, and yet she was not personally a prostitute, and it was said therefore that the police had no right to apprehend her. But the police did apprehend her and the prostitute with whom she was accompanied—or two prostitutes, I forget which—and they had them all up at the police court. With regard to this woman, who was a householder, she I think was sent home, but with regard to the other two, they were kept in the lock-up for the night. On the following day this woman was put upon trial (she had been served with a summons and brought to the police court), alongside of the two undoubted prostitutes. The three were thus together in the dock charged with this offence against that statute which I have cited. Then came what in the result proved an embarrassing situation. The Magistrate was not satisfied with the evidence, and he dismissed the lot. The prostitutes of course had no case at all, because they were prostitutes, to begin with, and no jury would have listened to the view that there was an improper apprehension of them. But, very astutely, this woman, who was cleverly advised by lawyers, took this point: "You had no right to apprehend me, but you, the police, had umbrage against me," and then that let in all the elements which, as Mr. Rufus Isaacs and others on the Bench know, go to make up malice and want of probable cause. Therefore, you see, it was crucial to see whether this mistake was made. If the police apprehended without any right a street-walker who was not a prostitute, then of course the jury had a good opening for letting in all the evidence about malice. Therefore, having considered the matter very carefully, I respectfully demanded a ruling from the Bench, and I put it in writing on the spot. It was something to this effect—that if the jury think that the pursuer is not a prostitute, but if they are also satisfied that, on the occasion in question, she was walking the streets and assisting prostitutes in the act of importuning passengers for the purposes of prostitution, although not for herself—the prostitution of her own person—then the jury are bound to find that such a person is a street-walker in the sense of the statute. I need not point out to you, gentlemen on the Bench, that that was a matter of very close argument for some time, but I am very glad, in the interest of public policy, to say that the Judge concluded that that was a sound view of the statute. My argument from a public point of view was perfectly plain. Parliament would have remedied it, I know. Parliament would not have stood a decision in the other sense; but it was important, as Parliament had drawn the clause, that we should have it affirmed in the sense I meant—that that person, although not personally a prostitute, was engaged in these nefarious acts of walking the streets and importuning, for the purpose of prostitution, other people. I should have asked for a ruling probably in more absolute terms than "habitually," because if you do de facto walk the streets for that purpose on a particular occasion, quoad hoc you are a street-walker in that sense on this occasion.

Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P.

26 July 1907.

51977. (Chairman.) I think you read to us the words in the Scotch Act. What are the words in the Scotch Act?—"Being a common prostitute or street-walker."

51978. The word "common" would apply to that?—I am glad to say that did not arise. You are not to hold me, please, as accepting that. For instance, to take an individual case which one might easily figure where people are perfectly conscious that the manager of this infamous traffic has been at it all the time directing operations from her house, and so on, if they found her on the streets on one occasion I should be quite prepared to contend in a court of law that she was within the statute. However, in the case I have mentioned, she was known to be going about pretty often. Perhaps I could not add anything to that matter on Mr. Stevenson's evidence. That was how the law of the case stood, and that is how it was interpreted. Had there been a Bill of Exceptions from the other side, the case would have been in the Law Reports, but as it was they accepted it as I laid it down, and so the law stands.

51979. What was the verdict?—They were acquitted.

51980. That is to say, judgment was for the defenders?—Judgment was for the defenders. One never knows, but my impression is very strongly that, supposing that ruling in law had been different, there would have been a different verdict. I am not sure, but I think it likely.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Apart from that decision to which you have referred us, which is not a reported case, I was anxious to see if we could get a reported case.

51981. (Chairman.) I have not been able to find the words "common prostitute or night-walker" in this Act?—Our word in Scotland is "street-walker."

51982. In many summonses the two words are given in common, she being described as a common prostitute or night-walker?—Yes.

51983. (Mr. Dickinson.) Your word is "street-walker"?—Yes.

51984. Does the word "street-walker" in Scotland import any peculiar meaning other than a person who walks in a street?—I know of none. It has no doubt, probably by association with such clauses, become a term with an immoral reflection attached to it. If a person is called a "street-walker," it imports an accusation.

51985. (Chairman.) Is there anything in Scotland corresponding to the words "Common prostitute or night walker"?—Yes. In the case I have alluded to the whole point of law was identical; it was walking at night.

51986. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Aiding and abetting to commit an offence?—Yes. The difficulty with reference to aiding and abetting comes in in this way. All those sub-sections are drawn with the substantive first: You must be a prostitute or night walker to begin with. Aiding and abetting would come in when the Act commenced, but if you have to be a defined person, to start with, that is where the difficulty comes in. My argument, of course, was that Parliament meant something when they began to distinguish the two.

51987. (Chairman.) You say the sub-section clearly does apply to any common prostitute or night walker who aids or abets another common prostitute or night walker to commit an offence?—Yes. But the difficulty was a different one. The difficulty was, we were dealing with a case (it is very interesting) in which nobody was able to establish that the person who had been apprehended was herself a prostitute. We were dealing with a case of somebody else than a prostitute who was doing everything that the Statute condemned, and then I said that somebody else is a person who walks the streets, as a matter of fact, and she is just the street walker that Parliament meant to distinguish.

51988. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Walking the streets, assisting a prostitute, and importuning passengers?—Yes.

51989. (Chairman.) And accosting passengers for the purpose of prostitution?—Yes. She had done all that.

51990. It is immaterial whether it is the person who is loitering who ought to be prosecuted or somebody else?—That was my answer. If you happen to be writing upon it in your Report, might I ask you if you could fortify that view? I am not pressing it, because it is my view, but I think public order would be assisted if you could put a sentence in your Report to that effect.

51991. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Prima facie, the effect of the two words there would show that they were interchangeable?—Yes, prima facie, but not more.

51992. (Mr. Dickinson.) I understood from the two sections you read that one of them did not mention "to the annoyance of passengers"?—No.

51993. (Chairman.) There is not a word in the Edinburgh Statute about "to the annoyance of passengers or householders"?—That is quite true, and in the Glasgow Act it does not mention "to the annoyance of passengers." In neither case, as far as I know, are the words, "To the annoyance of passengers" used. I mean in the Private Act or in the Burgh Police Act generally.

51994. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) They use the word "Importuning"?—Yes. I think I have now told you all that I have to say about the enumeration of the offences with reference to indecency, and I have now referred to all the cases of prostitution.

51995. (Chairman.) Now as to drunkenness?—Yes; but before I pass on to that your Secretary was so good as to mention also that you wanted me to deal with the word "disorder."

51996. Yes?—We have no such word in Scotland. We deal with it as what we call a breach of the peace. A petty breach of the peace is dealt with in the Burgh Courts.

51997. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Suppose people are shouting, would that be a breach of the peace?—Yes, if they really disturbed the peace.

51998. (Chairman.) Is there power of summary arrest for that?—Yes.

51999. Under what statutory section is there power of arrest in Scotland for disorder or breach of the peace, not accompanied by any drunkenness?—I am coming to that at the end of my evidence.

52000. Please take it in your own order. Give your evidence in your own way?—I think the references which I shall give you with regard to "disorder" may take up a breach of the peace, and it may be rendered clear by some of those specifications in the sub-sections of the individual Acts; but, upon the whole, it always comes to this, that the peace must be disturbed in the sense that you might have a great deal of shouting, riot, and fun of that kind on a lonely moor, whereas if you transfer that to a street the situation is different; it breaks the peace of somebody. The next point is as to drunkenness. Now the Burgh Police Act deals with that by Sub-section 24, which I have referred to of Section 381, and the words are, "Drunk and incapable, and not under the care or protection of some suitable person." Now I had a good deal to do with that question, because of two things. I have been a Member of Parliament, as you know, for seventeen or eighteen years, and one has to view the development of the law. We found, first, in matters of administration, that it was very expedient to have drunkenness, if of a gross kind, per se an offence; and, secondly, we found it expedient, and I have always thought it was expedient, to have some catalogue with regard to the occasion upon which such drunkenness was found. That is expedient from two points of view. In the first place, it ought to affect the quantum of the penalty; and, secondly, it ought to be a recorded fact, not only against the prisoner, but with reference to a matter that I took a great interest in, and proposed a clause with regard to, which I shall refer to with regard to a consistorial action between husband and wife in which habitual drunkenness comes to be an element for granting a separation. I think it was Mr. Rufus Isaacs or one of your number who brought out from the Chief Constable of Glasgow a curious thing which I confess was new to me, namely, that these drunks were had up and then went bail, we will say, for three half-crowns, and nothing more was ever heard of them. The result is that the very thing which I and others have been driving at in Parliament is to get some record of the history if a man is on the down grade in order to know whether it is possible to rescue him, and to prevent that record from being lost by the slap-dash way in dealing with criminals. I am not blaming the authorities, because I know very well indeed the enormous aggregate of work which has to be disposed of, but I will submit a certain view in a few moments on that subject. The Burgh Police Act that I have referred to is amended by the Licensing (Scotland) Act, of 1903, and you will find under Section 70 of that Act this provision with regard to drunkenness: "Every person found in a state of intoxication, and incapable of taking care of himself, and not under the care or protection of some suitable person," or anybody drunk who has a horse under his charge, or has a weapon in his possession, and so on, shall be brought before the Magistrate and tried. Now in burghs that kind of thing is tried by the Magistrates; it does not apply to Glasgow merely, but it applies to the whole country. Now I mention to you a thing as to which I must ask your assistance. If you will be good enough to refer to Section 73 you will find a clause of which I was the author: "Where a husband or wife is a habitual drunkard, as defined by Section 3 of the Habitual Drunkards Act, 1879, and this fact is established in a consistorial action," and so on, "it is to be equivalent to cruelty." Section 71, for instance, says: "Where a person is convicted of any offence mentioned in the First Schedule to the Inebriates Act, 1898, the court may in addition" do so-and-so. What I want to point out to you is this. So far as I can see, a great deal of this which, if recorded, would work up to the definition of habitual drunkenness, is done without any record at all. You may find yourselves, I daresay, constrained to say that this is perfectly explainable on account of the mass of work; but, from the mere judicial point of view, I think you might, if you saw your way to do so, give some expression of opinion with regard to this matter. All I want is this, that, even although it is a 7s. 6d. case, where the man never comes back, there ought to be a formal summons or a proceeding next day, and a record of that, with the name of the person taken down, so that he stands quoad each offence convicted.

52001. Before the three half-crowns are taken the charge is taken in Glasgow by the Lieutenant to the Procurator Fiscal?—I am obliged to you for mentioning that because that shows that the little criminal libel or complaint is a complaint for which the materials, as you point out, are put in the charge.

52002. As I understand Mr. Stevenson's evidence, what takes place is this. If a man is brought in for being drunk, he is brought into the charge room in custody, he comes before the Lieutenant of the Procurator Fiscal, who is an officer equivalent to our inspector of police, and then the constable makes the charge, saying: "I arrested this man in (————) Street for being drunk and disorderly." The Lieutenant of the Procurator Fiscal then makes some enquiry, and, if satisfied that there is a prima facie case against the prisoner of being drunk and disorderly, he asks the prisoner his name and address, the prisoner gives it, and then he may be let out on bail or not. If he is let out on bail the Lieutenant in charge says: "7s. 6d." or "10s." The prisoner puts down 10s., or, if he has not got 10s., he puts down his watch. Then he is told to go away and attend at the court at 10 o'clock the next morning. There is a record, so far as the charge-sheet is a record?—My difficulty arises at a later stage. While all that may be quite right and proper, it at all events does not furnish the crucial element for statutory purposes, namely, it is not a conviction.

52003. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Let me call your attention to what Mr. Stevenson said in answer to me. I think it bears that out. It is a point that struck me very forcibly about it. It is at page 913, Question 40093: "When a man is charged under those circumstances and has deposited his 7s. 6d., and does not appear the next day, and then it is marked 'Pledge forfeited,' does that count as a previous conviction?—(A.) No. (Q.) Then he may go any number of times?—(A.) Yes, that is not a conviction." Then the chairman said: "And the name may be a false one?—(A.) The name may be a false one." Then I asked him: "According to that a man might be charged with being drunk and disorderly twenty times, and it would not make any difference. He would simply deposit the money; it would cost him so much a time, and there is an end of it?—(A.) Every time is a first time according to the Act. (Q.) Previous convictions are not taken into account?—(A.) No, there is no provision for that." The effect of the evidence seems to be that when a man was charged for being drunk, what he did was to deposit 7s. 6d., then he went away, there was no further record, and if he never came back again then every time would be the first time?—That makes it very clear. Mr. Stevenson, in answer to you, said: "Every time is the first time." That is the difficulty that those in Parliament have tried to get the better of. We want a record.

52004. There are two questions I put to him later. Question 40099: "Then the deposit of the money always seems to have the effect, so far as the defendant is concerned, of ridding him of a conviction"?—I hope the Commissioners will not misunderstand the view from which I am presenting the evidence. I am by no means commenting adversely upon Mr. Stevenson. A finer officer in the three kingdoms I do not believe exists. I have no doubt he is carrying out the practice, and there is a great deal, from the business point of view, to be said for it, but from the point of view of achieving that which the Legislature wanted to get at, namely, a record of drunkenness, you will see it in practice fails.

52005. (Chairman.) Let me follow this for a moment. When the case is called on in court, and the person named in the charge-sheet does not answer, and the constable is ex hypothesi in the box, and proceedings have been started under the writing of the Procurator Fiscal, there is nothing to prevent the constable from asking the Magistrate to issue a warrant for the arrest of the person named in the charge-sheet?—That is quite true. There is nothing at all to prevent a warrant being issued; but, so far as I am concerned, it would be sufficient for my purpose if a man were convicted in absentia.

52006. But not if he were convicted in a false name, would it?—I suppose not. You see a false name case is not really the kind of case that we want to get at. We want to get at the chronic cases; we want to get at the man who is a pest to the district, and who is known to everybody.

52007. The constable would know him quite well, and would know where he lived?—If he attempted to play a false name on them, they would know at once.

52008. (Mr. Dickinson.) That does not quite complete the case to my mind. I should like to read to you two questions which Mr. Rufus Isaacs and the Chairman asked. It is at Question 39918: "It is payment in anticipation." The answer is: "If he does not appear he is satisfied to let the bail money go, and the bail is forfeited. That is the rule." The Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P.

26 July 1907.

Chairman then said: "In an ordinary case no further proceedings are taken against the prisoner?—(A.) In an ordinary case of drunkenness no further proceedings are taken. The bail is forfeited." What I want to get at is this. Who is responsible for the fact that no further proceedings are taken, because, in the ordinary course, whether he turns up or whether he does not, somebody is responsible for stopping proceedings being taken. That I presume is your officer?—Yes, in a sense. He is the burgh officer as it happens in this case.

52009. As I understand it, there is a certain chain of responsibilities for prosecutions. The fountain head of it is yourself?—Except in burghs.

52010. But even in burghs I understood that the police inspector was for the purpose of prosecutions the Lieutenant of the Procurator Fiscal, who in his turn acts under jurisriction from you?—Not quite. In the burghs the fountain head is not the Procurator Fiscal. He may be called in large burghs the Procurator Fiscal, but in a general way he is called the burgh prosecutor, and he has the initiative; in fact he is what you might call the municipal prosecutor. He starts it in fact. You are quite right to say that you lead up to the fountain head, but that is the fountain head.

52011. That is the fountain head. Then acting, I suppose, under some discretion which he has, he authorises the non-prosecution of a drunken man?—Yes.

52012. How can he do that?—For my own part I can hardly doubt that this practice is well-known in Glasgow, and has been sanctioned by everybody. I do not think anybody has exceeded his duty in the sense of doing something unknown to anybody else. It is just a familiar practice.

52013. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Apparently the same practice applies to a woman charged with being a prostitute. The money is paid for bail. If the constable thinks it is a proper case in which to admit the woman to bail he admits her out on bail, and nothing more may be heard of it?—I do not wish to speak in any sense dictatorially about this, far from it, but I am bound to put to you that I view with some disrelish any kind of proceeding which starts on criminal lines, and which winds up on what I might call compounding lines.

52014. (Chairman.) It may be pointed out, may it not, that, seeing that the person charged with drunkenness and disorder has paid the 7s. 6d., the net result to him is very much the same as if he appeared before the magistrate the next morning, having given recognisances to appear in some unnamed sum, and were fined 7s. 6d. or seven days?—I have no doubt that that is the rough common sense way in which it is viewed—that the man substantially, by a shorthand process, is fined 10s., or whatever the sum may be. My point is that it is unjudicial, to say the least of it, and it prevents Parliament and those in authority having that record which in these cases I very much desire.

52015. (Mr. Dickinson.) Does it not go further than that? The law says that if a man is found drunk in the burgh he is to be convicted; but in this case somebody else steps in, and prevents the law taking its course. That person, I understand, is the officer. Is it really complying with the law to allow an official to withdraw prosecutions to such a large extent as that?—I would not like to make any definite pronouncement about that. You can see for yourself that I have the gravest doubt as to whether it is. But I would put it in this way: That that is a way which has been adopted (and I believe it is a long-standing practice) of accomplishing a result which everybody knows to be accomplished the next morning—namely, that they would be fined in the identical sum, or, if not there, the bail that they had given would be forfeited.

52016. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) There is all the difference betwen being fined the identical sum in court and the publicity of the court?—I quite agree. That is the difference I found it upon.

52017. It is an enormous advantage to a wealthy person, to whom 7s. 6d. is of no consequence, and to whom the chief deterrent would be the publicity of the proceedings?—Yes. As I have said (and I think perhaps you would not ask me to go further), I view with considerable disrelish all kinds of proceedings which start criminally and end by compounding. I do not like it at all.

52018. (Mr. Dickinson.) In relation to your own duties—that is to say, to duties which are of a far more serious character—are you able to prosecute or not to prosecute entirely at your own discretion?—Yes, absolutely.

52019. Therefore, even if a man had committed murder, you could refuse to prosecute, and nobody could take any action?—It would be a case for impeachment. As I say, that may be to some extent the line which is taken with regard to burgh prosecutors. I do not for one moment, in any evidence I have given, question their discretion not to prosecute. The prosecution is always a matter of discretion. They may think the evidence insufficient or flimsy, and they may discharge a man on the spot. That is quite a different thing from what the Chairman and the rest of you have been discussing with me. The case that we have been discussing is a case in which it is thought that there is a case, in which a charge is preferred, and in which, as a preliminary to being tried, he makes a deposit.

52020. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) And the charge has been accepted, or the basis of it has been accepted?—Yes.

52021. (Chairman.) Not only has the charge been accepted, but the process follows upon its acceptance of the charge, and that is unlike what is the case in the Metropolis. In Glasgow the Procurator Fiscal or his lieutenant signs a formal document which is the basis of the jurisdiction of the court according to the evidence given?—I think I have already said that I have that formally in the charge made. The material is there: litera scripta manet: the material is there for the charge next day. But, with regard to what Mr. Dickinson has said, I wish to say emphatically that nothing I have said must be taken from me as questioning the complete discretion of these burgh prosecutors, who are men of high character and experience, and who are at this work every day, and have a most wonderful skill in exercising, as they do most judiciously, a discretion in liberation—that is to say, they decline to accept from the police a charge if they think it is too trumpery, or if they think the evidence is not sufficient to substantiate it.

52022. Who appoints the Procurator Fiscal in Glasgow?—I will come to that. I think I have now told you about the Procurator Fiscal under myself.

52023. Yes?—Now as to the Procurators Fiscal in burghs. He is called a Burgh Prosecutor, and he is appointed by the Burgh Police Act 1892, under the provisions of Sections 461 and 462. Section 461 says:—"The Commissioners under this Act shall appoint from time to time, by writing and during pleasure, a fit person to be Burgh Prosecutor of the Burgh." That is what I meant. They generally call themselves Procurators Fiscal because the analogy is that the other Procurators Fiscal throughout the country are appointed by the Commissioners. May I disabuse your mind as to the different Commissioners? They were called Commissioners of Police; but all this burghal law in Scotland is helped and consolidated to some extent by their being under the category of the Town Council under the Act of 1900. The Commissioners are really the Town Council, and nobody else. These are the persons who appoint. May I say that these fit persons are usually men with a legal training—law agents, and in certain burghs in Scotland they appoint men of very high standing. In Edinburgh, for instance, a very respected colleague of mine at the Bar, Mr. Macaulay Smith, is the Prosecutor for Edinburgh. It is not confined merely to lawyers; it depends on the scope of the duties, and to the salary attached to the office, of course. The law as to the Chief Constable you will find in Section 78 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892. In Glasgow the law as to the Chief Constable is in Section 71 of the Act of 1866. Now, with regard to counties (that is not burghs), you will find Section 81 of the Burgh Police (Scotland) Act, 1892, deals with the question of counties. I think these three things that I have given you practically cover the ground. You have burghs, not large burghs; then you have a large burgh like Glasgow; and then you have the counties. Now, the Chief Constable is appointed by the officials of the city, or of the other burghs, or of the Council, and holds office subject to them. I think practically the office is ad vitam in this sense, that he could not be dismissed except with the consent of the Lord Provost of the burgh for the time being and the Sheriff. In fact, it would be a somewhat strict judicial process to attempt to dismiss him, and I do not think any cases of that kind have arisen. He holds a position of very considerable authority. That goes beyond the ambit of my knowledge; he has his staff under him, and I do not attempt to give you any evidence upon that question. Now as to the powers of the police.

52024. (Mr. Dickinson.) Are you leaving the question of the Burgh Prosecutor?—Unless there is anything else you wish me to deal with.

52025. (Chairman.) I have something to suggest to you. The evidence before us is that the Procurator Fiscal or Burgh Prosecutor in Glasgow delegates his duties with regard to minor and non-indictable offences to the lieutenants of police. Is that warranted under any special Act of Parliament?—Yes; I think that is quite right. Then, with regard to ordinary Procurators Fiscal, they have power to appoint a depute if that is ratified by superior authority.

52026. Let me put a case to you, so that we may see how the system works. Suppose I am robbed in a Glasgow street, and I think I can recognise the man if I can find him; and suppose I call out to a constable "Stop thief!" and the man is caught by the constable, and I accompany the constable to see that justice is done. What, in fact, takes place, in a case of larceny, at the police-station?—What takes place is this. You would appear, and you would be confronted with the charge officer.

52027. The Lieutenant of Police?—Yes. He would make inquiry on the spot. He would take your name and address as a person aggrieved, he would take the constable's name, and he would, the case being one in which the prisoner was caught red-handed, incarcerate the prisoner. The next morning the case would be tried, or it might be two days afterwards, and you would be served with a citation to attend as a witness, you having left your address, before the Burgh Court, the prisoner would be put in the dock, and you and the constable would appear as witnesses. The complaint would by that time have been served on the prisoner. The complaint would be at the instance of the Procurator Fiscal or Burgh Prosecutor of Glasgow, or rather in that case you would figure at the instance of that very Lieutenant who, quoad hoc, was acting as depute of the Burgh Prosecutor. The reason for that is one of convenience. Glasgow is so large that they have, I think, no fewer than nine sub-stations, each of which would be a very large affair in a smaller burgh. At each of those sub-stations a large mass of this trumpery criminal work has to be got through. It would be out of the question to appoint a highly-skilled lawyer to go down and act as Procurator Fiscal there. What they do is this. The Procurator Fiscal remains at the central office, but he knows that his depute, authorised in writing by him, and that writing sanctioned by the Magistrate, conducts the business officially representing the Procurator Fiscal, and he is entitled to represent him in those individual courts.

52028. I understand the Lieutenant would act as the Public Prosecutor's Depute even in a case of larceny?—Yes. Please do not take that answer from me except in this sense: If the case fell within that long category which I was giving you from the Burgh Police Act, I do not pretend, without reference to the Act, to be able to give you the category.

52029. I just want to ask you how it would work out, according to your experience, in such a case as that. In the case of minor offences, to some of which you have referred us, the Lieutenant of Police acts as the Public Prosecutor's Depute, and the Depute and the Procurator Fiscal really know nothing about it at all?—Might I say, with regard to cases which on inquiry turn out to be of a more serious character, then when the other side and the parties appear the next morning the Magistrate remits the case to the Sheriff. I do not think I explained that. Suppose it to be ultra vires of the Court to deal with it in the sense that the category does not embrace a fine on a larger scale, or the offence is of a graver kind, the Magistrate then remits the case to the Sheriff, the prisoner is detained, a proper criminal libel is served, and the prisoner is tried before the Sheriff's Court.

52030. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Would it be analogous to our committing for trial?—Just that.

52031. (Chairman.) As I understand, in such a case if it is found that the Court to which the prisoner is first brought on complaint or information, signed by the Public Prosecutor, has no jurisdiction, then the Magistrate, or, if not the Magistrate, the Procurator Fiscal, has a right to remit the cause of the proceedings to the Sheriff?—Yes. What happens, I think, is this: He just informs the Court that the offence turns out to be a grave one. Supposing it was a trivial assault to begin with, and supposing during the night the person assaulted died, then he would say, "Death has supervened," and the prosecution would not go on; but that form would be dropped, and the Magistrate would then sign a warrant remitting the prisoner to the Sheriff.

52032. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) No evidence would be heard then?—No.

52033. (Chairman.) That being so, how do you define the duty of the Lieutenant acting as the Depute of the Burgh Prosecutor in the charge room. He has either to accept the charge made by the constable or to reject it?—Yes. He exercises, you see, in that capacity that discretion which I have already deponed is valuable, and he exercises that discretion as the Depute of the Burgh Prosecutor or of the Procurator Fiscal.

52034. He is not exercising a discretion simply as a superior constable?—No. I beg of you to understand that. He can only do that really because he represents, as it were, society acting through the Burgh Prosecutor. He is the Depute of the Burgh Prosecutor to exercise a discretion as to whether this is a case society ought to take any notice of.

52035. And if the Procurator Fiscal himself has to exercise that discretion he would do so at once?—Yes. I understand if there is real doubt they telephone to the Procurator Fiscal himself, the chief man, and he comes down.

52036. So that the Scotch law is this, that in the case of these minor offences a charge is not actually accepted and brought before the Court until the Public Prosecutor has exercised a discretion on the matter?—Yes. I think that is the general practice upon which we work. We will not allow our courts to be made the medium of private grumbling if we can avoid it unless we think that society has been offended—that is to say, that the dictates of the Legislature have been violated or some common law offence has been committed against society.

52037. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) In theory that applies to our courts?—It does.

52038. (Chairman.) The Inspector in charge of a police station in London has not to exercise any discretion vested in him as a Public Prosecutor. He is simply an officer appointed by the Chief Commissioner to be in charge of a police station, to superintend the work there, and to take a charge made by a private individual or by a member of the public?—I have no acquaintance with that department with regard to how it is worked out in practice.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) They are both worked out in the same way—by the exercise of a judicial discretion, really.

52039. (Mr. Dickinson.) But, in fact, the person who actually does exercise his discretion in these cases is a superior police officer?—Yes, but observe he is a superior police officer who has been specially selected to be the Depute of the Burgh Prosecutor, and quoad hoc to be the person to exercise a judicial discretion.

52040. Has he been selected by the Burgh Prosecutor?—No; he has been selected by the Chief Constable.

52041. (Chairman.) That must be by the head of that particular office?—Yes.

52042. You could not select an inferior officer as the Lieutenant?—No. I fancy what happens is this: The ambition of these policemen is to be promoted, and one of the elements of their promotion is that when they become the heads of stations they then become pro tanto to be the posessors of certain judicial and discretionary powers.

52043. (Mr. Dickinson.) Supposing he makes a mistake, or supposing he prosecutes wrongly, is there an appeal to the Burgh Prosecutor who would call him over the coals?—What would happen would be this. You mean by the Burgh Prosecutor, substantially his chief?

52044. Yes?—It would be reported at once to the Chief Constable: "This man has made a mistake," and the Chief Constable would then hold an investigation and say, "It is quite a mistake," and the Chief Constable would dismiss him.

52045. Then the Burgh Prosecutor does not come in at all?—Yes. The Burgh Prosecutor is the man who intimates to the Chief Constable that in his opinion this prosecution which has been taken up by the Lieutenant should not have been ordered at all. The Chief Constable is at the head of the police, and he could dismiss it. Observe, we are quite in abstract, because I never knew any such case to arise, but I should work it out theoretically in this way if the Chief Constable were to say: "I will keep on that man as Lieutenant," the Prosecutor Fiscal would say "He shall no longer be my Deputy Fiscal."

52046. What I want to get at is whether you have a better method of working on the preliminary question, and whether the matter should be dealt with by a man with a mind trained for the purpose, than we have in London?—I do not think we have at the present moment.

52047. (Chairman.) I understand if the Lieutenant makes a mistake he may be censured by the Procurator Fiscal as well as censured by the Chief Constable?—Yes.

52048. The position is such that if the Procurator Fiscal makes a strong representation to the Chief Constable of Police that a man has acted wrongly or incompetently, then the Chief Constable is bound to attend to it?—Yes.

52049. Because the Chief Constable would say: "I will withdraw my delegation to that individual constable"?—Yes. Might I say my secretary has been good enough to call my attention to this, which may assist you on the point Mr. Dickinson has raised. The Glasgow Order Confirmation Act of 1877, Section 12, says this: "Section 67 of the 'Glasgow Police Act, 1866,' is hereby amended to the effect of substituting for the words 'a Procurator Fiscal, who may, if appointed by the Board, act as their clerk,' the following words: 'One or more Procurators Fiscal of Police,' or 'one Procurator Fiscal of Police,' or 'one or more Assistant Procurators Fiscal of Police.'" I think I have made it clear to you. The Town Council appoint their Procurator Fiscal of Police. They may appoint a great many, or they may appoint one with Assistant Procurators Fiscal of Police. The result would be that if he erred in that capacity he would be at once responsible to his Chief Procurator of Police, and the Chief Procurator of Police would then have two reports to make—he would say to the Chief Constable: "I cannot have that man," and he would say to the Town Council: "I cannot have this man as an Assistant Procurator."

52050. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) In the ordinary course, what would happen would be, if he accepted the charge he would prosecute on the next day?—Yes.

52051. That is to say, if he had exercised his discretion?—I hope you take my evidence as affirming what I attach great importance to—the propriety of continuing such a discretion, because I think it would be a most unfortunate state of affairs if, in cases where mistakes had been committed, which were verified on the spot, a person subject to such mistakes were to be open to prosecution owing to the absence of a discretion which common sense would point to. I am sorry to have detained you so long, but I think I have now dealt with all the points.

52052. There are one or two matters I want to ask you about. Have you in Scotland an analogous power to that of stipendiary magistrates?—We have not in Scotland. We have a power on the part of the larger burghs to appoint a stipendiary, if they so desire, and it has been exercised in Glasgow for some years, and a very excellent gentleman, I think Mr. Gemmell, was stipendiary at a salary of somewhere about £900 a year. The power, however, is purely optional. In practice we have found in Scotland very excellent judicial service rendered perfectly well by the magistrates of burghs. I may further add that I think the necessity for stipendiaries has to a certain extent disappeared with the passing of the Town Councils Act, 1900, which allowed judicial affairs to be supplemented by those judges of police to which I referred earlier in my evidence.

52053. They are all unpaid?—They are all unpaid.

52054. And they substantially do the work?—Yes, they do the work.

52055. Is that stipendiary magistrate to whom you have referred the only one that you know of?—I think he is the only one in the history of Scotland I have ever known. That power to appoint another still remains, but I understood there was some difficulty with regard to the terms before I came into office—I think at the time when Lord Dunedin held the office of Lord Advocate—and they just went on without him.

52056. They found the system worked satisfactorily?—Yes.

52057. Only one other matter I want to ask you about with regard to your reference to the sections of this statute dealing with drunkenness. Am I right in this, that for that offence to be committed the person must be drunk, and must be incapable, and not under the care of some suitable person?—I think substantially that is so.

52058. That is rather what I gathered from your reading out the words of the statute. You must have those three elements before an offence is committed?—Yes. In several cases, however, the three elements are not necessary if another element is supplied, namely, the possession, shall we say, of a gun, or anything like that. Whether he was under protection or not, if he was going about drunk with a gun, or anything like that, he would be apprehended.

52059. Or in charge of a horse?—Yes.

52060. (Mr. Dickinson.) Can any action be brought against the Burgh Prosecutor for malicious prosecution? I suppose you have no such thing in Scotland?—Yes, but it must be brought with very difficult hurdles to get over of malice and want of probable cause.

52061. Then the person against whom the action would be brought would be the Procurator Fiscal. Against whom would the action be brought?—It might be in the case you were figuring in the earlier portion of my evidence against the Lieutenant.

52062. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That would be the same as against other policemen, would it not?—Yes, I think so.

52063. (Mr. Dickinson.) Would it be against the Lieutenant? I am not clear what the chain of responsibility in this matter is. The Lieutenant only acts, as I understand, as the deputy of the Procurator?—It may be a question of some difficulty, but, as at present advised, I should say there can be no delegation of duties in the sense of making the Procurator Fiscal responsible at law for a malicious act upon the part of his Lieutenant.

52064. (Chairman.) Lord Advocate, the Commission are greatly indebted to you for coming here and for your valuable evidence?—I thank you. Might I ask you to be so good as to allow me to add to the body of my evidence this. I do not wish to involve you in any further inquiries; but I may say that the whole of this matter is before the Government, and I am producing next week a Bill which I call the Criminal Procedure and Summary Jurisdiction (Scotland) Bill, and perhaps I may leave a copy of that Bill with you. I may say there is no desire to pass that Bill this session, but I wish to elicit public opinion from skilled bodies in Scotland; and it would also be a great advantage to me if I have your Report before next session. There are several points set out in the Bill as to improving the procedure.

52065. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The Bill is not yet introduced?—No, I am introducing it next week.

(Earl Russell.) Might I ask whether any questions will be allowed to be put to Sir Edward Henry?

(Chairman.) We do not contemplate that course. Liberty to cross-examine was only given in the limited class of cases which were referred to in the Statement which I made on the opening day.

(Earl Russell.) I am not aware of any specific questions that I wish to ask, but I was instructed to make the application. Do I understand that Mr. Timewell's evidence will not be taken to-day.

(Chairman.) I do not think any decision has been arrived at with regard to that.

(Earl Russell.) It will not be taken to-day any way?

(Chairman.) No. I think ex-Inspector McCarthy is in court. I should like to say that since our last sitting, ex-Inspector McCarthy has requested us to give him an opportunity of contradicting a statement made by one Deed, a policeman who was dismissed from the force, to the effect that he, Mr. McCarthy, had given him £2 with which to effect a bet with Platt, the bookmaker. We do not think it necessary to trouble ex-Inspector McCarthy to get into the box. It is sufficient for his purpose for us to say that we attach no credence whatever to the statements made by Deed as to his connection with McCarthy, or as to the £2 bet, nor on any other controverted point.

Right Hon. T. Shaw, K.C., M.P.

26 July 1907.

(Mr. McCarthy.) May I say anything as to this?

(Chairman.) No. That is quite sufficient for your purpose.

Sir Edward Richard Henry, recalled.

Sir E. R. Henry.

26 July 1907.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) With reference to your memorandum which you kindly sent to Sir Edward Henry he has prepared a statement in writing as to head No. 4, but he has prepared no statement in writing except as to head No. 4. Sir Edward Henry asks me to mention that fact to you, and to ask whether it will be convenient to you to take first head No. 4, on which he has prepared the written statement.

(Chairman.) Yes.

52066. Sir Edward, we have asked you to come here to-day to continue the evidence you gave before us, and to ask you whether you have any further observations to make either generally or upon the particular cases we have dealt with? We have sent you a note of the points which occur to us as the points upon which we might wish to ask you some questions. With regard to head No. 4 you have a written statement, I think?—Yes.

52067. Head No. 4 is the statement made by Mr. Cluer, one of the police magistrates, as to the treatment of certain communications made by him to the Chief Commissioner. Would you like to deal with that first?—Yes, and also with the cases he mentioned in which the police, in his view, went wrong.

I regret to have to make an explanation which may appear personal in character. Mr. Cluer the learned magistrate, has made statements which the Commission will no doubt expect me to meet. He has said that the relations between the Commissioner and magistrates are deplorable, and he has referred to individual cases brought before him in which he alleges the police were guilty of misconduct.

With reference to the relations between the Commissioner and magistrates, I am authorised to say that he is speaking on his own behalf exclusively, and that this is not the opinion of the other magistrates, who consider the existing relations to be excellent. Apparently, he bases his opinion on certain incidents. The first was an incident which happened before I was Commissioner, or before my predecessor, even, had been appointed Commissioner, it happened 17 years ago—five years before Mr. Cluer himself had been appointed magistrate. I presume the Commission will not desire me to discuss the facts minutely.

I have looked at the papers and find that, in a case in which two persons were charged with pushing coping stones off a pillar in 1890, on the remand the evidence of the two constables, who were their accusers, was traversed by the statements of two other constables to the effect that it was not the defendants who had pushed the coping stones off, but the constables themselves, though they had not seen the act. The magistrate, Mr. Haden Corser, discharged the defendants, and came very reasonably to the conclusion that two of the constables must have given false testimony, and he referred the matter to the Commissioner. The Commissioner apparently found it impossible to decide which pair of constables had been lying and so he scattered the whole four, transferring them from where they were to other divisions, so that there might be no opportunity of their acting either in collusion with each other or in hostility to each other. Mr. Haden Corser, hearing of this, wrote to the Commissioner, and pointed out that if a transfer was a punishment, it was rather hard that the innocent pair of constables should have been punished, and he wanted an explanation of this. This explanation the Commissioner was not prepared to give, and so the matter ended, and as Mr. Haden Corser unfortunately is dead, and the Commissioner concerned is not present to speak for himself, it can be carried no further.

The other incident is one which concerns myself. In a case heard by Mr. Cluer, on the 6th July, 1905, in which Ahern and two others were defendants, Police-constables Robinson and Fern gave evidence in support of a charge of assault. Mr. Cluer heard the case, discharged the defendants, and commented on the testimoney of these two constables, stating that he disbelieved their evidence altogether. Though inquiry showed that the constables had acted properly in the case, it became necessary to remove them from the division, as it was felt that they would be completely useless for the performance of duty there owing to the opinion publicly expressed by the Magistrate. In consequence of his remarks, the defendant Ahern took out a summons for assault against Constable Robinson, being supported, I understand, in this, by Mr. Timewell, who provided him with a solicitor and counsel. The case brought by Ahern against Police-constable Robinson was heard, at Mr. Cluer's request, by Mr. Mead, another magistrate. Mr. Mead came to the conclusion that the accounts given by the complainant and his witnesses were so contradictory, that no credence whatever could be attached to their statements, and he dismissed the summons. Mr. Cluer having read Mr. Mead's notes then wrote to me as Commissioner, saying that he hoped that nothing would happen to Constable Robinson, and he expressed his regret for his mistake in that matter. I may say I was not in this country when the letter was received, and in my absence Mr. Cluer received a formal acknowledgment, thanking him for having written. Mr. Cluer's comment upon this is as follows:—"This is the relation between magistrates and the Commissioner and it is a very deplorable one. It is a great pity that when we have cases, as I do, of police who go wrong, the Commissioner does not attend to them otherwise than by sending the men to other divisions." I regret that Mr. Cluer did not receive a fuller reply, but had I received the letter in person, the acknowledgment I should have sent Mr. Cluer would probably not have seemed acceptable to him, because it appeared to me that in the matter of these two constables, Mr. Cluer's action was wholly inadequate. In open court he had imputed to them misconduct of the gravest character. When he discovered his mistake he was, in my opinion, bound to make the most complete reparation in his power. In consequence of his remarks they had their homes broken up, and were transferred under a cloud to other divisions. The public might very well believe of them that they had given false testimony. It was a grievous slur upon their character, which could have been removed by Mr. Cluer if he had followed the course which was obviously indicated of expressing in open court his regret that owing to a misapprehension of the facts, he had unwittingly done these two men a wrong, and unreservedly withdrawing his condemnation of them.

I may say that in a large number of cases a departmental inquiry has been held into the conduct of constables in consequence of remarks made by Magistrates.

Not so very long ago two constables were dismissed the Force, inquiry having corroborated the view expressed by Mr. Hopkins that they had given exaggerated and misleading evidence; and there are numerous instances in which disciplinary action has been taken upon Magistrates remarks. As Commissioner I am always glad that Magistrates should draw my attention to shortcomings affecting the interests of the courts or of prisoners. These arise more often from ignorance than from ill-will, and communications from Magistrates do much to bring about remedy.

I should like to say here that had I known what was in Mr. Cluer's mind I should have endeavoured to clear away misunderstandings, but till recently I was unaware that he had any personal grievance against the person holding the office of Commissioner of Police.

52068. Did you have any correspondence with Mr. Cluer about this case heard on the 6th July, 1903?—No, no correspondence.

52069. In fact he never wrote again upon the matter?—No.

52070. Did you in fact when you came home inquire into the circumstances of the case?—I cannot exactly say when it came before me.

52071. Did you look into the matter yourself?—I looked into the matter because I was aware of the transfer of the officers, and a question arose as to whether Robinson should be defended on the summons, and it was decided that he must defend himself, and if he came out of it his expenses would be paid.

52072. Who did attend to the matter?—One of the Assistant Commissioners, I suppose. There was not very much to attend to.

52073. Was there no inquiry made by one of the Assistant Commissioners?—Yes.

52074. Or were there no reports called for?—Yes. Here are the reports. (Producing.)

52075. I gather you formed an opinion about the propriety of the transfer?—Yes.

52076. You did that upon some report before you?—Yes, I made a representation to the Home Office upon the matter, asking them to sanction the payment to this man, Robinson, of his law expenses.

52077. Was that acceded to?—Yes, that was acceded to.

52078. Were there reports called for in that case?—Yes.

52079. Who called for the reports?—Major Wodehouse. It was a uniform case and he would have dealt with it.

I now come to individual cases in which Mr. Cluer alleges that the police were guilty of misconduct. The first one referred to is that of Emms and Norrey. About this I need not say much as the Commission have investigated it, but I may observe that Emms and Norrey have since been sent to prison for 12 months each for larceny from the person, both pleading guilty to the charges made against them. They are members of the Harding gang. Harding (or Tressadern) was on the 17th May last convicted at the Old Street Police Court by Mr. Biron, after a prolonged inquiry, in which he was defended by the Police and Public Vigilance Association, of an assault on P.C. Fuller, and was sentenced to four months' hard labour, and William Andrews, who gave evidence before this Commission, was on 5th February last sentenced to six months' hard labour at the North London Sessions for larceny from the person. Of course, the fact that Emms and Norrey have a bad history is not in itself a proof of their guilt in the particular case referred to by Mr. Cluer, but it is relevant in a general way when a decision has to be arrived at as to whether the police action may or may not have been justified.

The next case Mr. Cluer deals with is that of Joseph Richardson, a case which was before him on April 29th, 1907. The Magistrate's opinion clearly was that the constable had not seen this youth gambling, and that he had seen a number of other people gambling, but because he knew him by sight he thought it safe to arrest him.

52080. Have you a print of the evidence before you which shows the questions put to Mr. Cluer?—Yes.

52081. This is Question 44950. Mr. Cluer said: "Now only this week, last Monday, a lad was charged with gambling. The evidence was that at 40 yards distance the policeman had seen him with 20 others throwing up coins in the air, and the police constable swore that he walked round, met him two minutes afterwards at Hoxton Street, at the corner of Old Street, and arrested him. The lad said, 'I was doing nothing of the sort; I had been in an ice cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes.' He called an independent person, who did not know him, who satisfied me that he had been in the shop all the time, and I dismissed the case"?—That is the case. Mr. Cluer went on to say that he had a test, which is whether the man has any money in his possession or not.

52082. What do you say about that?—The next case Mr. Cluer deals with is that of Joseph Richardson, a case which was before him on April 29th, 1907. The Magistrate's opinion clearly was that the constable had not seen this youth gambling, that he had seen a number of other people gambling, but because he knew him by sight he thought it was safe to arrest him, whereas the youth himself said that he had been in an ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes before, and called a witness to prove this. Mr. Cluer says that in gambling cases he applies a test which he thinks a fair one. He says: "What money have you got in your pocket?" Answer: "None." "How can he gamble if he has got no money? I dismiss him." Now, as a matter of fact, the charge sheet shows that 10d. in coppers were found upon Richardson, so that he had money. Mr. Cluer says that the person who came forward to prove that Richardson had been in the ice-cream shop for a quarter of an hour or twenty minutes did not know him. This person lives close by the corner where Richardson stands every day selling papers, and it is unlikely that he did not know him. Richardson at the police station did not plead that he had been in the ice-cream shop; what he said was that he had been looking on, and had not actually been gambling. The learned Magistrate admits that gambling is an intolerable evil in the neighbourhood; if so, the police deputed to cope with it were not impelled by necessity to invent charges to justify themselves.

The next case is that of two men who on the same day were charged with insulting behaviour.

52083. That is referred to at Question 44956: "There were two men on the same day who were charged in that section with insulting behaviour, and the evidence was that they were linked arm-in-arm, pushing people off the pavement. The pavement is 30 ft. wide, and the policeman knows I know that. He means pushing into people. It was in the Whitechapel Road. One of them was arrested; the other one waited about to take a tramcar to go away, and he was also arrested while he was waiting for his car. They both called a witness to say that they had been at a certain mission in the district the same night, that they had been practising athletics there, and they were carrying home a pair of boxing gloves wrapped up in a handkerchief, and they were going along perfectly peacefully. I think they must have been mistaken for some rough people." Is that the case?—That is the case.

52084. What do you say about that?—The next case is that of two men who on the same day were charged with insulting behaviour. The evidence, according to Mr. Cluer, was that they were linked arm-in-arm, pushing people off the pavement, the pavement being 30 ft. wide. Both called a witness to say that they had been at a certain mission that night, and that they had been practising athletics there, and Mr. Cluer thought they must have been mistaken for some rough people. In dismissing them he said, "They don't look like men who would do such a thing." As a matter of fact, the allegation against them was not that these two alone, but that they with several others, were pushing each other about the footway against people, and using filthy language. Cole and Schrier are their names, and the friend they called in to testify to their conduct was a man named George Crease. I think it may be said that they are rough and not respectable persons, for Crease got nine months' hard labour at the North London Sessions in 1905 for stealing, after previous convictions; Cole got 12 months in May, 1906, at the same Sessions for shopbreaking, after previous convictions, and Schrier got 12 months in January, 1906, for stealing, he also having previous convictions recorded against him. I mention that because the Magistrate says they were not rough people.

I now come to the case of Davis, which is rather an important case.

52085. That is at Question 44957. "The case of Mr. Davis was rather a different case. He was a respectable man, the manager of a business, and he went to the London and Westminster Bank in Commercial Street, had a business conversation with the manager of the bank, drew £50 for wages for his employer, went out of the bank, and fell down in a fit. It happened that two friends of his were passing on an omnibus, and they got off the omnibus, and said to the policeman, "We know this man; we will take him away." The policeman declined to allow it. Probably the policeman was not sure what was the matter with him. The man was taken to the station, and he was brought before me in about an hour and a quarter and charged with being drunk. The policeman then swore he was drunk, the doctor said he was drunk, and said he smelt of drink, and the Inspector swore he was drunk. There was the bank manager, there were half a dozen of his friends, and there was his own doctor to prove that he had epilepsy, and that for four days—as he assured me himself, and he was evidently speaking the truth—he had drunk absolutely nothing."

52086. (Chairman.) "What was the medical evidence in that case on the side of the constable?—(A.) That the man was drunk. I forget whether actually the doctor said that he smelt strongly of drink or not"?—There is one rather important thing, perhaps, you will say. Mr. Cluer says in answer to Question 44960: "Having once taken the man into custody against the wish of his two friends who got off an omnibus to say so, then they foolishly prefer the charge against him, and, once the charge is preferred, then, unfortunately, the witness-box is used to give evidence which is not true." The facts are as follows:—A Mr. Delmont, who was standing on the footway saw Mr. Davis come out of the bank and go into the roadway, where he fell down (as he thought) from an epileptic seizure. He ran to the bank and told the clerks there and then went into adjoining premises to get a glass of water. On his return he found that the "point" constable and a sergeant had helped Mr. Davis out of the roadway and had taken him to the bank steps, where they were tending him. He made the water over to them, and they laved Mr. Davis's face and brushed the dirt off his clothes; and while they were looking after him the bank manager appeared on the top of the steps and said, "Look well after him; he has a lot of money on him." When able to walk Mr. Davis was taken to the station, Mr. Delmont following, and when they were near the station a Mr. Tabaserman, a friend of Mr. Davis's, who was passing on a tram, saw him and got off and followed to the station. Mr. Delmont, having heard the doctor sent for, left. Mr. Tabaserman remained, and offered to take charge of Mr. Davis, but the police said they must await the doctor's decision. The doctor arrived quickly, he having been called to see a person alleged to be recovering from a fit. Having examined Mr. Davis, he recorded the opinion that he was not recovering from the effects of an epileptic seizure, but was unmistakeably suffering from the effects of alcoholic intoxication, and he made an entry in the register accordingly. Tabaserman then left, he having been told that upon the doctor's certificate a charge of drunkenness would be preferred against Davis. I wish to emphasise the point that it was not upon the testimony of the constable, but upon the medical testimony that this charge was taken. This is the course followed in cases of doubt. I find that during 1905 no less than 2,801 charges of drunkenness were only accepted after hearing medical opinion. Mr. Cluer's account therefore is incorrect in various respects.

Mr. Cluer has told the Commission that he saw Mr. Davis within one and a quarter hours of his arrest. This is not a very material point, and I only notice it because the Commission might infer that the conditions were favourable for the Magistrate forming an independent opinion as to Mr. Davis's state. Mr. Davis did not leave the station until 1.55; he reached the court at 2.7, but did not appear before the Magistrate till 2.30, about three and a half hours after his arrest. Mr. Cluer has told the Commission that the policeman swore he was drunk, the doctor swore he was drunk, and the Inspector swore he was drunk. I have Mr. Cluer's notes, and I have also interrogated the Inspector, and find that the Inspector did not give evidence at all, and that Mr. Cluer is quite mistaken in saying that the Inspector swore that Mr. Davis was drunk. I have already stated to the Commission that when the doctor was sent for he was asked to come and see a person alleged to be recovering from a fit. The doctor, having made an examination, recorded it as his professional opinion that the man was not recovering from a fit, but was recovering from the effects of alcoholic intoxication. Mr. Cluer does not appear to have questioned this witness as to the grounds upon which he based his opinion. I am advised that the symptoms of persons recovering from the effects of drink and of an epileptic seizure respectively can as a rule be easily discriminated. The Chief Surgeon wrote to the surgeon who certified in Mr. Davis's case, and received back an explanation which completely satisfied him that this gentleman had very strong grounds for the opinion he had formed. Notwithstanding this, Mr. Cluer, before this Commission, has said that as the doctor made this statement, he must either be a very incompetent doctor, or have told a lie, or must have been drinking himself. It appears to me that the privilege that attaches to the proceedings of this Commission has been abused to publish a most damaging imputation against a respectable medical man, an imputation which must have a tendency to do him harm socially and harm professionally, and one which, if correct, would certainly disqualify him for the office to which he has been appointed by the Home Secretary, but it is an imputation from which he cannot, in the circumstances, publicly clear himself by recourse to a court of law. From the Magistrate's notes it appears that neither the bank manager nor Mr. Davis's doctor, nor the two friends who followed to the station gave evidence on Mr. Davis's behalf.

52087. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It does not seem to me that Mr. Cluer said that the doctor was telling a lie. It is at Question 44962. The question which is put to Mr. Cluer by the Chairman as a suggestion is: "If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie." That is the question. The answer was, "Or he had been having a drink himself"?—Could he say it in more explicit words?

52088. What I want to know is this. We can form our own opinion as to what the answer means. That is the question, is it not, upon which you make that statement?—Yes. That is the construction I put upon his answer.

52089. (Chairman.) The Magistrate said: "I forget whether actually the doctor said that he smelt strongly of drink or not." Mr. Cluer does not give a positive answer. Then I said: "It seems that the man had drunk nothing for four days. If the doctor said that the man's breath smelt of drink, either he was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie"?—Quite so.

52090. Then all Mr. Cluer said was, "Or he had been having a drink himself." He did not positively assert that the doctor had been having a drink?—I must leave the construction of it entirely to the Commission, but that is the interpretation I put upon it.

52091. What you suggest is that he ought to have answered, "I know the doctor, and I know him to be quite a respectable man"?—It is so very damaging to the doctor that it is a matter for the Commission to consider whether they would not, with the permission of Mr. Cluer, delete what he said from the evidence, because it has not been published as yet practically, and it may do the doctor very grave harm.

52092. (Mr. Dickinson.) I do not think it necessarily means that the doctor had been drinking or was drunk. That is the construction you put upon it. I do not?—You may not, but the construction that I put upon it is that Mr. Cluer said, "Either this man was an incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie, or he had been having a drink."

52093. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I do not read it so. I read it quite differently. I read it thus. The Chairman was putting a question to Mr. Cluer that if the man had drunk nothing for four days, and if the doctor said that his breath smelt of drink, either the doctor was a very incompetent doctor, or he was telling a lie, and Mr. Cluer adds another alternative—"Or he had been having a drink himself," and therefore smelt of drink?—Mr. Cluer believed that the man had not had a drink for four days, because he told you so.

52094. I am putting to you what Mr. Cluer meant, which I do not think quite bears out the inference you draw?—You are putting a much more charitable construction upon it, I am afraid, than I do, because it appeared to me to be a very strong imputation. Of course, I may be wrong.

52095. I do not think it was.

52096. (Chairman.) The Chief Commissioner suggests that Mr. Cluer should have answered, "I know the doctor, and I know him to be quite a respectable man." That is what you suggest he ought to have answered?—Yes.

52097. (Mr. Dickinson.) Mr. Cluer meant undoubtedly that it might have been the doctor's own breath that confused his sense of smell. I take it Mr. Cluer's answer meant it was possible that the doctor himself had had a drink, and that that fact confused his sense of smell?—Do you mean to say taking a glass of wine would confuse your sense of smell?

Sir E. R. Henry.

26 July 1907.

52098. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) There was a smell of drink somewhere. If the other man had not had a drink for four days, and there was nobody else there but the man and the doctor, and there was a smell of drink, it must have been the doctor's own breath. I do not think Mr. Cluer meant to make any imputation on anybody?—That is not the way in which the doctor looks at it. I think, in justice to the doctor, the best way would be to delete it, if Mr. Cluer has no objection.

52099. (Chairman.) I do not think Mr. Cluer meant to say that he had been drinking. I do not find that the name of the gentleman is mentioned?—No. I have not mentioned his name on purpose, and you have not mentioned it either.

From the Magistrate's notes it appears that neither the bank manager nor Mr. Davis's doctor, nor the two friends who followed to the station gave evidence on Mr. Davis's behalf the only two witnesses heard for the defence being the employer, Mr. Hyman Chissick, and the employer's son, who spoke as to his character, and to having seen him that morning, when he was sober; and it is not possible therefore to say what their statements, if made, would have amounted to. Mr. Cluer finds fault with the police for not having made Mr. Davis over to his friends, but even if the two friends had got off an omnibus, as stated, and had asked for the custody of Mr. Davis—which is not a fact—the police would not have been justified in making over, especially in such a neighbourhood, a person more or less unconscious, and in possession of a large sum of money, to two men whom they did not know.

52100. (Mr. Dickinson.) You have told us that, from information that you have got out. What you are reading is from information which somebody has given you?—Yes.

52101. You have told us that the information that has been given to you points to the fact that the Inspector, at any rate, gave no evidence?—Yes.

52102. What do you say about the evidence that Mr. Cluer says the policeman gave? Mr. Cluer said, "The policeman swore he was drunk"?—Yes.

52103. We have heard nothing about that?—What do you wish me to tell you about that?

52104. Did he or not?—Yes, of course he swore he was drunk. He heard the doctor's testimony, he saw him in a more or less comatose state, and it was either drunkenness or epilepsy, and, as the doctor said it was drunkenness, he had no hesitation—the man had the smell of drink on him, and the constable swore he was drunk.

52105. The constable swore he was drunk because he thought the man had a fit?—The constable never said he thought the man had a fit, but his friends who came into the station said they thought he had a fit, and consequently the message sent to the doctor was: "Come and see a man who is alleged to be recovering from a fit."

52106. Then the constable did think he was drunk?—I do not know what the constable thought.

52107. He must have thought he was drunk if he swore it?—Yes, he probably thought from the beginning the man was drunk, and in 99 cases out of 100 it is drunkenness, and not epilepsy.

The next case is that of a man called William Ashendon, a carter in the employ of Mr. Fardell. The police version is that this man Ashendon, who was in charge of a lorry on which was a boiler, pulled by a couple of horses tandem, was seen by the constable on the beat to be driving from one side of the road to the other, and then to fall off the lorry into the roadway. He got back on to his lorry again, and tried to drive away, but drove on to the footway, the leading horse turning right round and facing the wheeler, the other being at a standstill on the footway when the police came up. Mr. Cluer says that the employer, Mr. Fardell, satisfied him that he had been with Ashendon all the time, and that they had not had a drink, and consequently dismissed the case. According to my information, Mr. Fardell stated that he had passed Ashendon on the road about an hour before, at which time he appeared to be sober. It is quite certain that unless his behaviour had been very noticeable the police would not have arrested a man in charge of a trolley and boiler and a couple of horses on a charge of drunkenness, such an arrest entailing considerable trouble to themselves, as they would have to look after the horses and the trolley and send for the owner to take them away. I may add that I am informed this man, who was convicted on the 24th June, 1905, of drunkenness at the Thames Police Court, has since been dismissed by his employer on account of his habits, and lost his next place from the same cause. A doctor was not called, because Ashendon at the station did not contest the charge or ask to see one.

52108. (Chairman.) At Question 44970 Mr. Rufus Isaacs asked Mr. Cluer: "Will you tell us what evidence there was of drunkenness in that case—how many witnesses (A.) Only the Inspector and the constable. The Inspector was in the street, and I think he came up." Could that be without something unusual taking place. The Inspector in charge of the station, I suppose, was in the station?—No, there would be two—one would be patrolling, and the other would be in charge of the station.

52109. Would it have been proper for the Inspector, who had been in the street as a witness, to take the charge himself and go back to the station with the constable?—I do not suppose he took the charge. Probably the person who took the charge would be the other Inspector, who was on duty at the station.

52110. "The constable and the Inspector who came up both swore he was drunk while in charge of the horses." That was not the Inspector who took the charge?—No, I think that was the patrolling Inspector.

The next case is that of Littlemore, arrested for disorderly conduct and using obscene language, who said he had been thrown violently down by the sergeant; the implication being that the prolapsus recti he was suffering from was caused by this violence. Mr. Cluer says: "There was, however, evidence that the man, who could not pay his rent, had been treated very violently. You don't get prolapsus recti by throwing yourself down on the pavement." I have a copy of Mr. Cluer's notes in this case, from which it appears that the only witness examined was the police sergeant, who said that Littlemore threw him down, both falling together. The doctor was called at the station, and recorded the following certificate, which the Magistrate admits he took into consideration in dealing with the case: "Called to station at 9 p.m. to see William Littlemore. He was suffering from prolapsus recti and abrasions on right knee. I advised that he be bailed." This is the certificate of the doctor who was called in to see Littlemore.

52111. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You think the Magistrate took that into consideration?—Yes, he read it. He says he never looks at certificates, but that was an exception, because he did look at it there. "I advised that he be bailed. He had been drinking." (Signed) "M. L. Clift, M.R.C.S." The prisoner's wife was in Court, and the sergeant asked the Magistrate to hear her upon the point of the prisoner's complaint being of old standing, but his request was refused. Dr. Clift has since been referred to, and states, as he informed the police at the time, that the prolapsus recti, in his opinion, was of old standing. I have a certificate from him to that effect. The police intervened in this case on the complaint of the neighbours, who felt aggrieved at Littlemore's conduct.

The next case is one of the 30th April last, in which two young men named Simons and Eugene (this is referred to in the middle of page 1048) were charged with being drunk and disorderly in the neighbourhood of Brick Lane. Mr. Cluer is of opinion that they were not drunk at all. The facts appear to be that a section sergeant on his rounds, hearing a woman scream, and, seeing the prisoners coming from that direction, stopped them, asked them what had happened, and said they must accompany him back to the spot from which the scream had come. But the woman was not to be seen, and the two young men, who, in the sergeant's judgment, were drunk, became troublesome and caused disturbance, and as they would not go away, he took them to the station. As in answer to the charge they denied being drunk, the doctor was sent for, and he recorded the following entry: "Called at 4.15 a.m. to H. Simon and N. Eugene, who deny being drunk. I have carefully examined them, and find that neither is yet sober. Fit for cells. 30/4/07." As the Magistrate bound over Simons to be of good behaviour for 12 months, he evidently at the time was satisfied that the police action was not wholly unjustified.

The case last mentioned is that of Walter Mason, of the Band of Hope, charged in February, 1899 or more than eight years ago, with being drunk. The officer concerned having left the service, I have not been able to make an independent inquiry into the facts, and for the same reason I cannot go into the case of the bookmaker Vale, the constable who gave evidence having lost his life not long ago. Those are the only two cases I have not been able to go into independently. I can tell the Commissioners the facts of those two cases. In the case of Mason the only points that I noticed on looking at the papers were that he was there for five hours before being bailed, and that he did not appear at the Court the next morning, and he had to be proceeded against. That is all I know about that case. In the case of the bookmaker the allegation of the police was that he had run away into a house, the door of which was open. The case was remanded, and when it came on again the owner of the house appeared as a witness. My recollection is that this man said it was very unlikely that the bookmaker could have got into his house and remained there for five minutes, because there was a servant downstairs, and his children would probably have noticed it. That is as far as I remember.

There is only one other point before I leave Mr. Cluer's evidence that it is necessary to refer to. He says that the medical man who does come to examine prisoners is very much in alliance with the police, and that is why at his Court they never look at the medical certificate.

52112. (Chairman.) It is at Question 45008: "I know at our Court we never look at the medical certificate." At Question 45006 I say: "I rather gather from that that even at the present time the medical man who does in fact come to examine the prisoners when they want him is very much in alliance with the police? (A.) Quite so"?—I do not know whether, after the remark that Mr. Rufus Isaacs made as to my construction upon something Mr. Cluer said about another doctor, you will take the same view of this remark that I take, but I take it it is rather a reflection upon them, and I have got something to say about it.

52113. I think this remark is a distinct reflection?—This remark, in my view, is a serious reflection upon the trustworthiness of the body of Divisional Surgeons, of whom there are some 180 in the Metropolitan Police district. These gentlemen are selected for their office on account of their professional reputation and personal character, by the Chief Surgeon, and are appointed by the Home Secretary. According to his own showing, Mr. Cluer has no opportunities of forming an opinion of their work, as he never looks at their certificates. To say of them that they are in alliance with the police to mislead the court, is an unmerited aspersion which they no doubt will be anxious to meet when it is brought to their notice by the publication of the evidence taken before this Commission. May I add, in conclusion, that I appreciate the peculiar difficulties Mr. Cluer has to contend with, having within his jurisdiction one of the most troublesome districts in London. I am in sympathy also with his manifest leaning to the side of the prisoner. It is a humane and proper attitude of mind, but may be attended with serious consequences when prisoners take advantage of a magistrate's impulses to bring about the undeserved censure of men who have done no more than their duty.

52113* (Chairman.) I think you have finished the observations you wish to make upon Mr. Cluer's evidence?—Yes.

52114. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) There is one matter I wish to call attention to, at Question 44,985:—"Coming to the next question, have you any comments to make with regard to the organisation and work of the Police Force?"

52115. (Chairman.) Let me read the question and answer:—"Coming to the next question, have you any comments to make with regard to the organisation and work of the Police Force?—(A.) All I can say as to that is that I think the Commissioner of Police and his subordinates all through should act with the greatest strictness in all cases which come before them where there is any misconduct of any kind; and I am satisfied, from what I have come across, that the Commissioner does not do so. I have had instances of it; and instead of people being, as was suggested in the questions put to Mr. Baggallay, dismissed for serious misconduct, they are merely transferred to other divisions and allowed to see if they can delude another magistrate instead of the one who found them out. I think that is the only thing I can suggest. Anything which can raise the standard of truth-telling, accuracy, and a sense of their duty towards the public, from the Commissioner downwards, I think is the only comment I can suggest which would assist the organisation and working of the Police Force; but that is a very important point." Have you any observations to make upon that answer of Mr. Cluer?—I consider we deal with great strictness with all instances of misconduct which are established to our satisfaction. I do not know what Mr. Cluer means by saying that they are merely transferred.

Sir E. R. Henry.

26 July 1907.

52116. Mr. Cluer's suggestion is that police constables, in regard to misconduct which is complained of, have been transferred to another division and not otherwise punished?—But he has made no complaint.

52117. He has made no complaint to you; but, as I gather from his evidence, he does make comments in court, and he calls the attention of the sub-divisional inspector, who is habitually in attendance in court, in some cases to what he believes to be the misconduct of an officer?—I have dealt with all the cases Mr. Cluer referred to before this Commission. He came here with the object of bringing before your notice cases in which the police had misconducted themselves, and the only comment brought to my notice was in the case of Davis. He did not comment upon any other case at all.

52118. He only commented before us?—He only commented before you.

52119. He says he finds that there are cases in which constables have been guilty of misconduct, and he finds the only thing that happens to the constable is that he is transferred to another division?—I have dealt with those cases. In the case of Constables Robinson and Fern they were transferred, and I have explained why they were transferred. Of course, in that case Mr. Cluer himself admits that he was wrong. He has told the Commission he thought he blundered in that case. The result of our inquiry was to the effect that he was wrong.

52120. Now let me take the case of a police-constable whose name, I think, was Worsley. In that case judgment had gone against him for using unnecessary violence, with £25 damages, in the County Court; and the result was that he was transferred to another division, and a portion of the damages were paid out of the Police Fund?—The facts of that case are well within my recollection. This constable was on duty in Kensal Town, and he found a great deal of disorder outside a public-house. He tried to get the disorderly persons to move away, but they would not move away, and he arrested a man named Mallows for being drunk. When he arrested Mallows, another man called out, "Let's out him!" and he took a running kick at the constable. The constable blew his whistle, and another constable came up, and he handed Mallows over to this man's custody. Then the aggressor—Wilson, I think his name was—came at him again with a running kick, intending to injure him, and the constable drew his truncheon and hit him on the head. The case came before the police magistrate, Mr. Plowden, who convicted Mallows and fined him 40s., and he said to Wilson, "You have had punishment enough; you are discharged." Mr. Plowden did not come to the conclusion that the constable had acted wrongly, but he came to the conclusion that the man Wilson had been already sufficiently punished. Upon that a civil suit was instituted against Worsley, and the County Court Judge held that there was provocation, by deed and by word, justifying him in useing his truncheon; but he held that he was not justified in hitting the man on the head. From that opinion I venture to dissent; and I think, if you put yourself in the position of a constable against whom a drunken and desperate man is coming with intent to injure, the probability is you would hit him on the head. In fact, you would find great difficulty in hitting him anywhere else, because you cannot flourish your truncheon in this way, horizontally—(illustrating)—because you might hit somebody else in a hostile crowd. The constable has to bring his truncheon down in a vertical direction, and so a portion only of a man's frame is exposed; and you must either hit him on the shoulder or on the head, and I think no one should necessarily blame a constable if he hits a man on the head. I say, this, having regard to my knowledge of the grave injuries that are caused to constables. There is a case I am now dealing with where a young constable was kicked by a savage like that quite a year ago. He apparently got over it, married, and now he has developed epileptic seizures, which are the first symptoms, I understand, of general paralysis, resulting from the grievous injuries done to him. He was kicked about the private parts.

Sir E. R. Henry.
26 July 1907.

52121. The regulation as to the use of the truncheon is Regulation 230, at page 257, of the White Book: "Truncheons are supplied to the police to enable them to protect themselves if violently attacked, and if a constable is likely to be overpowered he may draw his truncheon and use it, taking care to avoid striking anyone on the head. The arms and legs should be aimed at to disable a prisoner, as parts of the frame least likely to suffer serious inqury. The use of the truncheon is not to be resortel to except in extreme cases, when all other attempts have failed and a prisoner is likely to escape through the constable being ill-used or overpowered." I understand from you in this case you came to the conclusion that the constable was justified in using his truncheon?—Yes.

52122. And you think it was a case in which he could not, under the circumstances, avoid hitting the man on the head if he used the truncheon at all?—Quite so.

52123. That is the view you took of it?—Yes. I say more than that. If he had merely struck him on the shoulder he might not have stopped the onslaught. He was bound to stop that man getting home. I think these words are a sort of protection to the police authority who give very humane directions to the men, but they do not adequately provide for the difficulties of the constable. The words should be that he is not to use more violence with his truncheon than the emergency requires.

52124. Am I to understand from that that you think that was a case in which Worsley had, in fact, not acted in strict accordance with the instructions?—Not with that instruction. I do not see how he could have hit him on the legs. He would have had to stoop down to hit a man on the legs. How could you hit a man on the legs when he is charging you? It is not possible.

52125. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Your view seems to be, as I follow it, that if a constable draws his truncheon he may hit a man on the head?—Not necessarily. I am talking of this particular case. If a man is coming running at you the head represents a considerable part of the surface which is available. If the constable uses his truncheon vertically one shoulder is completely protected by the head, and he cannot hit him on that shoulder.

52126. He ought to try to avoid hitting him on the head, ought he not?—That may be, but how are you going to avoid it? How are you going to time your blow so perfectly? If a man is running at you, how are you to time your blow so that you shall hit him on the shoulder and not on the head? If the man were standing it would be different.

52127. (Chairman.) You did not write yourself in that case, because, as we know, it was the Assistant Commissioner—I think it was Assistant Commissioner Major Wodehouse?—Yes.

52128. This is what he wrote to the constable himself: "I have sent for you to convey the decision of the Secretary of State in your case, and to deal with you myself. I think I need not go into the case at all. Of the decision of the County Court Judge you are quite well aware, and in accordance with this decision damages were given against you to the extent of £20 and costs. The case was laid before the Secretary of State inasmuch as there were extenuating circumstances, and we have now got his decision, which is: 'That he cannot sanction the whole payment of the damages and costs out of the Police Fund,' but he leaves it to the Commissioner for the officer to pay a portion of it. I want you to understand quite clearly what the Commissioner's opinion is in this case." That is your opinion. Did he consult you upon the matter?—When he dealt with the man. I do not think he wrote to him. I think he had him up and said to him, He would not write to a constable; he would have him up before him.

52129. What we have got is the shorthand note of the Assistant Commissioner's judgment or statement made after the investigation. I am quoting from something that Mr. Eldon Bankes said. Mr. Eldon Bankes said, "I will read that." It was Mr. Eldon Bankes who read what I have just read to you?—Quite.

52130. The shorthand note goes on: "I want you to understand quite clearly what the Commissioner's opinion is in this case. It is that you were justified in using your truncheon when attacked; that you were not to blame for having struck this man on the head; and so far there is nothing against you; but after having partially disabled this man you were not justified in continuing to strike him as has been proved to the satisfaction of the Court you did; consequently you were guilty of unnecessarily using your truncheon. For that offence you are now severely reprimanded and cautioned, and you will pay £5 towards the damages and costs. That £5 will be recovered against you by instalments, such as the Superintendent thinks you can pay, weekly. I think you have been treated exceptionally leniently from one point of view, inasmuch as the Secretary of State might have held that you should have paid the whole of the damages. I hope you will be exceedingly careful how far you make use of your truncheon on any future occasion." As a matter of fact he was transferred to another Division?—Quite.

52131. That was the judgment or sentence?—This was the note I made on receiving the Secretary of State's letter. I think you have got a copy of my letter to the Secretary of State. I went fully into the whole case and gave the reasons. If you like I will read it.

52132. I do not think we need have the whole letter read?—This letter will explain what I had in my mind at the time, if you would wish me to read it.

52133. I think you may as well read it?—"New Scotland Yard, S.W., 10th January, 1905. —Sir,—With reference to your letter of 7th October, authorising the employment of Messrs. Wontner on behalf of Police-constable Worsley, in the matter of the summons for damages taken out against him at the Marylebone County Court, I have to acquaint you, for the information of the Secretary of State, that the case was reached on the 9th December, when, after a long and full hearing, the Judge took time to consider his decision. Judgment was delivered in written form on the 21st ultimo, and damages amounting to £20, with costs on the P. scale, were awarded to the plaintiff. I enclose copy of the judgment, from which it will be seen that the evidence has been carefully considered by the County Court Judge, whose finding that P.C. Worsley continued to use his truncheon after the necessity for so using it had ceased, may be accepted, although it is open to doubt whether in a civil action all the surrounding circumstances bearing upon such an incident as this could be properly taken into account. As stated in my letter of 3rd October last, the Police Magistrate who dealt with the plaintiff and another prisoner arrested at the time, convicted the latter, and in discharging the plaintiff, remarked that he thought he had been punished enough for the offence he had committed, and made no comment upon the use of the truncheon by the constable. The Judge finds that there was provocation by word and deed on the part of the plaintiff which justified the constable in using his truncheon, though not justifying his striking the plaintiff on the head. The wound on the head constitutes by far the most serious injury inflicted, and it was the extent of the injury which influenced the Court in assessing damages. Experience has shown that, however good the intention of constables, and however explicit the instructions under which they act in the excitement of a contest, it is not possible for a man wielding a truncheon to deliver his blows exactly where he intends. If the use of the truncheon was justifiable, as it obviously was, it is not in my view reasonable to hold that the constable was necessarily to blame because the plaintiff was struck by him on the head. The description of what occurred of the plaintiff attempting to deliver a running kick sufficiently indicates that a blow not intended for the head might have fallen upon it. In using the truncheon while Wilson was on the ground the constable was clearly in the wrong. In estimating his culpability the circumstances of the case must not be lost sight of. Outside the public-house is a very rough neighbourhood; drunken men were quarrelling and using obscene language. The constable, who might have purposely omitted to take action, deemed it his duty, though single-handed, to intervene, and not being able to disperse these men he arrested one Mallows, who struggled and struck him twice in the face without, as far as is known, any retaliatory reaction by the constable. It was then, as another constable came up, the plaintiff, after calling on the bystanders, to 'out' the constable, tried to hack him over with a running kick. Had his performance been equal to his intention P.C. Worsley might have been seriously injured. He is said to be a highly nervous strung man, and as Wilson's character is well-known, he having been convicted some seven times for drunkenness, assaults on police, etc., the constable may reasonably enough have considered that he was in danger, and he accordingly drew his truncheon and used it, and as it appears, used it too much. The constable denies that he struck Wilson, but as there are no witnesses to corroborate his contradiction it cannot prevail, though even here the position is not wholly free from difficulty, as experience has taught us that constables in such neighbourhoods cannot rely for support from bystanders. In illustration of this, I would remind the Secretary of State of the case of P.C. Sampson, referred to in my letter of the 23rd May, who was convicted and fined 40s. for assaulting his prisoner with a truncheon. It was only when the report appeared in the Press that Sergeant-Major Wilson and another man who happened to be present, but who did not think that their testimony would be needed at court, came forward to represent the facts in their true light. Another case occurring only last week, in a neighbourhood adjacent to that now in question is described in the enclosed newspaper extract. Here it will be noted that the constable in the performance of duty was violently attacked by two men, and although a large crowd had assembled it was left to a servant girl, whose identity we have had much difficulty in subsequently ascertaining, to attempt to assist the officer, only to be herself assaulted by the prisoner and others in the crowd, which included a number of women. The facts of the case have now been sufficiently referred to, and I deem it therefore necessary only to dwell briefly upon the course of action I venture to recommend for the Secretary of State's acceptance. Great importance necessarily attaches to all cases of this nature, for if the police should at any time be led to believe that they are not fully supported when in the execution of duty they are compelled to have recourse to extreme measures, it is quite certain individual members of the Force will through dread of the consequences, not take the prompt action which is needed to cope with disorder. How much they have to endure at the hands of persons arrested may be inferred from the fact that in 1903 over 2,000 constables were assaulted by prisoners, and in nearly 300 of these cases the injuries caused were so severe as to necessitate the officer being put on the sick list for a week or longer. While urging this consideration I wish it to be understood that unnecessary or undue use of the truncheon is strongly reprobated. When an officer is held culpable of such misuse of his powers he is severely dealt with departmentally. The comparatively few instances in which the courts comment adversely on constables' conduct in this respect is a proof that the disciplinary control exercised is sufficient. Giving all the evidence consideration, the conclusions I arrive at are that the constable was justified in using his truncheon when attacked, that he should not under the circumstances of the case be necessarily held culpable because he struck Wilson a blow on the head, and that he was not justified in striking Wilson while on the ground. The course of action which it seems to me meets requirements would be to pay from the Police Fund the amount of damages assessed and costs, and to place Constable Worsley on his defence with a view to his being departmentally dealt with for using his truncheon unnecessarily.—I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, E. R. HENRY, the Under Secretary of State, etc., etc., etc." As regards the constable the disciplinary act was that he was fined £5 and transferred.

52134. Not exactly £5?—Yes, because he was ordered to pay £25 damages, and I recommended that it should all be paid out of the Police Fund, and that I should be allowed to deal with him by way of disciplinary action.

Sir E. R. Henry.

26 July 1907.

52135. So that the punishment inflicted in that case was partly pecuniary. He had to pay a fine of £5?—Yes.

52136. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Let me understand your view about the use of the truncheon. It is the constable's duty to avoid striking a person on the head, is it not?—I do not see how he can always avoid striking on the head.

52137. Ought he to take care not to do it?—How can you avoid it if a man is running at you?

52138. Then what is the object of the rule? I do not know what the object of the rule is except to impress caution upon them. The rule states how he is to use the truncheon:—"Truncheons are supplied to the police to enable them to protect themselves if violently attacked, and if a constable is likely to be overpowered he may draw his truncheon and use it, taking care to avoid striking anyone on the head"?—Do you mean to say you think it possible always to avoid striking a person on the head?

52139. That is not the question. You may try and not succeed. That is not the point I am putting to you. What I am putting to you is this. The rule states in terms that he is to take care to avoid striking a person on the head. He may nevertheless not succeed. That is another matter?—But he did try because he struck him on the arm. That came out in evidence.

52140. Then, according to you, you would agree it is his duty to avoid striking a person on the head if he can?—Yes, if he can. But he struck him on the arm too, and that came out in evidence. The doctor certified to the injury. The constable's own plea was that he did not want to hit the man on the head at all, and that he tried to hit him elsewhere. My view is that it is almost impossible, under certain circumstances, to avoid hitting a man on the head, because the head is the prominent part that is exposed to the blow.

52141. The rule says: "The arms and legs should be aimed at to disable a prisoner as parts of the frame least likely to suffer from serious injury"?—Do you think it is possible when a man is coming at you trying to kick you in the private parts to stoop down and hit him in the leg?

52142. Do you mind answering my question. Do you think that is a rule that should be obeyed?—As far as possible.

52143. It is a rule that you found in existence when you became Commissioner?—That rule has been in existence for a very long time.

52144. To hit a man a blow on the head with a truncheon would in all probability be more serious than if he were hit on the arms or legs?—I do not know. It might be.

52145. In all probability it would be?—It depends, of course. As I say, you cannot hit a man on the legs when he is running at you. Obviously that is a physical impossibility. Then, again, you cannot always hit a man on the arm because of the crowd round you. That would mean swinging your truncheon out horizontally, and you would hit somebody probably in the face. Therefore you have to hit him with a vertical blow, and when you have to deliver a vertical blow you must either hit him on the shoulder or on the head, and the head presents more surface than the shoulder, so that the chances are more than even that you will hit him on the head. That is the way in which I look at it.

52146. Why this police constable was held liable was because he continued to use the truncheon after he had hit the man on the head?—Yes, that is the point; but he denied that; and under the circumstances it was not possible for him to have any witnesses. All the witnesses were hostile, and he said he did not, but as the court held that he did we marked our sense of his wrong-doing by fining him £5 and transferring him.

52147. What is the effect of transferring him?—The effect of transferring him is that he has to pay the cost of his transfer.

52148. From one division to another?—Yes. He has to move his household and his chattels, he has to take his children away from the schools which they attend, and altogether it is a very severe punishment.

52149. It is looked upon as a very severe punishment?—It is obviously a severe punishment. They say that

Sir E. R. Henry.

26 July 1907.

three moves are as bad as a fire; so I think it is a very severe punishment.

52150. (Mr. Whitmore.) Do you think that the regulation requires amendment?—I think the instruction might be that no greater effort should be made than the emergency requires. They are the words that are used when troops are required to act, and they give a reasonable latitude. It is no good telling a constable to hit a man on the legs when he cannot get at his legs.

52151. Your view is that a constable in order to protect himself from serious injury would be justified in hitting a man on the head?—Certainly. I say that in order to protect himself from grave injury that may incapacitate him for life, if he cannot do it in any other way, he must hit a man on the head. That is what I would do if I were a constable.

52152. (Chairman.) Do you suggest that it would be expedient to amend Rule 230?—Yes, I think it would be better if it were put somewhat in the words that I have suggested—that no more violence must be used than the emergency requires, and leave it then to be decided upon the facts of each particular case whether the violence used was more than necessary.

52153. I think it was you who told us that in issuing these various rules to the police, the framers had regard to the kind of men to whom the instructions were given, and that it was deemed expedient to put them in a concrete, plain, and simple way?—I did not say that, but it was said, I believe.

52154. That is so, is it not?—Yes.

52155. It is no use giving instructions in general terms to a Force of this kind. No more violence should be used than the emergency requires is, I believe, a rule issued to officers or to soldiers, is it not?—Yes.

52156. But the cases are not quite the same?—If you wanted to put it in language that they would understand you would have to say "Never hit a man on the head unless you are absolutely obliged to."

52157. I agree that is much plainer?—With reference to that, those instructions are probably not very much read by the men, and in order to meet that difficulty I have endeavoured to give them instructions in a very abbreviated form. I do not know whether a constable here has a copy of his "Duty Hints." (A copy was handed to the Commissioner.) We are revising all the Orders, and we have been revising them for the last three years. It is a very elaborate process, but this book contains in an abbreviated form the duties of a constable. This book the constables carry in their pockets. (The copy was handed to the Commissioners.)

52158. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That was not in use, I gather, at the time?—No, it was not. We have been revising for three years. We have practically nearly finished the revision now. We have revised the whole of the general orders. These are our general orders, and it is rather a big book, as you see (producing).

52159. I have just turned to "Truncheon," and I do not find "Truncheon"?—No, I have not put "Truncheon" in it on purpose. I have not yet settled that point with the Home Office.

52160. Then this is merely temporary?—I shall have to get the permission of the Home Office to any alteration of the existing instructions.

52161. This is new to me. Do all the regulations contained in the White Book require the assent of the Home Office?—Yes. I issue no instructions that have not the approval of the Home Office, so when I am revising I have to send all my revisions to the Home Office, and then when they are approved they are published, but not till then.

52162. (Mr. Whitmore.) Have they approved this?—Yes, they have approved that.

52163. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Your view is that if a constable is to use his truncheon he should avoid striking a man on the head if he can, but if he cannot he is not to blame?—If the emergency is such.

52164. It may be that in a case of emergency he is bound to hit him on the head?—There may be such an emergency that he is bound to hit him on the head, 52165. But unless there is such an emergency he ought not to do it?—Certainly not, and even if he struck him with unnecessary violence on the arm the circumstances being such as not to require that we should deal with him, of course.

52166. (Chairman.) I do not find anything about arrest or the mode of arrest in this book, nor do I find anything about the charge room?—No. That book is only for constables and section sergeants. That is not for station officers.

52167. "Duty Hints for Constables and Section Sergeants"?—Yes, and not for station officers. We are going to bring another one out for them. That is rather elaborate.

52168. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) There does not seem so very much difference between us as to Rule 230 except, to follow out your point, that you think it would be difficult to hit a man on the leg when he is running?—I agree that no more violence should be used than is necessary.

52169. (Chairman.) You say the rule should be "Do not hit him on the head if you can avoid it"?—That is so. That is with reference to your remark that the rule should be couched in language that a constable could readily understand.

52170. So much for the case of Worsley. I think the best course to pursue is to go on with another of these cases which have occupied our attention, and as to which we wish to ask you a few questions. Have you acquainted yourself with Mrs. Braham's case?—Yes, generally with the facts.

52171. That was the case of a lady who was arrested on the 6th June, 1903, by a police constable. First there seems to have been a suggestion on the part of the constable that she was arrested for soliciting. Then, passing over the facts that were not in dispute, Mrs. Braham was brought into the police station and charged by the constable with being drunk and disorderly. Ultimately, after Mrs. Braham had conferred with the Inspector in charge the charge of disorderly conduct was taken. The next day the case was heard and dismissed by the Magistrate?—Without comment.

52172. The point as to which I want to ask you a question or two is this. There was an inquiry into the matter and reports were called for?—Yes.

52173. Ultimately a punishment was passed upon the constable. This was what was ultimately decided: "Inspector Billson clearly failed to use proper discretion in dealing with the charge, and showed negligence in not attending the Court. He will be strictly cautioned. The police constable may, in the first instance, have been guilty of an error of judgment only, but his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger. He will also be strictly cautioned." What comment have you to make upon the punishment in that case?—I took a very decided view about that case at the time, and I spoke to Major Wodehouse about his remarks there, and what he meant to have written was that it might look as though he sought to make the case look stronger. I took a decided view about that case, and I think that is sufficiently indicated by the apology which was written. The apology which was written to Mr. Braham was this: "Sir,—With reference to your letters of the 9th and 18th instant, I am directed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to acquaint you that he has previously made every possible inquiry, which has, however, failed to throw any fresh light upon the case. It is unfortunate that the Inspector who took the charge, and whose testimony the Magistrate required, should have absented himself on leave instead of being present in Court when the case was called on for hearing. In view of the Magistrate's decision in the case, the Commissioner feels it incumbent on him to express his regret for any inconvenience that may have been caused to you or Mrs. Braham by police action." That very guarded apology was accepted as quite satisfactory by Mr. Braham.

52174. At the time Mr. Braham referred to the apology as "the so-called apology"?—Here is Mr. Braham's acknowledgment of it: "I am in receipt of your lettef of the 23rd inst., and am perfectly willing to accept the apology offered to my wife and myself, and I feel sure I can now safely leave the matter in the Chief Commissioner's hands to deal suitably with the constable at fault." Mr. Braham unreservedly accepted the apology. The view I formed of the case influenced me in the terms of the apology which I gave.

52175. What we were told about it was this: Lord Russell read to him the apology, and then Mr. Braham said, "The so-called apology, but had I read that letter in the light I look upon it now I should have called it an insult instead of an apology"?—That is the letter he wrote me at the time. It is very well four years afterwards to take another view of it.

52176. He suggested that he did not even know that the man was only going to be cautioned?—He said, "I accept the apology, and I leave the matter in the Chief Commissioner's hands."

52177. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It was a very guarded apology?—Very guarded.

52178. When you said, "In view of the Magistrate's decision, in the case the Commissioner feels it incumbent upon him to express his regret," did you form the opinion that the constable was justified in what he had done?—The opinion I formed was that this lady was very excited and eccentric in her demeanour, and that in consequence of her eccentric demeanour men who were passing stopped, that she was annoyed by this, and that she also stopped in front of one of these men, and the constable on the other side of the road misinterpreted her action, and went up to her thinking at first that she had been soliciting. When he got up to her he saw that she was not a person of that class, and he told her to move on. He got into an altercation with her, she would not move on, and he, instead of going about his business elsewhere, arrested her, and brought her to the station.

52179. There was a charge by the policeman?—Yes. He said she smelt of drink. He could not account for her excitability in any other way, I suppose.

52180. He charged her with being drunk?—Yes.

52181. The Inspector said he could not detect any smell of drink?—I am not aware of that.

52182. And he refused to take the charge?—I am not aware that he said he could not detect any smell of drink.

52182*. At Question 9980, at page 237, he was asked: "And you were satisfied she was not drunk? (A.) I considered she was not drunk, but I think she had been drinking. I think so." The question I am referring to is Question 10063—"What opinion did you form exactly as to the woman being drunk? (A.) I could see no evidence at all of drunkenness about the woman. (Q.) Could you smell drink in her breath? (A.) I do not think I was near enough for that. (Q.) What you say in your report is that 'I failed to observe any sign of drunkenness,' and that is what you say now, I understand, that you failed to observe any sign? (A.) Yes. (Q.) You did not smell drink in her breath? (A.) No. (Q.) Or see any other signs? (A.) No."

52183. Where would you get the statement from that you have just made to us?—Which one?

52184. Your view of the facts upon which you formed your opinion?—I got reports from the officers concerned. I also had a report from the Balham Police Station that Mr. Braham had called there, and, hearing that Mrs. Braham was in charge at Clapham, that he said, "She has a beastly temper, and it would not take her long to set about anyone." From that I inferred that she was a lady rather quick with her tongue, and that that led to the altercation with the constable, and that in consequence the constable finally arrested her. They got into an altercation, and one knows what happens on those occasions. She says something, and he says something, he tells her to move on, and she will not move on, then they get excited, and ultimately an arrest is made, because it is held to be disorderly conduct. That is the view I formed of the case.

52185. In that case it did not stop at that. She was arrested and charged with being drunk?—Yes.

52186. In this report, which you saw after the inquiry, it is said "Inspector Billson clearly failed to use proper discretion in dealing with the charge." That means, I suppose, that he ought not to have taken the charge of assaulting the constable?—It means that. It would have been better if he had not.

52187. When the constable brought a charge of drunk and disorderly, and the Inspector failed to notice any sign of drunkenness, he ought not to have taken the charge?—Quite so.

52188. "He will be strictly cautioned. The police-constable may, in the first instance, have been guilty of an error of judgment only, but his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger." As that stands, that is a very serious charge, is it not—Quite.

52189. As that stands, if we are to take that to mean what the words imply, the proper course would have been to dismiss that man, would it not?—Certainly.

52190. I want to be very clear about that. In your view, if a constable seeks to make a case stronger by his testimony, and you come to the conclusion that it is not a question of giving him any small punishment, and that he ought to be dismissed at once, he would be dismissed?—He would be. We have dismissed them for it.

52191. The reason, I understand, you did not act in accordance with what would follow from the words used is that you say they are not happily expressed?—That is so. Besides, Major Wodehouse consulted me about this case at the time, and before he wrote those words, and his view and mine were the same. He meant to write: "It might look as though he had tried to bolster up the case." I have consulted Major Wodehouse about it, and that is quite his view, and that it was my view is, I think, sufficiently proved by the form of apology that was sent.

52192. Did you think he had tried to bolster up the case?—No, I do not think it was a case of bolstering up the case. The woman was exciteable, and the constable said she smelt of drink (I did not know that that was not correct), and because he found her very exciteable, he thought she must be influenced by the effects of drink.

52193. Would it be enough to charge a person with drunkenness because a person was very excited—What constitutes drunkenness is very difficult to say. You have heard a great deal of evidence about that point. I do not know whether you will be able to lay down any standard for our guidance as to what does or does not constitute drunkenness.

52194. (Chairman.) I do not understand your answer to Mr. Isaacs. This sentence: "The police-constable may, in the first instance, have been guilty of an error of judgment only, but his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger," you say, ought to be construed in this way: "The police-constable may, in the first instance, have been guilty of an error of judgment only, but his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger, although I do not think that was his motive"?—That is it, or "might look."

52195. As the words stand, it is obvious that the construction put upon it is that Major Wodehouse thought that the police constable was preferring a charge of drunkenness, in fact, to bolster up the case?—Yes. I have consulted Major Wodehouse about that, and he is clear that that is not what he intended. It was certainly not my view at all, and, as I say, the form of apology shows that. I would have made the most ample apology, and the man would have been turned out of the force, if I had taken that view of it.

52196. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Then did you come to the conclusion that the constable had only been guilty of an error of judgment?—Yes. His error of judgment was that he ought to have turned on his heels when he found the lady was argumentative, and so on.

52197. (Chairman.) The constable made a blunder in thinking that the lady was soliciting, because, really, the men who were talking to her were not talking to her under circumstances which meant anything in the nature of solicitation, but they were talking to her because of her eccentric conduct?—Yes.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I cannot understand this observation at all, if that is the case. Have you got the report before you?

(Chairman.) This was a report drawn up in consequence of an inquiry.

52198. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The Inspector who made the mistake of taking the charge of disorderly conduct after coming to the conclusion that he ought not to take the charge of drunkenness because he saw no evidence of it, was to be strictly cautioned. I do not follow in the light of what you are saying now the relevance of this observation in the report that the constable's "action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger," and you may add, if you like, "Although I do not believe that that was his motive?—That was a remark put in by Major Wodehouse.

52199. What was it he was to be cautioned for?—For lack of discretion.

52200. (Chairman.) He was to be cautioned for an error of judgment?—Yes. He ought to have turned on his heels and not have provoked this lady into getting more excited.

52201. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Was not the charge that was made against the constable as the result of an inquiry a serious charge?—It was a serious charge, unless it could be explained away in any manner.

52202. I think Mr. Bankes told us, in dealing with this matter, when we were discussing the report a little lower down the page: "Major Wodehouse, in his memorandum, gave his reasons for thinking that the charge against the constable was a serious one." It seems to come to this. At the time we were asking the questions a second report was supplied to us by Messrs. Wontner, acting on behalf of the police. This explanation of the report had not been given.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) May I call your attention to this? You will find that on page 219, at Question 9127, I stated that the report had only just been put in my hand, and, therefore, when I spoke later on, it was not from any instructions at all.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It comes to what I was saying. At the time you were construing it as I was construing it.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) Yes, everybody was.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I agree.

52203. (Chairman.) The police-constable, you say was guilty of an error of judgment only. It is quite hypothetical, you see. Are we to understand that you consider that, in fact, he had only been guilty of an error of judgment?—That is the view I formed of it.

52204. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) "But his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger." It certainly looks as if Major Wodehouse thought that was the thing for which he was to be cautioned?—Yes, but he says that what he meant to say was, "It might look as though he sought to strengthen the case." It it quite possible there may be some logical flaw in the wording of many of our orders.

52205. I am not trying to criticise too minutely the wording of it. He says, "The police-constable may, in the first instance, have been guilty of an error of judgment only." For an error of judgment only he would not be punished?—No.

52206. Then he goes on to say, "But his subsequent action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person looks as though he sought to make the case stronger. He will also be strictly cautioned." It is quite plain from that that what he was to be cautioned for was for his action in preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person?—Yes, but are you never to give the benefit of the doubt?

52207. That is a different matter. That is what I was going to suggest to you is probably the explanation. I was going to suggest to you that the possible explanation of it is that, although Major Wodehouse came to that conclusion, or made that statement, he was not satisfied that the constable had preferred a charge that he did not believe in?—He certainly was not satisfied that the man had preferred a charge that he did not believe in.

52208. In this case there was a complaint to you, and you thereupon directed an inquiry to be held?—Yes.

52209. The inquiry was held, and there was a report sent up. You, of course, did not see the witnesses. The evidence was taken by the Inspector at the station, and then a report was made to Major Wodehouse?—Yes.

52210. (Chairman.) Superintendent Doyle appears to have witnessed it, and the view he took appears to be the view that Mr. Isaacs is mentioning to you. I asked Superintendent Doyle at Question 10696 this question: "What Major Wodehouse is really censuring is the discipline, and he says that the police-constable, having been guilty really of an error of judgment, proceeded to strengthen his case by alleging drunkenness? (A.) Yes. (Q.) So as to make the offence not one of disorder in the streets, but one of drunkenness and disorder? (A.) Yes, the two combined. (Q.) The censure on Atkinson was for preferring the charge of drunk and disorderly when he ought to have preferred the charge merely of disorderly? (A.) Yes." You do not agree with that?—My point is that the constable found the lady very excited, and assumed that this excitement was due to drink, and that that constituted drunkenness. That is the view that we took.

52211. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That is an error of judgment only?—Yes.

52212. He says he was seeking to make the case stronger?—Major Wodehouse meant to put down on paper that this might look as though he sought to strengthen his case, to bolster it up, by super-adding a charge of drunkenness. It was quite unnecessary to put that, but he did put it, and now I have given an explanation of it.

52213. The difficulty of it is the only thing for which this man was punished was for preferring a charge of drunkenness against a sober person, which looks as though he sought to make the case stronger?—No, he was punished for an error of judgment—for showing want of discretion.

52214. You agreed just now that you would not punish him for an error of judgment?—The punishment is of a kind. It was a very minor punishment. We do not punish men for practically showing want of discretion.

52215. Want of discretion. Major Wodehouse used the very expression in this report with reference to Inspector Billson—he is to be strictly cautioned for not using proper discretion?—The constable did not use proper discretion, or he would have turned on his heels, and he would not have intervened any further in the case.

52216. Do you remember, when you saw the papers in connection with it, or did you only see Major Wodehouse?—I saw Major Wodehouse; he came into me, and told me all about the case, and the points involved. I must have seen the papers at some time.

52217. Apparently you saw this report?—Yes, I must have seen it. I must have seen it, because I gave the instructions for the draft of that letter upon the report.

52218. When you initialled this report you read it, I suppose?—Yes, and I might have amended it.

52219. When you initialled it did you think it was correct?—No; it did not quite exactly represent my view, and therefore I used my own judgment in drafting the letter of apology. That was the point that I was principally concerned with.

52220. I really do not follow that, because if you had come to the conclusion as to the man's conduct that he had been guilty of an error of judgment, that was no reason why you should not make an apology. If he had been guilty of an error of judgment, there was a reason why there should be an apology?—Yes, but that is not the form of apology I would have made if he had been guilty of misconduct. Because a man shows a want of discretion, that is no reason why I should make a very complete apology.

52221. But the apology has very little reference to the man's conduct, whether it was misconduct or an error of judgment. Why should the apology be any less full?—It makes all the difference in the world. I did not know what the real rights of the case were. I could only form an opinion. If the magistrate, for instance, had given a decision in court in favour of the defendant, I would then have been justified in making an abject apology, and in punishing the man, but I could only proceed upon conjecture, just as you can only proceed upon conjecture in dealing with a case like this. I was not satisfied that the lady had not behaved as the constable stated.

52222. Were you not satisfied that she was not drunk?—Yes, I was satisfied that she was not drunk, certainly, but she was not only arrested for that.

52223. Your view was that no charge ought to have been taken?—My view was that the constable was very indiscreet in bringing her to the station.

52224. And that the Inspector was indiscreet in accepting the charge of disorderly conduct?—Yes.

52225. If he had come to the conclusion that the first part of the charge was not justified?—Yes. It is always better in these cases not to accept any charge. That is the view I take. It does not follow that there was no justification for the second part of the charge.

52226. We can only deal with the facts as we have them before us?—Quite. Another point has been brought out before the Commission—namely, that the constable acted indecently. That is a very material point.

52227. Yes. But the part we are concerned with, and upon which I am questioning you, is what appears to me to be a very serious thing, if the facts were as stated in the report, that all that should have happened was that the man was cautioned. That is the reason I call your attention to it, and you agree with my comment upon it?—Yes.

52228. You yourself would have come to the same conclusion if the report was correct, would you not? I understood you to agree with me before that if the report was correct you would have come to the same conclusion; and then I suggested to you that the man ought to be dismissed?—If it were true that the man had endeavoured to bolster up the case by superadding a charge of drunkenness, when he knew she was not drunk, then he ought to be dismissed the Force.

52229. There was an inquiry into this matter. Did you see the report made by Chief Inspector Taylor?—Yes; I must have seen it.

52230. I want to see what report was before Major Wodehouse on the inquiry. I think it is a report of the 16th June.

(Mr. Eldon Bankes.) It is at Question 10287.

52231. (Chairman.) "I explained to Mr. Braham that it was the Inspector who took the charge that had gone on leave, and not the police-constable preferring the charges, as stated in his letter. Mr. Braham said the only thing he wanted to know was whether it was suggested by police that his wife was soliciting. I told him no, there was no such imputation or suggestion." A report was made to you about this matter on the 16th June. Would you like to refresh your memory as to what took place by seeing the report?—Yes.

52232. You had better have it before you. (The report was handed to the Witness.)

52233. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Apparently it was Chief Inspector Taylor's report upon which the Assistant Commissioner Wodehouse adjudicated. I suppose that is all he had before him. I mean, as to the inquiry, all that he would have would be the report of Chief Inspector Taylor. The object of sending the matter down for inquiry is in order to ascertain the facts and report them to you?—Yes.

52234. The inquiry having been held on the 16th June, a report was sent to you by Chief Inspector Taylor?—Yes.

52235. That is a document, I suppose, upon which Major Wodehouse adjudicated?—Yes. That includes, of course, Mrs. Braham's statement, and so on.

52236. The evidence given?—Yes.

52237. I want to call your attention to this passage. Inspector Billson had dealt with the charge of drunkenness, and he said that she was not drunk, and that he should not entertain that part of the charge. Chief Inspector Taylor's report says:—"As to the charge itself" (that is, disorderly conduct), there is no corroboration; it is the word of Mrs. Braham against the police-constable. The man cannot be found and his version taken of what occurred." What I am suggesting to you is that the only possible explanation of this matter, it appears to me, reading the report, is that, in the absence of corroboration, Major Wodehouse did not like to condemn the man?—When you say "did not like to condemn the man," you mean there was no evidence upon which he could condemn the man. There was the statement of one person against the statement of the other.

52238. There was no satisfactory evidence?—There was no satisfactory evidence.

52239. There was no sort of evidence which seems to have brought conviction to his mind?—Quite.

52240. The wording is very unfortunate. You say Major Wodehouse explained this to you at the time?—I spoke to him about it the other day, and he said he was quite clear in his own mind that that is what he intended to put down.

52241. Did you get this explanation from him only the other day?—Yes. The impression he conveyed to me at the time when he dealt with the case was that that was the view he took of it. Of course, his wording, I admit, is unfortunate, because it did not give expression to his view.

52242. If I understand correctly what you have told us, it amounts to this: You did not give the proper meaning to the words because you had Major Wodehouse's explanation to you as a fact?—Yes.

52243. You did not pay much attention to the word ing of the report?—Quite—to the wording of those re marks.

52244. Yes. You are quite clear about this, that unless you had had some sort of explanation of that character from Major Wodehouse, you would have dealt much more severely with the constable?—If I had formed the opinion that the constable intended to bolster up the case by superadding a charge of drunkenness when he had no reason to think the woman was drunk, he would have been turned out of the service. There are two other points in the case that I think I ought to say something about. One is before the Commission. Mr. Braham said that the magistrate, in discharging the case, said, "Not a word against her." I think that that is incorrect. I have looked at the reports in the newspapers at the time, and they do not say that. I have also looked at the report of the Inspector of the A Division, who was on duty at the Westminster Police Court, and who would report any comments or remarks made by the magistrate, and he did not so report. The Inspector is not in any way connected with the W Division, he would have no interest in screening a constable, and he would know, if he failed to report a remark like that, which would be likely to appear in the papers, he would be necessarily called to account. I am perfectly satisfied, from a consideration of these points, that that remark was never made, and that Mr. Braham was mistaken in saying it was. The clerk of the court was also called here, and he said he had no recollection of it. What the magistrate said was "Discharged."

52245. That is the opinion you have formed upon what you have read?—Exactly.

52246. Whether it was said or not is a matter for us?—I want to point out that it does not appear in any of the newspaper reports of the case, and it was not reported to me by the Inspector who was on duty in the court, and whose duty it would have been to report a remark like that. He was an Inspector from another Division.

52247. (Chairman.) My recollection is that it is not admitted by any constable?—No, it is not.

52248. (Mr. Dickinson.) I should like to ask you one or two questions with regard to these inquiries, because it arises on this case and on others too. In this particular case you, I suppose, or some one, instructed Chief Inspector Taylor to make his inquiry?—Yes, he was directed to make an inquiry.

52249. From what he told us himself his view of his duty was merely to hear what either side said, to put it down, and report it to you.

52250. Is that all that you expect him to do and intend him to do?—What I expect him to do when he makes an inquiry is to form an opinion himself.

52251. This is what Chief Inspector Taylor told us at Question 10374: "If I understand the procedure you were not to adjudicate or pronounce a decision upon these papers, but to send them on to your superior. (A.) That is right—to get the facts." Then at Question 10377 the question is: "You send it on exactly as it is sent in. (A.) Yes. (Q.) You would not ask any questions to try and see how near you could get them together, or where the truth was. (A.) It is their version of what transpired. I do not think it would be right on my part to question them on that. (Q.) I understand you were holding this inquiry, not in order to pronounce a decision, but in order to get all the facts for your superiors." His answer to that was "Yes." I think I am correct in saying his view with regard to an inquiry was that all he had to do was to forward on to somebody else what was said on both sides?—When he forwarded them on he would be sent for to Scotland Yard, and the Assistant Commissioner would interrogate him and speak to him, and he would say, "What view do you take of this case?"

52252. At Question 10477 he is asked this question: "But both sides of the case would be represented if both sides sent their statements in to the Commissioner. You have something more to do than merely take the statements, have you not?" His answer was, "Of course you express an opinion. (Q.) That is the first thing I have been seeking to get from you. You express an opinion. Your opinion is expressed to the Commissioner as the result of the inquiry which has been conducted before you. (A.) Yes." That is rather a contradiction of what he said before. At any rate, in this particular case, with the one exception of an opinion as regards Inspector Billson's conduct, he did not express any opinion as regards Atkinson's conduct. I suppose he entertained the same doubt about it that others did?—He could not come to any decided opinion.

52253. He left it to his superior officers to come to a decision or not?—Yes.

52254. That is what I rather want to get at with regard to these inquiries. Major Wodehouse and you came to a decision, whatever decision you did come to, upon a report which had been suggested to you by Inspector Taylor?—Yes.

52255. And by the other officer?—Yes.

52256. In these inquiries, at what stage do you contemplate any cross-examination or real test of the evidence?—That is done by the officer who makes the inquiry. The proper way of making an inquiry would be for him to put questions to the witness; he reproduces the whole of it in a narrative form, and that ought to be upon the result of the questions put. He does not put the questions and then the answers, but he reduces the whole thing to narrative form.

52257. Is it your view that a man in the position of Chief Inspector Taylor is the best person to conduct such an inquiry as that?—I should think he would be quite competent to conduct such an inquiry as that.

52258. He is merely a policeman who has risen from the ranks?—He has risen to the rank of Acting Superintendent. I think if a man rises to the position of Superintendent he is quite qualified to make an inquiry.

52259. Is it not part of the duty of the Assistant Commissioner to carry out these inquiries?—No. He cannot make all the inquiries. He makes some. Occasionally the inquiry is held at Scotland Yard, but not very often. In the case of McCarthy the inquiry was held at Scotland Yard, but, as a rule, it is held locally for convenience, because it would be dragging a great number of police officers and perhaps private persons up to Scotland Yard, which would be inconvenient. The inquiry is held on the spot. The Assistant Commissioner could not go out to make all these inquiries. There are only three Assistant Commissioners. The time of one is entirely taking up in dealing with crime, and he has not got any spare time to go out and make inquiries of this sort.

52260. This was an inquiry which I should have thought was of a very serious nature, because it was an inquiry into a complaint by an innocent and respectable woman of absolute misbehaviour on the part of a policeman?—Yes.

52261. Is not that an inquiry that ought to deserve investigation by a high official?—The Superintendent is a high official. A Superintendent is perhaps in command of a thousand men, he has very responsible duties, and he is quite a competent person to make an inquiry of that sort. He does not come from the class that his superior officers come from; but that is not a disability, or ought not to be. He, as a Superintendent of the Metropolitan Force Division, has a much more important charge than the Chief Constable of many towns. You would be quite satisfied with a Chief Constable of a town making an inquiry, and although the Superintendent comes from a different class of society I do not consider that a disqualification at all.

52262. I was not suggesting anything about the class he comes from, but it appears to me that he would have a very different experience in investigating a case such as this was to that of a person who was better qualified by training to conduct the inquiries?—What better qualifications can you have than the experience of a Superintendent?

52263. In order to arrive at a conclusion?—Yes, in order to arrive at a conclusion upon evidence. That is part of his life's work. He has always got to do it.

52264. Then I understand from you that, rightly or wrongly, you think that these inquiries ought to be conducted, and are properly conducted of course, by the officials in the Police Force?—I think a Superintendent of Police is perfectly competent to conduct such an inquiry.

52265. Then this Superintendent ought to come to a decision himself on the case ,and that decision you would expect to be carried out?—Not exactly carried out. If it did not commend itself to us we would not have carried it out. What might happen, and what very often happens, is that the matter would be referred back to him to take further evidence upon a particular point. We might say, "We are not quite satisfied about this," or "We are not quite satisfied about the other." That might very well happen. We do not necessarily accept his finding.

52266. How many inquiries such as these take place during the year?—Do you mean disciplinary inquiries?

52267. Yes, inquiries arising from the complaints of the public about misbehaviour on the part of the police. Are they numerous?—I cannot say whether they are upon the complaints of private individuals or upon the complaints of superior police officers, but we have about 1,800 disciplinary inquiries every year.

52268. Arising from complaints by the public?—No, I will not say that.

52269. That is what I want to get at?—I cannot discriminate, but there about 1,800 disciplinary inquiries a year altogether.

52270. I suppose all the disciplinary inquiries are conducted by the subordinate officials—that is to say, the Superintendents, and then they are reported to you?—Major Wodehouse inquires into about 220 a year, the Chief Constables inquire into about 220 or 230 a year, and the Superintendents inquire into about 1,300 a year. That is about it, roughly 52271. I suppose those that Major Wodehouse inquires into are the most important in your view?—Yes, they are the most important. Of course, when it is the evidence of a private person, it has to be done by some officer on the spot, because you cannot get private persons to come into Scotland Yard. Very often an officer who makes an inquiry has to go to the residences of private persons, and he has to wait till it is convenient for them to make a statement. They are busy people, they have their work to do, and the officer has to wait until a person comes back from work, and he has to get the statement as best he can. It is quite clear that the Assistant Commissioner could not do that at all.

52272. (Mr. Whitmore.) Upon what occasions does Major Wodehouse hold an inquiry?—Whenever it affects a uniformed constable, Major Wodehouse deals with it. If it affects a criminal investigation officer Sir Melville Leslie Macnaghten would deal with it, and if it affects a public carriage officer Sir Alexander Bruce would deal with it.

52273. Is Sir Alexander Bruce a barrister?—Sir Alexander Bruce is a barrister.

52274. Do you think it might be advisable that the conduct of police inquiries should be undertaken by a barrister, or by a person who has had a legal training?—As a rule it does not require any great legal knowledge to deal with these matters. The difficulty is to try and reconcile apparently contradictory statements. There is such a very large number of inquiries that nobody could manage to deal with them all, I think.

52275. Assuming that it is necessary that inquiries should be held, as they are now, by different Commissioners, might it not be better that they should be supervised by someone who is a legal Commissioner?—You would have to alter the whole system.

(Chairman.) A legal Commissioner, meaning a man trained by practice, who would exercise some judgment with regard to a case such as that of Mrs. Braham. You admit yourself it is very ambiguously worded, and we have some difficulty ourselves in finding out what the meaning of it is.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It is wrongly worded.

(Chairman.) Yes; I put that as mildly as I can.

52276. (Mr. Whitmore.) I am only suggesting that, if these police inquiries are conducted as they are now, might it not be better that they should be conducted by some man who has had a legal training?—Of course, you are forming an opinion about this system from isolated cases. There are hundreds and hundreds of these cases dealt with. This was a case in which the Assistant Commissioner's wording was faulty. That is what it comes to. I think if you had the best-trained lawyer in the world, occasionally he would trip in dealing with such a vast number of cases. Even if you had had a man who had a legal training, it is not certain that he would not trip sometimes in his wording, because it might be that he would be very much pressed for time. Certainly it would be a good thing if, after one wrote something, one put it on one side and read it a second time before one signed it. It would be much safer.

52277. Please do not think I am expressing an opinion of my own?—Quite.

52278. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Following out what Mr. Whitmore was suggesting, you have no means, I suppose, of ascertaining the truth of the statements when you have got contradictory evidence?—No; I do not know that I have.

52279. I will tell you why I ask you that question. In the particular case I follow what your explanation of it is. Chief Inspector Taylor sends up a report which tells you that he has got one witness one way and one witness the other, and that there is no corroboration. There, apparently, it is left?—Yes.

52280. Then Major Wodehouse or yourself have nothing else before you, and upon that you adjudicate. Are no means taken to ascertain the facts when witnesses are in dead conflict like that?—I do not know how it could be dealt with. I think our inquiries are very much fuller than the inquiries in most courts. You will see that is so if you look at the amount of matter that is written and the time that is taken over it, and if you look at the detail in which Mrs. Braham's statement was taken.

52281. (Chairman.) You are not bound by the rules of evidence?—We are not confined by the rules of evidence.

52282. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) In this case it must not be assumed that there was anything like the inquiry that takes place in open court, because we know the questions that were put. We have before us the only questions that were put, and we also know that the police-constable was not allowed to put questions except through the acting Superintendent?—Yes. Sir E. R. Henry. 25 July 1907.

52283. And as we know from the evidence we have heard, it was not anything like what we should call a trial; and it seems also that no judgment was pronounced because the result sent to you is simply to tell you there is a witness either way, and you have no real guidance?

(Chairman.) The inquiry before Chief Inspector Taylor was much more than the evidence before the magistrate.

52284. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Yes. I am only referring to the inquiry before Chief Inspector Taylor when the charge was formulated and it went before him?—All I said was that probably more evidence was taken before us than is taken before magistrates.

52285. I see what you mean?—And you will remember that, as regards some of these inquiries, there are specific directions from the Secretary of State as to what we are to do under certain circumstances.

52286. It does leave it in an unsatisfactory position, does it not, when you have a complaint by a member of the public such as there was in this case of Braham against the police, and the only corroboration which is said to exist cannot be found? It is then a very unsatisfactory position for you to have to adjudicate upon it?—But is there any solution of that difficulty?

52287. There may be. I am asking you whether you can find one?—No, I cannot.

42288. We may have to do it, and it was bearing that in mind I put the questions to you. I see the difficulty you were in, and it is for that reason I called your attention to the evidence which Chief Inspector Taylor had before him, and which you had not. You had no witnesses on either side, there was no report to you as to which was to be believed, and there was no corroboration?—No. Of course, there is a class of cases where we are told not to make inquiry. You heard the evidence of Mr. Troup as to that. There is a direction by the Secretary of State as to the circumstances under which we are not to make inquiry.

52289. Not in a case of this character?—Not in a case of this character.

SIXTY-THIRD DAY.

Wednesday, 31*st July* 1907.

PRESENT:

Sir DAVID BRYNMOR JONES, K.C., M.P. (Chairman).
RUFUS DANIEL ISAACS, Esq., K.C., M.P.
CHARLES ALGERNON WHITMORE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law).
J. W. ST. LAWRANCE LESLIE, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law), (Secretary).
J. F. WALEY, Esq. (Barrister-at-Law) (Assistant Secretary).

Sir EDWARD RICHARD HENRY, recalled.

52290. (Chairman.) I think we had been asking you, Sir Edward, some questions about the case of Mrs. Braham when we adjourned last time. I think I have asked all the questions I wish to put to you about that case. I will now direct your attention, please, to a complaint made by Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette. The first letter written by Dr. Gerothwohl to the Home Office is dated the 12th April, 1906. You have, I think, copies of the other letters of Dr. Gerothwohl?—I have seen them, yes.

52291. What was the first letter that you got from the Home Office?—If you will permit me, I will make a statement as to the information that was before me, and the action I took upon that case.

52292. If you please?—When the newspaper accounts of the trial of the case against Messrs. Gerothwohl, Lavalette, and Timmings came before me on the 12th April, 1906, reports were at once called for from the police officers who had a knowledge of the circumstances. These reports were made on the 13th April (Good Friday), but were not seen by me until my return to town on Wednesday, the 18th April. In the meantime Dr. Gerothwohl had, on the 11th instant, a little before midnight, called at New Scotland Yard expecting to see me, but I was at home in bed, and he was told so. He left a note saying he would like to see me the next day or the day following; but, as I have already explained to the Commissioners, I did not receive his note nor did I know of his call until about six weeks afterwards (19th May), when he complained to the Home Office that I had not given him an interview. On Sir E. R. Henry. 31 July 1907.

Sir E. R. Henry.

31 July 1907.

the 12th April he wrote to the Home Office asserting that, as the Magistrate had accepted his defence, this was tantamount to a finding of perjury and conspiracy on the part of the police. From the 14th April the case began to be discussed in the Press, and about the 19th April the Home Office referred to me Dr. Gerothwohl's several letters. I discussed the case at the Home Office, and also with the Assistant-Commissioner, and we looked at it from all possible aspects. I first considered whether, assuming good faith on both sides, the contradictory statements of Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette on the one side and of the witnesses for the prosecution on the other could by any possibility be reconciled. Defendants' counsel and Dr. Gerothwohl himself before the Magistrate attributed their arrest to a mistake on the part of the police officers, and this admission is dwelt on by the Magistrate in his order discharging the defendants. Butih seemed to me impossible to accept the version put forward by the defendants as to the circumstances of their arrest, and at the same time say that there could have been a bona-fide mistake. As the defendants had admitted that there had been a bona-fide mistake, it seemed to me that they made impossible the acceptance of their version of what had actually happened. I then had to consider whether their version was a probable one in view of my knowledge of the duties of the police on such an occasion. Their account was that an ostler named Timmings, who was not drunk and was not disorderly, was improperly arrested by P.C. Isaacson and conveyed across the road to Swallow Street, where P.C. Divers met them, and took Timmings' other arm, P.C. Wallington following. I found it difficult to understand why, when there were so many disorderly persons by St. James's Church, any of whom might properly have been arrested, two experienced and staunch constables like Isaacson (who had been seven times rewarded for bravery in stopping runaway horses, and once for saving life from fire) and Wallington (who has been similarly rewarded on four occasions) should have selected an unoffending weakling like Timmings, and that both should have deemed it necessary to proceed with him to the station, though on the way they were reinforced by a third constable (Divers), all this time there being disorder and tumult which required their presence in Piccadilly. I felt if these constables had been seen in Swallow Street off their beats, and away from the scene of disorder close by, not being compelled to absent themselves by having charge of a prisoner, that the Superintendent or Chief or Sub-divisional or other patrolling Inspector who might meet them would have at once called them to account and reported them, and that in fact they could not have justified their presence there. A constable's beat, whether patrol or ordinary, is strictly defined and well known, and he is not at liberty to wander outside that beat except upon a specific call to do so. Constables are continually being dealt with and punished for being off their beats without justifiable cause, sometimes even when they are no further off than being on the wrong side of the road. I also considered that a motive for the police action alleged was wanting, for the defendants had given no intimation to anyone of their intention to tender evidence on behalf of Timmings, and therefore the police could not have known of it; moreover, Timmings did not complain or deny the charge made against him. The conclusion, therefore, I was forced to upon the probabilities was that the version given by the defendants could not be accepted. I may add that as soon as the Magistrate had discharged the case the defendants' attitude at once changed, and Dr. Gerothwohl wrote to the Home Office accusing the police of conspiracy and perjury, and demanding that they should be dismissed and prosecuted. Nothing fresh had transpired, and to me this change of attitude was not comprehensible; but, at any rate, it was quite clear that, as they demanded the criminal prosecution of the constables, I might with propriety, under the instructions given many years ago to the Commissioner by the Secretary of State, and quoted by Mr. Troup in his evidence, have altogether refrained from making any further inquiry in view of the possibility of proceedings in court being taken against the officers. I thought it better, however, to do what was in my power to clear up doubt in this case, and that is why I decided upon inquiry. But to make inquiry profitable it was necessary to realise clearly the points to which it must be limited. I have referred to the reasons which led me to hold that Messrs. Gerothwohl and Lavalette's account was unsatisfactory. I then considered the account given by the police. There was no doubt as to the disorder and as to the necessity for police intervention, but it seemed desirable to ascertain why three men not posted to Piccadilly had come there, and this obviously was a point to be cleared up. The defendants have said that they had seen the police charging the crowd by St. James's Church, and making arrests; this also was susceptible of verification or contradiction. The account given by the constables was that they came from different points on hearing the uproar. Isaacson said he arrested Timmings, and then and there made him over to P.C. Divers, who had come up, so as to enable him (Isaacson) to make another arrest—that of Lavalette. By closely interrogating these officers out of hearing of each other their veracity could well be tested, and this was a point not to be lost sight of. Lastly, I was anxious to know how the arrests had been actually made, as it might be that the defendants were arrested without realising it, they, in my view—for I accepted the evidence on this head of our medical expert—having been in a state of great excitement from such drink as they had partaken of. A specific charge was made that P.C. Isaacson, though Dr. Gerothwohl was not his prisoner, had taken his walking-stick and broken it across his knee. The police version was that P.C. Wallington, in wresting it from Dr. Gerothwohl, who refused to give it up, had broken it. This was a point of some importance, for if Dr. Gerothwohl's account was correct it would represent great laxity of control in the charge-room, such laxity as in my view was almost inconceivable. I therefore arranged with the Assistant-Commissioner that he should send for all the officers concerned, and very closely interrogate them upon these several points. He did so, and the minutes of his inquiry are with the Commission. The conclusion he arrived at was that the account given by the police, so far as he could test it, appeared to be reliable. This is the view I took, and the view I reported to the Home Office.

52293. Where does he report that?—He did not report it to me. Having taken the statements of all those officers, he came with those statements to me; we went through them, and that was the view we took.

52294. We have the minutes of the inquiry, but we have no document in which Major Wodehouse expresses any opinion of his own?—No, he did not put it down in writing; he brought it to me. On that report I wrote to the Home Office. This is the view I took and the view I reported to the Home Office, and it is the view that appears to have been held by the Magistrate who heard the case.

52295. Your letter to the Home Office is dated 25th April, 1906. It is at page 13 of the Appendix, "Report of the Commissioner of Police to the Home Office, 25th April, 1906"?—Yes.

52296. Accompanying that letter you sent to the Secretary of State the police reports dated 13th April, 1906?—Yes.

52297. I do not find that you refer there to the inquiry before Major Wodehouse at all?—No.

52298. That inquiry before Major Wodehouse was, in fact, held on the very day on which your letter is dated?—Yes, but, as a rule, we do not send our disciplinary proceedings to the Home Office at all. Major Wodehouse's inquiry was held by way of question and answer. It was not a question of reports.

52299. That was an inquiry?—Yes, that was an inquiry.

52300. The mere calling for reports is hardly an inquiry?—No, but it is only reasonable, I think, in the first instance, where persons are incriminated, to give them an opportunity of saying their own say.

52301. I am asking these questions because on the 28th April Sir Mackenzie Dalzell Chalmers writes on behalf of the Home Secretary to say: "I am directed by the Secretary of State to say that he has caused careful inquiry to be made in the matter of your letters of the 12th and 22nd inst. with regard to the conduct of certain Metropolitan Police officers on the night of the 7th-8th inst., and while he fully accepts the decision of the Magistrate dismissing the charge of drunkenness, and is glad to believe that the police officers who were maintaining order in Piccadilly in circumstances of great difficulty, were mistaken in this point, he finds himself unable to take action of the kind suggested in your letter." You see there the Home Office suggests that he, the Secretary of State, is unable to take action. As a matter of fact he made no inquiry himself?—No.

52302. He asked you to make an inquiry?—Yes.

52303. It appears then that all the Home Office had before it on the 28th April was your letter of the 25th April, and the reports of the police officers made on the 8th and 13th April?—And I had seen all the statements taken by Major Wodehouse to the best of my recollection.

52304. Your report is dated 25th April, and Major Wodehouse's inquiry was held on the very same day?—Quite so.

52305. Then you wrote that letter after you had heard from Major Wodehouse the result of the inquiry?—Yes, to the best of my recollection I certainly did.

52306. Had you the questions and answers before you?—He brought me the papers and a note. I cannot exactly remember the details of it, but I know that he came and told me everything that he had done, and those very questions were put under my direction. I told him the points to go into.

52307. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Apparently, Sir Edward, when you came to examine into this you formed the conclusion that you could not accept the version put forward by the defendants?—Yes. I could not reconcile their account of what had happened with there being a bona-fide mistake. That was my difficulty. I formed my own view as to what probably had happened, but I could not reconcile it with their account.

52308. Will you give us the benefit of the opinion you formed at the time as to what had happened?—My view was that they were arrested without realising it. I assume that gentlemen in their position would not deliberately say that which they knew to be false, and I think they were arrested without realising it. I have thought it over a good deal since, and that is the only way I can see out of it, without assuming a very great deal of bad faith. From my knowledge of the way in which police work is done I could not believe for a moment that three constables could have gone in charge of the man Timmings on a night like that, when they were posted off to different points to quell disorder. When the disorder was going on I could not believe that three men would have loafed up with a man like that, knowing that they would be at once called to account by anybody who met them. It is inconceivable to police officers that that should have happened. They are both particularly staunch and good constables, courageous men, and they would not shirk a rough and tumble. The idea of three of them marching off in charge of a man that any one of the three could have taken quite easily by himself is to me quite inconceivable.

52309. Therefore your view is that if there were three constables there were three arrests?—Yes.

52310. You have read the evidence of the constables, of course?—Yes, I have read it very recently.

52311. Could they be arrested without knowing it?—That is another thing.

52312. I only want to get the benefit of your view, because you have experience?—I can only say why I think it conceivable. I think they were very greatly excited.

52313. When you say you assume they were very greatly excited, I rather gather from your statement that the excitement, in your view, was due to their having taken some drink, though you do not pretend that they were drunk?—Taken some drink—yes. I was dependent entirely upon the opinion of our expert.

52314. That view you formed from the opinion of the medical expert?—Yes.

52315. The view which you have expressed is based, of course, on the reports which were presented to you at the time?—Yes.

52316. The reports of the police constables with all the other documents we now have?—I had no other knowledge, of course.

52317. You had not had the witnesses before you to be examined or cross-examined?—No.

52318. Have you had any other complaints of the conduct of constables or of the Inspector at Vine Street during the last two years?—Yes.

52319. I am putting the question generally with reference to what takes place at the station. Have you had complaints of that?—Yes, I have.

52320. Are they more numerous than at other stations?—Yes; I should think they have been. They have, of course, a good deal more work to do.

52321. You are speaking, I suppose, of the last three years, are you?—I am speaking of the time since I have been Commissioner.

52322. Have you had complaints from persons who alleged that on going to the station to make complaint they have been put into the dock?—Yes, I have.

52323. Can you tell me how many complaints you have had since you have been Commissioner?—There may have been complaints made that I may not have heard of, but I only remember one distinctly. There was the case, of course, that you had before you of a motor-car driver, I think. That one I did not know about.

52324. You mean some other case?—Yes, I mean some other case.

52325. Do you remember what happened in that case?—Yes.

52326. Can you tell me what the nature of the complaint was?—The nature of the complaint was that the gentleman was going to the station to give evidence on behalf of the police, and he was not allowed entry. There was an altercation, and he was brought in and charged with obstruction.

52327. Can you tell me the date of that?—I cannot tell you the date of that. I know the man's name, but I do not think I ought to tell it to you.

52328. Do you mean the complainant's name?—Yes. He would not like it, but I will give it to you if you like.

52329. What I want you to fix is about the period, as far as you can?—It was about the same time as this case. It was the same time.

52330. Were any of the constables whose names have been mentioned, and who have been called before us on this inquiry of Dr. Gerothwohl and Mr. Lavalette, brought into it?—I think one man was a man called Wellbelove.

52331. An Inspector?—I do not know that the Inspector was brought into it.

52332. What was done with regard to that complaint? First of all, what happened to the charge preferred against him of obstruction?—I think the charge was dismissed, and then the constable was afterwards dealt with. I can get the papers.

52333. Then he was dealt with?—Yes.

52334. The constable who had charged him?—Yes.

52335. The constable would not be one of those who came before us?—I think he came before you, but I am not sure.

52336. Do you mean Wellbelove?—Yes.

52337. (Chairman.) Is the case mentioned in the Returns?—I am not sure that the Returns go up as far as that. These Returns are only for 1903, 1904, and 1905.

52338. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) What was the result—how was the constable dealt with?—He was punished. He was fined and transferred at his own expense, I think. That was the punishment, I think.

52339. Was there an inquiry into his conduct?—Yes.

52340. Do you remember by whom?—Yes, by the Assistant Commissioner.

52341. Major Wodehouse?—Yes.

52342. Did he find that the complaint was justified?—No; he found it was not justified.

52343. I mean the complaint the person had made to you against the police—he found that that was justified?—He found that that was justified. The constable alleged that there was a crowd, that he asked this gentleman to move on, and that the gentleman did not move on. The constable said he had not an altercation with him, and Major Wodehouse held that the constable was quite unjustified in his act, and he dealt with him.

52344. He was quite unjustified in having preferred a charge of obstruction against him?—He was.

52345. That, as I understand it, amounts to this, that there had been some question between this gentleman and the police constable, and the police constable had charged him with obstructing the police. The charge had been accepted by the Inspector. Then the gentleman made a complaint to you of the policeman having made this charge against him without justification. The matter was inquired into by Major Wodehouse, who came to the conclusion that this charge was proved against the constable, and the result was the constable was transferred at his own expense to another division?—Yes.

Sir E. R. Henry.

31 July 1907.

52346. Will you give us the name of the gentleman, without mentioning it, so that we may have some identification of it?—Yes.

52347. I think we might deal with it in this way. We might call it the "Wellbelove Case." Perhaps you do not mind letting us see the name?—(The Witness wrote down the name of the gentleman referred to, which was handed to the Commissioner.)

52348. There are, of course, documents in that case which are with you?—Yes.

52349. That seems to have been a very serious charge against the police?—Yes, of course it was serious. The constable ought not to have acted as he did. He said the gentleman was obstructing him, and the Magistrate who dealt with the case held that he was not, and that it did not amount to obstruction.

52350. (Mr. Whitmore.) Was that on a night on which there was disorder?—Yes, it was.

52351. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) On what night?—On the Boat-Race night.

52352. On the same night?—Yes.

52353. (Chairman.) There was no charge of drunkenness?—There was no charge of drunkenness.

52354. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) He was simply charged with obstructing the police and having an altercation?—Yes.

52355. From what you have told us that amounted to this, that the policeman had made a mistake in charging him. He ought not to have done it?—Certainly not. I think on occasions like that a good many irregular things are done.

52356. Yes, but it was not a case of mistaken identity, or anything of that kind?—It was not a case of mistaken identity, but it was a case of mistaken circumstances, because the constable certainly would have admitted him if he had known he was a witness for the prosecution. He did not realise that much.

52357. This gentleman was not arrested in the street, was he?—Just outside the station.

52358. But he had come to the station to make a complaint?—He had come not to make a complaint, but to tender his evidence on behalf of a private person who had been assaulted, I believe.

52359. Then he arrived at Vine Street Police Station for the purpose of tendering his evidence?—Yes. He tried to get in, I suppose he did not explain what his object was, and the constable told him to move on, but he did not, so the constable arrested him and brought him in and charged him. He said, "You are obstructing me in the execution of my duty."

52360. Was it made clear in the examination of the witnesses by Major Wodehouse that the constable did not know what he had come for?—I cannot speak with any certainty from memory, but I can get the proceedings for you.

52361. I shall be glad if you will let us have them, because it appears to me that that is a very important element in it?—Yes. I will get the proceedings for you.

52362. (Chairman.) You have a shorthand note of the proceedings?—I think so. We are sure to have the proceedings.

52363. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Of course if the policeman did know that the gentleman had come there to tender himself as a witness, and then the constable had preferred a charge of obstruction before the Inspector based upon what you have told us, that would have been a most improper act?—Of course; but he could not have done that, because it would have come out at once when he was brought into the charge room.

52364. That he came there to give evidence?—The man arrested would have said, "I came to tender myself as a witness, and this man has brought me in on a charge of obstruction."

52365. I suppose that is what did take place?—That ultimately is what did take place, but the constable never realised that. He certainly would not have arrested the man if he had realised that.

52366. What did he think the gentleman came to the station at all for?—He thought the man was fussing and interfering, I suppose, and he said, "Move on, I have to keep order here," and the gentleman refused to move on. Of course the constable was quite wrong. There is no way out of it. There it is. If, however, you want to see the exact facts you will get them better from the proceedings. It is no good my trusting to my memory.

52367. I do attach importance to it?—I will get the proceedings certainly.

52368. (Mr. R. D. Muir.) They have been sent for.

52369. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Is there no other complaint that you recollect?—No If you will tell me the name it may recall it to my memory, but I cannot remember that there is one.

52370. I am seeking information from you. You could ascertain for us or somebody in your office would be able to ascertain for us whether there were any further complaints during 1906?—Certainly.

52371. I think we have a return for 1905?—Yes. Here is another name. I do not remember that case myself. (The Witness wrote down a gentleman's name, which was handed to the Commissioner.) Perhaps I might get the papers in that case for you.

52372. I do not myself think that that would assist us very much, because there there was a complaint made and you found upon inquiry that the constable had behaved properly?—I do not remember that case at all.

52373. It appears to be so, and no further complaint appears to have been made by the gentleman charged?—I do not remember that case at all, but if you would like the papers we can get those too. The complaint was made, I believe, after the case was dealt with.

52374. That was a complaint on the same night?—Yes.

52375. Was this person convicted?—I do not know anything about the case.

52376. I assume from the note that he was convicted, and that he made a complaint afterwards. Then, Sir Edward, you will let us have the returns for 1906?—Yes, certainly.

52377. I suppose on nights like the Boat Race night you get more arrests than on an ordinary night?—On one occasion, I believe, they had 90 charges at Vine Street.

52378. And I suppose you would probably get more complaints?—Yes, I suppose there would be. Of course, the number of complaints would be in proportion to the number of arrests, or they would bear some ratio to it.

52379. And also, I suppose, when there is considerable excitement in the streets, a constable has to act promptly?—Yes.

52380. It is quite possible that he has then to deal with cases which under ordinary circumstances he would not take notice of?—They could not do their duty at all unless you made reasonable allowances.

52381. You have told us that Dr. Gerothwohl called on you on the night of the 11th when you were away?—I was away from the office; I was in bed at my home.

52382. I meant you were away from the office, and not that you were away in the country?—Quite.

52383. Dr. Gerothwohl wrote to you after that?—No, he wrote at the same time. When he came he came a little before midnight, and he said he wanted to see the Commissioner. The Inspector said, "The Commissioner is at home, probably in bed, sir; but if it is very urgent I will ring him up." I am very glad he did not. Then Dr. Gerothwohl said he would write a note; so he got a piece of paper, and he presented his compliments to the Commissioner and said he would like to see him the next day, or, if that was not convenient, the day after would be convenient to Dr. Gerothwohl. He left the note, which was sent up to me, and, as I have explained to the Commission, I never heard of it until he complained to the Home Office five weeks afterwards that I had not given him an interview.

52384. From that time was no further request made to you?—I got no letter from Dr. Gerothwohl.

52385. You got no letter from Dr. Gerothwohl asking for an appointment?—No, I have no recollection that I got any letter at all from him, or any complaint from him direct.

52386. Suppose on a night like Boat Race night a person is arrested, and the Inspector who is taking the charge comes to the conclusion that a mistake has been made, what happens then in the ordinary course?—It is entered in the Refused Charge Book, and the Chief Constable, the Assistant Commissioner, or myself, or anybody who goes round, looks at the Refused Charge Book and asks for an explanation—"Why was this charge refused? Was the constable in the wrong?" and so on, and he is dealt with accordingly. There is no automatic way of bringing refused charges to my notice. It is obvious that that is impossible, because there are too many of them. In the course of the year there would be perhaps 6,000 or 7,000 refused charges.

52387. Suppose there was anything special about it. Suppose, for example, an Inspector came to the conclusion that the constable had behaved improperly—not merely that he had made a mistake or an error of judgment, which may happen to a man, and that he ought not to have arrested him, but ought to have let the man go quietly, instead of which he got angry with the man and brought him before the Inspector, and the Inspector refused to take the charge. That is a possible state of things. Supposing there had been something more than that on the part of the constable, suggesting that the constable had behaved improperly?—Then the Inspector would bring it to the notice of the Superintendent, and the Superintendent would inquire into it, and, if he considered that the constable had behaved badly, he would put him on the morning report as a defaulter, an inquiry would be held into his conduct, and he would be dealt with.

52388. (Mr. Whitmore.) On such a night as Boat Race night are any exceptional measures taken at Vine Street Station with regard to taking charges?—No, there had not been, I think, up to Boat Race night of 1906. I think we made some special arrangements during 1907, but they fortunately were not needed.

52389. What was the nature of the arrangement made?—We had an extra Inspector or two available. There was no great trouble, I think, in 1907.

52390. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The return to which we were referring gives all complaints resulting from apprehensions by the police. It is No. 23.

52391. Is this the one that was laid on the table of the House? Is that the one you are referring to?—It is the one presented to us. First of all there is a return giving particulars of cases in which proceedings have been taken against members of the force in connection with arrests made during 1903, 1904, and 1905. Then I think there is a return giving particulars of the cases where after inquiry persons appear to have been improperly charged by the police. That is the return under which this case would have come if it had been continued up to April, 1906, is it not?—Yes.

52392. With reference to this return No. 23, giving those various particulars, I want you, if you can, to let us have such identification of the cases as will enable us to tell which of the complaints arose at Vine Street Police Station?—You will get a very good idea of that if you will look at the first column. There you will see the Division C. It is either Vine Street or Marlborough Street. Marlborough Street and Vine Street are in the same area.

52393. It would be at either one or the other?—Yes.

52394. I was rather anxious to get them separated?—I will get that for you.

52395. I know it must be either Vine Street or Marlborough Street to be in the C Division?—Quite so.

52396. There would not be much difficulty in separating them, would there?—No, none whatever; I will get that done for you.

52397. And it will be carried up to April, 1906?—To the end of the first half-year of 1906.

52398. (Chairman.) We are thinking of asking you to bring this return up to date, or up to the 31st December, 1906?—Quite so.

52399. Now I will ask you a few questions with regard to the case of George Gamble. That was a case in which George Gamble alleged that on the 21st August of last year he was in conversation with a woman called Ethel Griffiths in Spelman Street, Whitechapel, when a policeman came up and interfered with him, and ultimately he alleged that he was knocked down and kicked by the constable, and sustained a very serious injury—namely, rupture of the urethra. I am not going to ask you anything about the particular evidence in the case, but it appears that a letter was written by Messrs. Radford and Frankland, solicitors, of 27, Chancery Lane, in which they said:—"Sir,—We have just been instructed in the case of George Gamble, and we think it right to lay the facts before you in order that the case may be investigated by the authorities. Our client has been in hospital since the assault complained of, and is not yet recovered, but it is proposed to issue process against the police constable complained of as soon as he is able to attend." Have you got that letter?—Yes, I have seen that letter.

52400. Will you tell us what steps you took upon receiving that letter? I may tell you that we have a letter, dated the 8th December, which was handed in by the counsel for Mr. Gamble. This appears to have been the answer:—"New Scotland Yard, 8th December, 1906.—Gentlemen,—With reference to your letter of the 23rd ult., I am directed by the Commissioner of Police of the Metropolis to acquaint you that the police constable referred to denies having seen or assaulted your client, and nothing is known to the police of the incident.—I am, gentlemen, your obedient servant, D. H. North, for Chief Clerk."—I believe the Subdivisional Inspector went to the hospital to try and find out the man Gamble, who was said to be there.

52401. What was the name of the Sub-Divisional Inspector?—I think it was Hewison, but I am speaking from memory.

52402. He was called before us?—He went to the London Hospital, and he could not trace any man of the name of Gamble there. Then I believe he went and made inquiry in that part of Spelman Street which would be in the beat of the constable whose number was given in the letter, but he could not ascertain there that any such incident had occurred; and the constable denied that he had kicked anyone at all. That was the extent of his inquiry. The letter plainly stated that process was about to be applied for against the constable, and obviously in a case like that the direction of the Secretary of State to the Commissioner would have to be borne in mind.

52403. What direction is that?—"If the complaint amounts to a criminal charge and there is conflicting evidence on the subject, the Commissioner ought not to decide the matter, but it ought to be brought before a Magistrate who can take evidence on oath." So it was reasonably considered that as the solicitors had written that they were about to take out criminal process against the constable the matter would be threshed out in Court. I myself think our letter to the solicitors might have been fuller; we might have asked them to supply us with further information, and I think if they had wanted to help us at all they could quite well have given us that fuller information. They did not even name the hospital.

52404. No, but Sub-Divisional Inspector Hewison knew what the nature of the complaint was?—Yes, he did.

52405. He knew it was a very serious case?—I do not think he knew that at the time. He knew that the solicitors had said that this man had been in the hospital for some time; and he also knew that they were about to take out criminal process.

52406. There is nothing said in the letter about it?—In the letter to the Commissioner do they not say so? I think they informed the Commissioner that they were about to take out process, and then the whole matter would be threshed out in Court.

52407. I am suggesting that as it was a serious case, quite apart from Messrs. Radford and Frankland's action, it was one in which some inquiry ought to have been made. The constable's name was known?—Quite. He denied it, of course. We tried to test what they said by going to the hospital, and we learned that no man of the name given had ever been admitted there. It looked as if there was some mistake on their part.

52408. Still, it seems to have been known that some man had been hurt at that time. Whether the constable was guilty or was not guilty, it was known to the police that a man had been assaulted by somebody or other?—I do not know whether it was known. It was not known to us at the office, I think.

52409. I do not suppose it was known to you, but what I am suggesting is that as Sub-Divisional

Sir E. R. Henry.
31 July 1907

Inspector Hewison got to know that there had been a serious assault committed by somebody, whether by a policeman or not, ought not some further inquiry to have been made on the spot?—I do not know about that. It was never brought to our knowledge at the office that anybody had been hurt. I do not know whether it was known to the local police. I take it from you that it was, but I did not know it.

52410. The letter of Messrs. Radford and Frankland which I have not read in full says: "The facts are shortly as follows—On the 21st August in this year in Spelman Street, Whitechapel, George Gamble was speaking to a woman named Ethel Griffiths at about 4 a.m., when after some conversation the constable knocked George Gamble down and kicked him several times while on the ground." Sub-Divisional Inspector Hewison gave evidence before us on the 4th March. At question 36831 I asked him: "Did you try to find out the woman Ethel Griffiths. (A.) I did try to find out, but no one seemed to know her—not at that time—and I did not know where to go and look for her. (Q.) As a matter of fact you know now she was living in Flower and Dean Street, and had been on the streets for some years. (A.) Yes, I know that now. (Q.) Does it pass the powers of even an ordinary person to discover Ethel Griffiths if he had really tried to do so? (A.) I did try to discover her, but there is a very large number of women about there, and unless you know where to go to find a person there you may hunt for any length of time before you find that person out. I could not find her out." Then I asked him: "What did you do in order to try to discover Ethel Griffiths. (A.) I asked some of the men if any of them knew of such a person, and they said no, they did not. Many of them might have known her by sight. (Q.) As I gather, you thought you were not to act as a detective, but you were to make a report by inquiring from the constables, and so on. (A.) Yes. (Q.) You simply went to the hospital and you could find nothing about it on the information given, and you thought your duty was over. (A.) Yes. (Q.) At any rate, so far as you know, the Commissioner of Police has never heard, and did not do anything subsequently to your report. (A.) No." You did get a report, did you?—Yes, as the result of those inquiries.

52411. Then he said: "I would respectfully suggest that the solicitors might be asked to furnish Gamble's address so that he could be seen with a view to his statement being taken, and the nature of the alleged assault inquired into." Why was not that suggestion adopted?—I suppose the reason why it was not adopted was they were expecting a criminal process to issue, and, as I said before, there are directions from the Secretary of State, and Mr. Troup has told you that when an inquiry was held in one particular case which afterwards came before the Court, the Judge, Mr. Justice Stephen, found great fault with the police authorities for having made the inquiry. It is rather a difficult position, you see, altogether. When a criminal process is threatened, as there was here by the solicitors, it would appear to be quite clear that we would be justified in acting on the instructions of the Secretary of State's order.

52412. There is no clear suggestion in the letter of what the process will be?—But I thought it had been explained to the Commission by Lord Russell that there was no doubt whatever as to the meaning, and that they meant to take out process. Did he not say so?

52413. The letter does not say criminal process?—But did not Lord Russell say there was no doubt about what it meant? Lord Russell made a statement to the Commission about it.

52414. The letter says: "It is proposed to issue process against the police constable."

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I do not remember now what Lord Russell said about it, but I do suggest that it meant that it would be criminal process. All I can say is that is the way I should have understood it.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It would cover both.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) It would.

(Chairman.) The common form is to say: "We shall commence an action."

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I should have understood it meant some criminal process.

52415. (Chairman.) I should have thought that that was a definite charge against a particular constable, quite apart from holding a formal inquiry by a Commissioner. I suggest that some effort might have been made to discover what the truth of the matter was in view of the intended process?—Yes. There is some difficulty there in reconciling the directions given by the Home Office and actual practice.

52416. That is all I have to ask you about the Gamble case. We have had a considerable number of Returns from you relating to cases in which complaints have been made by somebody or other, it may be by a member of the public, or it may be by a superior officer against a particular police constable. You have been good enough to tabulate the results for us?—Yes.

52417. Is the inquiry in each case made upon a uniform system, or does the Assistant Commissioner make the inquiry?—In some of those cases they would be made by the Superintendent or by the Sub-Divisional Inspector. Of course, in a great many of these, as you will see, the complaints were anonymous or pseudonymous, and very often they were very general in character—"I write to tell you your police are bribed," and so on. There is not very much to go on frequently.

52418. But if there is a complaint made by letter to you at the office that Constable So-and-So has been consorting with loose women, or he has been seen taking a bribe from a bookmaker, or something like that, what do you do, in fact?—It is made over to the Superintendent, who in such cases as you indicate would have the man put under observation to see whether he was in the habit of associating with loose women, or to see if he was in the habit of frequenting the company of betting men.

52419. These returns would look as though some formal steps were taken. I am looking at a return on page 14:—"Rank, number and name of officer complained of—police in general; date of complaint, 14/8/1905"—that is the 14th August, 1905; "Name, sufferer; address, Lower Marsh; complaint, nature, anonymous; particulars, betting at the Duke of Sussex; police said to be squared by the landlord and bookmaker." Then you have, "Result of case; observation kept, but nothing ascertained to justify allegation." What is the meaning of that?—They sent a man in plain clothes to keep observation there for a certain number of days to see whether any betting took place; they found no betting took place, and therefore they said there was no foundation for the allegation.

52420. I suppose the plain clothes man would be confidentially employed?—Yes.

52421. Who would be his superior officer—the Inspector at the station?—The Sub-divisional Inspector or the Superintendent. Perhaps the Superintendent dealt with this case himself.

52422. In the natural course of things, upon getting a communication from you, would the Superintendent of the L Division, or the Sub-divisional Inspector take the matter in hand and get a plain clothes man, and tell him what the nature of the complaint was, and to hold his tongue, and to just go and watch?—Yes.

52423. It would be a breach of duty for a plain clothes man to mention to any other constable that he was engaged in the duty of watching them?—Certainly it would be a breach of his duty, because in that way it might get to the ears of the person who was suspected.

52424. Is the plain clothes man referred to a plain clothes man habitually employed at that particular police station?—Sometimes. Sometimes I have known the Sub-divisional Inspector to go in plain clothes himself.

52425. Does he ever ask for your assistance from Scotland Yard?—No. They very often ask for assistance from another division; in fact, it is the general practice; they get men from other divisions who are not known, otherwise the constable on the beat would spot him at once.

52426. Now take another case on these returns. Take the last one on page 14. There the number of the police constable is given, the date is 2/7/1905, the name is "Not given," and the address given is Lorraine Road, Holloway. The nature of the complaint is "Anonymous," and the particulars are: "Complaints of bookmakers, and alleges police are bribed, and that the police constable living in the road must know what is going on." The result is entered up in this way: "Inquiry made, but no grounds for the insinuations discovered." What kind of inquiry was made in that case?—I should think inquiry would be made as to whether there was any street bookmaking going on in that man's neighbourhood, and that is about all the inquiry that could be made, because under any circumstances the constable would probably say he did not know anything about it.

52427. Would he be asked?—Yes, he would be asked, of course; but, of course, any enemy of his might fire in an anonymous letter. That is quite simple. One man could fire in twenty or thirty anonymous complaints in a day.

52428. I see the two words "Inquiry made" are used very frequently under the head "Result of case," and then the result is given?—Yes.

52429. Are we to understand that that means a formal inquiry, and that there has been a serious attempt to discover if there is anything in the charge or not, or simply that the letter is forwarded to the Superintendent or Sub-divisional Inspector, and he just makes the inquiry from two or three officers?—I suppose a serious inquiry may be said to be made, otherwise they might just put the letter aside; but you see in many of these cases the police in general are the persons complained of, and the complainant is anonymous, or pseudonymous, or something or other. What are you to do with a complaint like that?

52430. I think we were told by Sir Mackenzie Chalmers that Scotland Yard is the only public department to take notice of anonymous communications?—There is some truth in that, I think.

52431. Where the complaint is a perfectly general one in that way, the entry is just the same—"Inquiry made"?—No. Take G, which is the fifth case from the bottom on page 15—"Police in general." That was a complaint alleging that a particular house "is used as a brothel, and that the owner of the house is a bookmaker, and bribes police." Of course, it is quite possible to ascertain whether the house is used as a brothel by keeping observation, and no doubt that was done. The result was: "Observation kept, and it was found that the premises were being used as a brothel, but were vacated on 20th June."

52432. There you enter "Inquiry made." I suppose the only inquiry made in that case was that observation was directed to be kept, and was kept, by a plain clothes man?—Yes.

52433. So you see inquiry was made in a very general sense?—Yes.

52434. Look at page 18, the third column from the bottom. There is a case of a complaint made against a particular policeman; the name of the complainant is given, his address is given, and the particulars of complaint are, "Threatening to arrest complainant for betting, and subsequently receiving 2s. 6d. from him." There you have the name of the complainant, the name of the constable, and you have got a particular complaint?—Yes.

52435. In the next column the entry is, "Inquiry made. Evidence as to receiving the bribe deemed inconclusive. As it was, however, held that the constable had not properly patrolled his beat, was in conversation with a bookmaker, and he had told falsehoods in connection with the case, he was reduced in pay 3s. per week for one year, severely reprimanded, cautioned, and transferred at his own expense." What was the character of the inquiry in that case?—I could not say, but I suppose this man may possibly have been interviewed.

52436. Am I to understand that in that case the Superintendent or Sub-divisional Inspector or Assistant Commissioner went and summoned the complainant to come before him, and took evidence in much the same way as was done in the Braham case?—Yes. Of course, I could not say that the complainant was actually interviewed by the police, but I should think it quite probable that they heard what he had to say, and then they heard what the constable had to say, and as the result of that they found that he had not properly patrolled his beat, and that he was in conversation with a bookmaker. Perhaps they put some observation on him; but, of course, as to that I cannot say.

52437. Do you think it would be a good system that in all cases like that, where a person makes a complaint of a constable, there should be something in the nature of a personal inquiry?—Yes.

52438. An inquiry with witnesses?—Yes. But how are you to get witnesses sometimes?

52439. Of course, you cannot make yourself a court of justice, and you cannot administer the oath?—Nor can we compel people to come. That is the difficulty.

52440. Major Tarry told us, for instance, that whenever anything of that kind happens at Leeds, either he or one of the Superintendents makes a point of dealing with it, and that he generally tries to get the parties before him?—Did he say how many inquiries a year he had like that? I should think probably he would not have more than half a dozen or so.

52441. I have forgotten whether he told us the number or not?—I should think you will probably find that he does not have a dozen.

52442. Are there many such in London?—Yes, there are a good many. These Returns perhaps indicate that there are a good many.

52443. We understand that these Returns are exhaustive?—Yes, I think they are quite exhaustive.

52444. So that we have evidence as to the number?—Yes.

52445. I will not ask you anything more about those returns just now.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) I have found the reference to what Lord Russell said as to Messrs. Radford and Frankland's letter. It is at Question 33029. Lord Russell says: "There is no question about it, it was written as a warning before taking out a summons before a police magistrate on my advice.

(Chairman.) That does not settle the question of what the letter means.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) When the letter was before us I thought it did refer to criminal process. When we had the letter before us, whatever the words mean, apart from the letter, I note that both the Chairman and I thought it was for the purpose of criminal proceedings.

(Mr R. D. Muir.) And you gave your reasons.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Yes, and Lord Russell apparently seems to take the same view.

(Mr. R. D. Muir.) He says that, as a matter of fact, it was done under his advice, and therefore it was intended to have that meaning, whether it is in the letter or no.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) He says: "There is no question about it, it was written as a warning before taking out a summons before a police magistrate on my advice." That is at page 756. Then I say it is plain that it must have referred to some criminal process. I see, with the letter before me, why I came to that conclusion, because I say at page 756: "I thought it was the subsequent words that appeared to me to show it was a criminal process," and I quote the words: "We think it right to lay the facts before you in order that the case may be investigated by the authorities," and the Chairman came to the same conclusion.

(Witness.) If you will turn to question 39445 you will see that Major Tarry says: "I think I am perfectly safe in saying not more than three or four cases a year. Many of the cases I can deal with by letter."

52446. (Chairman.) Major Tarry, I believe, told us that the inquiries that he held ran to 75 or 80 a year. Now I just want to ask you a question or two about the police reports, by which I mean the reports written out by constables at the various police stations. Do you find the existing system satisfactory. Do you think you get a really good report?—No, I think many of the constables are not sufficiently educated to express adequately in words what they mean to convey, and I think we should get more satisfactory results if we had statements taken from them, and that we are doing more largely now.

52447. Do you mean it would be better for their superior officer to go and ask them questions—Exactly, and to reduce it to narrative form, and get them to sign it. I am sure it would be better.

52448. Instead of doing what they do now—to simply write out their statements?—Quite.

52449. They sit at a desk, as we have been told, in in the charge room and write out their statements?—Yes. It is a real ordeal for some of them. There is many a good constable who would look the other way rather than have to intervene in a case if he had to make a report about it. A great many of them hate making reports.

52450. I certainly found at one station that there was only a very inconvenient place for the constables to write at?—Yes.

Sir E. R. Henry.

31 July 1907.

52451. At what time of day are constables supposed to make these reports—when they are off duty?—Yes, they would be off duty, or be coming on or going off duty.

52452. Is any allowance made to them for the time taken up in this laborious occupation of writing down an accurate statement of what they have seen, heard, or done?—No, I am afraid not.

52453. Will you now tell us something as to the duties and functions of the Assistant Commissioners of Police?—Shall I read out how the duties are divided.

52454. If you please?—All matters connected with Beats, Candidates, Complaints and Commendations of Police, Clothing and Equipment, Discipline (including gratuities connected therewith), Distribution of the Force, Dockyards (policing of), Fixed points, Mounted branch (horses and police vehicles, forage, etc.), Movements of Police, Protection of public buildings, Processions in the streets, Royal or public functions (police arrangements), Street collections and the Regulation of traffic are dealt with by the Assistant Commissioner Administrative, that is Major Wodehouse. Then all matters connected with Advertisements, Aliens, Betting (in the streets), The employment of children, Costermongers, Disorder in the streets (nuisances, etc.), Disorderly houses, Dogs Acts, Financial questions, Gratuities (unconnected with discipline), Insane persons, Legal questions, Liquor laws, Lost property, Military and Naval inquiries (deserters, etc.), Missing persons, Motor cars, Pedlars, Public carriages, Stations and stores, Summonses, Veterinary preventive measures (glanders, importation of dogs, swine fever, etc.), are dealt with by the legal Assistant-Commissioner as you call him. These are supposed to involve more or less a great many legal questions—for instance, Insane persons and Liquor laws. There is a great deal of legal trouble involved in the administration of the Liquor laws and Licensing questions, and we have a good many cases in the Courts. The third Assistant Commissioner deals with all cases of serious crime, Aid of detectives, Convict supervision, Gaming and betting in public houses and on private premises, Missing girls, Naturalisation, Procuration, and all such cognate subjects.

52455. Do you think it would be better to have one Commissioner, and that a legal Commissioner, to deal with inquiries?—I think what you want is not legal knowledge but common sense. I do not think there are many legal points involved.

52456. As we know from the inquiries that Major Wodehouse conducted for you upon your instructions he goes and makes an inquiry by question and answer, and he gives his own opinion upon it. Do you not think that a lawyer would be much more likely to do that kind of business better than a man whose experience is military or executive?—I think you want to have a good knowledge of police practice to enable you to gauge the evidence and the significance of it. I think that is essential. I think what has not been taken into account is that all these men are overworked. When I go away, one of them has to act for me, and they each in turn must have their holiday, so that there are four of us to have a holiday, which may be put down at two months in the year, at least, including sickness, so that you have not three Assistant-Commissioners but only two and a third, or a little over two Assistant-Commissioners. There ought always to be three men available, and there are not.

52457. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Would there be sufficient work to keep one Commissioner employed in holding inquiries?—I do not think there would. It is a very important thing that you should make inquiries on the spot. Many of the most important witnesses might be unwilling to come to Scotland Yard, and it might therefore be necessary to interview them at perhaps a Rowton House, a common lodging house, or at their own residence, or to interview them at inconvenient hours, perhaps after they had come back from their work. I do not see how the Assistant Commissioner could do that. I can quite see the advantages there would be if practicable, but I see great difficulty in the way.

52458. The difficulty seems to be that in some of these inquiries, at least, no decision is arrived at?—Is not that the case when an inquiry is held in a court of law?

52459. I quite see the difficulty, but what I find in a great many of these cases is that no decision is arrived at?—After all, the proper machinery is a court of law. Our inquiry is only made to clear up points that have arisen, of course, in a court of law. We have not got really to come to a finding upon any great main issue.

52460. (Chairman.) That might be a sufficient answer if it were accepted by general consent, but you see what has taken place with regard to the Gerothwohl and Lavalette case, as to which I asked you this morning. The Home Office evidently thought it was its duty to ask you to make inquiry, you did make inquiry through Major Wodehouse, and Major Wodehouse gives no decision whatever?—He was taking the evidence for me. I instructed him verbally. I cannot remember exactly, but I know I had to go out somewhere just then, and I said, "You send for these men and make this inquiry for me," and he made the inquiry for me.

52461. Your suggestion that the court would give adequate legal protection to any person who is wronged, or who may be wronged, by a particular constable, is sound enough, but that is not the view apparently that is taken by the Home Office. The Home Office evidently think it their duty, if a member of the public writes to them, to make an inquiry of you?—But you also see what the specific directions are which have been quoted to you.

52462. I do not quite follow that?—According to their own direction, they should not have asked me to make an inquiry in that case when criminal proceedings were indicated.

52463. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It strikes me, in answer to your observation, that many of the complaints that are made could not be brought in a court of law at all?—This particular one could.

52464. Yes, but that is one of a comparatively small class. Numbers of complaints are made, for example, by persons against the police in connection with dereliction of duty by the police, in which an inquiry is made by you. We have the result here of 500 complaints in which an inquiry is made by you, and in many cases, naturally, from the way in which the inquiry is conducted, the result is inconclusive. Those cases could not be brought in a court of law?—No; but even if they could be brought in a court of law the result might be inconclusive. You must give the accused the benefit of the doubt, and therefore it may be inconclusive. I mean the result is inconclusive because a wrong has been done, and you are not able to say who has done the wrong. Therefore the result from my point of view is inconclusive.

52465. (Chairman.) Supposing I were to complain of the general neglect of his duty on the part of a policeman on the beat in the square in which I live and in the adjoining streets, and I wrote to the Home Office, the Home Office, I understand, would refer the matter to you?—Yes.

52466. They would acknowledge my letter, and that particular class of complaint would be referred to you to deal with?—Yes.

52467. You would then, I understand, feel called upon to make an inquiry, would you not?—Yes.

52468. The suggestion I have been making to you is that it would be well to have an Assistant-Commissioner, whose principal duty should be to inquire into complaints of that kind, and to go to the station or to the locality in question, and ask anybody who wishes to say anything to come before him. He might write to me and say, "You have been complaining about the way in which police duty is neglected in your neighbourhood. Will you kindly step across to the station to see me and tell me all about it"?—I think that might be very good if you put it in that way.

52469. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You get a very different case where a complaint of bribery is made by a member of the public, or where a policeman is bribed by a bookmaker. Apparently, according to the present system, all you can do is to inquire. You would have to keep observation. You would have inquiry made, I suppose, of the constable and inquiry made of the complainant, but unless you get some further evidence you would have to stop at that. But if the suggestion that the learned Chairman is making to you were adopted, and you had some official whose duty it was to deal with all those matters, he could, for example, direct what kind of observation should be kept, how long, and by whom?—Yes, he could do that, certainly.

52470. It would relieve you, and it would relieve the other Assistant-Commissioners from that kind of work, and it would give you the advantage of having a definite, conclusive report made one way or the other?—Quite.

52471. And it would prove whether the charge was confirmed or not?—Yes. As I have pointed out to you, we have only a little over two Assistant-Commissioners to do the work. That would give us a third, and he could do a great deal of work in addition to that.

(Chairman.) I was suggesting that it should be the principal occupation of one Assistant-Commissioner to hold that kind of inquiry.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That all these complaints should go before him?

(Chairman.) Yes. One would naturally think that that would be the work of a Legal Commissioner.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Not because of his knowledge of law, but because of his training in sifting evidence and determining the matter upon evidence.

52472. (Chairman.) There is one other general point I want to put to you, and that is as to the proceedings in the charge-room. Have you taken the opportunity of looking at the evidence given by some of the Magistrates before us?—Yes. I might say that I caused a reference to be made to the law officers of the Crown upon that point. If you will refer to the Police Acts—to Section 11 of the Act of 1829, to Sections 69, 70, and 71 of the Act of 1839, and to Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, which are the only Sections, so far as I know, in the statute law which confer powers on a station officer to deal with charges—they, as I read them, expressly and explicitly point out that his functions are limited to making an inquiry with a view to determining whether he will or will not accept bail, and I venture to think that that view is supported by Section 72 of the Metropolitan Police Act of 1864 (27 and 28 Vic. cap. 55).

52473. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You are referring to the Inspector's duty to accept bail. I understood the learned Chairman's question to be with reference to accepting charges?—Yes. What I wish to point out is that, according to my reading of the law, there is no statutory authority for an officer refusing a charge when it is brought to the station (this is an executive practice which has grown up because it was found to be necessary), but the statutory requirements of the law are that he shall produce that person before the Magistrate, and I think, if you look at Section 11 of the Act of 1829 and at Sections 69, 70, and 71 of the Act of 1839, you will find that they are the only sections dealing with the point.

52474. If I follow correctly, the view you are putting forward at present is that he has no discretion if you act strictly according to one interpretation, at any rate?—He really has not a discretion.

52475. (Mr. Whitmore.) Even if there was no case made out?—According to the law that is so, as I read it; but an executive direction has been given that he may refuse a charge.

52476. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) That he must not refuse to accept any charge?—That is the interpretation of it. I should like you to look at Sections 69, 70, and 71 of the Act of 1839. Section 69 defines the duties of constables, and Section 70 defines the duties of station officers.

(Chairman.) Section 69 says: "Every person taken into custody by any constable belonging to the Metropolitan Police, without warrant, except persons detained for the mere purpose of ascertaining their name or residence, shall be forthwith delivered into the custody of the constable in charge of the nearest station-house, in order that such person may be secured until he can be brought before a Magistrate, to be dealt with according to law, or may give bail for his appearance before a Magistrate if the constable in charge shall deem it prudent to take bail in the manner hereinafter mentioned." Then Section 70 says: "Whenever any person charged with any offence of which he is liable to be summarily convicted before a Magistrate, or with having carelessly done any hurt or damage, shall be, without the warrant of a Magistrate, in the custody of any constable of the Metropolitan Police in charge of any station-house during the time when the police courts shall be shut, it shall be lawful for such constable, if he shall deem it prudent, to take the recognisance of such person, with or without sureties." That is a constable in charge of any station-house?—Yes.

52477. That would be, according to the ordinary practice, the Inspector?—Yes.

52478. Then you refer us to Section 71?—Yes, and to Section 38 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act.

52479. That is a section giving power to bind over the person making the charge.

52480. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Are those the sections which you say show that there is no discretion?—Yes; they appear to give no discretion.

52481. (Chairman.) As to accepting or refusing a charge?—Yes. His duty is to bring the person before the Magistrate.

52482. Section 71 says: "It shall be lawful for the constable in charge of the station-house to require the person making such charge to enter into a recognisance conditioned as hereinafter mentioned, and upon his or her refusal so to do it shall be lawful for such constable, if he shall deem it prudent, to discharge from custody the person so charged upon his or her recognisances, with or without sureties." Supposing he says, "I will do nothing," and then the accused goes away?—If he does not take recognisances he has to keep him until he can produce him before the Magistrate.

52483. That is the absolute duty of the Inspector?—Yes. I think that is emphasised to some extent by Section 72 of the Metropolitan Police Act 1864, 27 and 28 Victoria, chapter 55, which says: "Whenever any person charged with an offence under this Act" (that is to say, a street musician) "shall be brought to any station-house during the time when the police court shall be shut, it shall be lawful for the constable in charge of the station-house to require the person making the charge to enter into a recognisance, conditioned as is provided by the Act passed in the second and third years of Her Majesty, chapter 47, section 72, and upon the refusal of such person to do so it shall be lawful for such constable to discharge from custody the person so charged." So that the legislature contemplates that there must be a specific power given to enable the constable in charge of a station-house so to act. I put these views before the Home Office, who took the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and I will read you the opinion of the law officers of the Crown upon it.

52484. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) Will you give us the date? 18th April, 1907. "The powers of an officer of police in charge of a Metropolitan Police station are not magisterial, but those of a constable only, and are clearly defined by the well-known rules of the common law and by statute. Police officers must exercise the powers vested in them with reasonable discretion, and would in no case be justified in detaining in custody a person against whom a charge is made in the absence of some ground for believing that the facts well support the charge, and that it is one in respect of which the defendant is liable to arrest." That is how the matter stands at present.

52485. It is only the opinion of the law officers that there is such a discretion? Yes. I put before them that the practice had grown up, and that it was an executive practice.

52486. (Chairman.) Your view, I understand it, is that when a constable has apprehended a prisoner, and brings him to the station, it is the duty of the officer to take the charge?—No; I do not say that. I say the law appears to contemplate that he should take the prisoner before the Magistrate at the earliest possible moment.

52487. That is exactly what I am saying.

52488. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) You are putting it rather higher—not only that it is his duty, but that there is an obligation upon him to do it?—A statutory obligation. That is, as I read it, the liability.

52489. (Chairman.) And then to take the bail of the prisoner?—Or to take bail—either to produce him before the Magistrate or to take bail, or to let him go on recognisances.

52490. You have given us the opinion of the Law Officers. It is evident from the regulations in the White Book that the exercise of a very large discretion is contemplated?—They used to exercise much more discretion in the early days of the force, because they used to release as many as from 20,000 to 22,000 persons a year in that way. Then it was realised that this might lead to abuse, and so the Commissioner intervened, and it was gradually reduced to its present position. Of these 6,000 or 7,000 charges which are refused at the police stations, I suppose very nearly three out of four are charges brought by private persons, or something like that.

52491. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) I noticed you were asked a question about that at a very early stage, and we were to have a return. If I remember aright, it was said that 6 or 7 per cent. were acquitted in the year, and you thought they were mostly acquittals based on charges by private persons?—Not acquittals, but charges refused.

52492. Then you said you would give us a return?—I have got it here.

52493. (Chairman.) I think I quite understand your view as to what the duties of the Inspector in the charge room are. You practically adopt the opinion given by the Law Officers?—Of course.

52494. That being so, do you think that the ordinary Inspector is the best kind of man to be entrusted with that work, or do you think you should have a special class?—I do not think you should have a special class. We have about 180 odd police stations, and if you are to provide a special man at each it would mean a very costly increase in establishment.

52495. Mr. Muir handed in a document, from which it appears that some legal knowledge is expected on the part of persons who are promoted to be Inspectors. Is that so?—I think I furnished the Commission with some questions that we ask not only when they, but when men in every grade are examined, and I think some of them have a good working legal knowledge.

52496. Looking at the returns, one is rather struck with the fact that there are practically no complaints against the Inspectors in charge of stations. They are very rare, apparently. Is that so?—Yes, it is not often that we have a complaint. Of course, you have had a complaint against an Inspector in charge of Vine Street.

52497. Yes; but, as far as I can tell from the returns, it is comparatively rarely that anyone complains of the Inspector's conduct in the charge room?—If persons complain of any sort of maltreatment in the charge room, they are practically complaining of the Inspector who is there to see that it does not occur.

52498. That class of case is not very numerous?—No.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) As far as I follow from the returns, there are very few cases of an Inspector having accepted a charge which he ought not to have received.

(Chairman.) In a general sense an Inspector is complained of, as one person did before us complain that he was assaulted in the police station. That, in a sense, is a complaint against the Inspector in charge, but that is not the sort of complaint that I had in my mind.

(Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) The only case, I think, we have before us, and as far as I know the only one in the returns, is one in which the Inspector was reprimanded or "cautioned"—I think that was the word used—for having taken a charge which he ought not to have taken, and that was in Braham's case.

52499-500. (Chairman.) That is the only case we have had, except that in the Gerothwohl and Lavalette case there was a distinct complaint that the Inspector was not keeping order in the police station. Apart from those two cases, I think there has been no complaint of the Inspector in charge?—Quite. I may tell you that we have not Inspectors at all stations in the charge room.

52501. Sometimes the sergeant acts as Inspector?—Yes.

52502. Has he to pass the same examination in law as the Inspector has passed?—No, he has not to pass quite the same examination, but when he goes up to pass as an Inspector he has to pass that examination.

52503. But he is alowed to take charge of the station?—We have a very considerable number of station sergeants. It is only really in the inner divisions that we have Inspectors. It is on account of the extra cost.

52504. I have been rather assuming that the normal state of things is to have an Inspector in every police station?—No, it is not the normal state of things.

52505. That is theoretically so, is it not? I think you referred us to the White Book, where all the grades and organisation of the different officers are referred to?—I did not mean you to infer that there was an Inspector at every station, because that is not so at all.

52506. (Mr. Rufus Isaacs.) It would be so, I suppose, at every important station?—I would not even say that. I think perhaps what you might find would be four Inspectors and two station sergeants or five Inspectors and one station sergeant. It is all a question of cost, as I said before. We are gradually trying to have Inspectors put at all the more important stations.

52507. (Chairman.) I do not quite follow the distinction with regard to an important station so far as the Inspector in charge is concerned. It is just as important if a man is arrested for being drunk and disorderly in a remote suburb; I mean it is important to him?—It is the number of charges I am thinking of.

52508. It is equally important to him that the charge, whether accepted or refused, should be dealt with by a competent man?—It is.

52509. Is the distinction between the amount of knowledge or experience required by an Inspector and that required of a sergeant a comparatively small one?—I do not think there is very much distinction between them with regard to the relative knowledge of their work. I think the average time it takes for a man to rise from being a station sergeant to an Inspector is something under two years.

52510. So that the grade of a station sergeant is very near to that of an Inspector?—Very near.

52511. (Chairman. Sir Edward, I think you promised to tell me something about the number of officers of the Police Force. We have got the ordinary returns. What I should like you to tell us something about is whether the force is adequate in numbers to deal with the work cast upon it in the metropolis?—In my opinion there are not quite enough men really to cope with the work. I attribute this to the fact that from 1890 to 1900 the augmentation of he force was not sufficient. During that period the force was augmented by something like 650 men; it should have been augmented by probably 2,500 men in that period, and consequently we are now short of the number of men that are required, and we have accordingly in some districts to double up beats.

52512. I suppose as population has increased the number of police-constables has been increased since the formation of the force?—Yes.

52513. What would you regard as the normal and proper percentage of increase of the force?—I should put it down at from 1½ to 2 per cent.

52514. Has that normal increase been maintained of recent years?—It was not maintained during the 10 years from 1890 to 1900.

52515. And since 1900?—On the whole, I think it has been maintained.

52516. But still, taking 1½ per cent. to 2 per cent. as the normal increase, that percentage of increase has not taken place from the time of the formation of the force?—I could not go further back than 1890, but from 1890 it has not taken place.

52517. Then I may take it that in 1890 the number of officers in the force was adequate for the then population?—Yes.

52518. Is it adequate now?—No. I still regard an addition to the force as necessary.

52519. Referring for a moment to the charge room, I forgot to call your attention to the instruction in reference to the Inspector's duty of taking down anything that the accused person may say?—There is such an instruction given, but in practice it is not advantageous to give effect to it. The best practice is for the officer in charge of the case to make a note in his pocket-book of any statements the accused person may make, because he is then in a position to prove that when he appears before the Magistrate at the police court. If you had to depend on the station officer it would mean that the station officer would have to go to the police court; and I might mention that 25 per cent. of our stations send their cases to two police courts; and so if a station officer were required to attend to prove the statements made by the accused he might be required to appear at two different police courts at the same time. In addition to that, he is a man who is on night duty till six in the morning, and if he had to attend at the police court he would have no sleep, and we should require extra station officers; we should have to double them.

52520. Still, that hardly seems a reason, does it, for not writing down a statement made by the accused? Take any case you like. Say the charge is that a person is drunk and disorderly, and then the prisoner makes a statement. I do not quite see why the Inspector should not take it down. The constable who takes the charge ought to take a note of it in his notebook, as you say, and then the station officer would not be called upon the next day to appear at the police court, but the officer who preferred the charge would be able to refresh his memory by looking at his notebook, and he would be able to say that when charged the prisoner said so and so?—What purpose would it serve?

52521. Supposing somebody at the police court cross-examines as to what the accused did in fact say, the Magistrate may adjourn the case for the attendance of the Inspector, and then the Inspector, having taken the statement in writing, would be in a position either to confirm the statement appearing in the notebook of the constable, or else to show that the constable had made a mistake, or had made a wrong entry?—That would apply to the more serious charges of fraud where very lengthy statements are made by the defendant which are taken down by the officer in charge of the case.

52522. I was suggesting that it might apply in all cases. In the ordinary cases nothing more would be heard of it. There would be the statement written down by the Inspector, and the constable who preferred the charge could be called, and, if necessary, the Inspector might later on, at the adjourned hearing of the case, be asked to make his statement?—Possibly, but that would mean a great duplication of work. Take an important case such as a case of fraud where the accused makes a lengthy statement. That statement now is taken down by the officer in charge of the case, and it would also have to be taken down by the Inspector. That would mean a great duplication of work.

52523. Regulation 198 as to charges is at page 252 of the White Book: "A statement made by a prisoner when charged at a station is to be accurately written down at the time by the officer on duty, and reported to the Magistrate who hears the case." Do you not think there is a great deal of importance to be attached to what the prisoner does say at the time of charging?—Certainly.

52524. If there is importance to be attached to it some record of it ought to be kept; you suggest it is quite sufficient if the constable making the charge writes it down?—The officer makes the charge. Sometimes the charge may be made by a constable, and sometimes the charge may be made by a superior officer in important cases. Perhaps I might read the order we propose having in the revised Orders. We have been revising the General Orders for three years or more. This is the form which it has taken:—"When prisoners are brought to stations and charged with any offence, the statements of persons charging, of witnesses, and of police, are to be made to the officer on duty in the presence and hearing of the prisoners. The statements of witnesses and of persons charged are to be patiently heard. If there be more than one police witness in a case, each constable is to make his statement out of the hearing of the other, whenever it is so desired by the person charged. The charge as entered upon the sheet is always to be read over to the prisoner, not with a view of extracting an answer, but to inform the person of the nature of the charge which is preferred, but any observation he makes is to be noted and attended to. A person formally charged at a police station very often remains silent though he may have emphatically denied the charge, and asserted his innocence, when arrested; or when on his way to the station. In such cases an officer should inform the court of the fact of the repudiation of the charge when giving evidence, otherwise he may mislead the court as to the prisoner's attitude. The officer on duty will not allow any statement in the nature of a confession to be extracted either by a police officer or private individual from a person brought to a station on a charge. In serious cases the accused should be warned that any admission he makes may be used against him in court. A statement made by a prisoner brought to a station to be charged may prove to be of great importance in the case. It is incumbent therefore on the station officer to see that such statement is accurately recorded. In cases not of a serious nature, such as charges of infraction of the Police Act, By-laws, etc., it is sufficient if the substance is duly taken down by the officer in charge of the case, and the station officer should see that the necessary entry is made in the pocket-book, this entry being read aloud by him in the presence of the prisoner and its correctness testified to by his initials. In more serious cases, it is desirable to take down the prisoner's statement in his own words. This will be done by the officer in charge of the case, and the statement thus reduced to writing will, when completed, be read out in the hearing of the accused. If for any reason this course cannot be followed, the station officer will record such statement, and make it over to the officer in charge of the case, who, having heard it made, and seen it taken down, is competent to put it in evidence. Persons who present themselves at police stations with the object of giving evidence regarding the facts of a charge are to be afforded all necessary facilities. It may happen that a person so presenting himself is one who has evaded arrest at the time of the occurrence, but whose arrest is sought. Action should not be taken which might have the appearance of a desire on the part of the police to suppress evidence, and it might therefore be better after the charge has been dealt with, to apply to a magistrate for process against such person."

Sir E. R. Henry. 31 July 1907.

52525. I see there has been considerable variation, but, in fact, there is more duplication of instruction in the book as it stands. For instance, I have just read Regulation 198. Regulation 209 says: "The charge as entered upon the sheet is always to be read over to the prisoner, not with a view of extracting an answer, but to inform him of the nature of the offence with which he is charged, but any observation he makes is to be noted and attended to." That you repeat in the new regulations?—Yes.

52526. He must be informed "of the nature of the offence with which he is charged, but any observation he makes is to be noted and attended to"?—Yes.

52527. You, as far as I can follow, propose to repeal or to get rid of Regulation 198, but I suggest to you that there is a good deal of distinction between an entry made in the notebook of the constable who is making the charge, and an entry made in a book kept at the station by the inspector who takes the charge?—There is a great distinction.

52528. The Inspector who takes the charge is obviously quite disinterested in the matter, or he ought to be disinterested?—Yes, he is quite disinterested.

52529. But, after all, once the case is before the Magistrate, he is interested in getting his version of the facts accepted?—This is a very important point, more especially in serious cases where sometimes very lengthy statements are made by an accused person, and those statements are taken down by officers of skill, but if it has to be taken down in duplicate ——

52530. I am not suggesting that in that class of case there should be duplication. Supposing I were a Magistrate sitting listening to one of these small charges, I confess I should very much prefer that the statement of the prisoner, if there was any contest about what he really did say, should come from the Inspector rather than from the constable in charge of the case, who is a party to the controversy before the Court. What do you say to that?—Of course, I have always got to see that there is no unnecessary duplication of clerical work. There is a frightful amount of clerical work to do, and if an Inspector has to attend to clerical work he cannot do anything else. Therefore we endeavour to reduce clerical work as far as we can, and I consider that there is no risk to a prisoner provided the entries are made in the notebook, and the Inspector in charge sees and initials those entries.

52531. That is a new suggestion—that he should see and initial the entries?—Yes.
